kept from those extravagances which his depraved nature would otherwise have carried him out to, and so has grown up under the eye of a careful and severe tuition, has cause with bended knees to acknowledge the mercy of being born of religious parents, and bred up under virtuous and discreet governors; and to bless God, without any danger of pharisaical arrogance, that upon this account "he is not as many other men are." But still (as I have noted), all this is but "the sweeping and garnishing of the house;" and though education may sometimes do that, yet it is grace only that can keep out "the unclean spirit." And consequently such a person, notwithstanding all this outward flourish of behaviour, must yet know that his heart may be all this while as really unrenewed, and upon that score as impure, as the heart of those, who, not being hampered with such early preventions, break forth into the most open and flagitious practices.

(1772.) I think we may assert that in a hundred men there are more than ninety who are what they are, good or bad, useful or pernicious to society, from the instruction they have received. It is on education that depend the great differences observable among them. The least and most imperceptible impressions received in our infancy have consequences very important, and of a long duration. It is with these first impressions as with a river, whose waters we can easily turn, by different canals, in quite opposite courses; so that from the insensible direction the stream receives at its source, it takes different directions, and at last arrives at places far distant from each other; and with the same facility we may, I think, turn the minds of children to what direction we please.

—Locke, 1632-1704.

(1773.) It is important to distinguish between actual failure, and failure as to the production of visible effect. It appears more has been effected by education than is really apparent. The water has been frozen, and to bring the ice even to the state of cold water, a considerable quantity of caloric has been employed. They have expended much fuel, taken much pains, enough to make the water boil had it been cold water when they began; but though, when they put their hand in the vessel, they now feel the water cold, even that is an advance upon the ice. So when they saw the state of crime, however they might lament it, they consider what the extent of evil would have been but for so much religious education. In calculating the good done, the evil prevented must be considered, and if this is not so apparent, it is not less real. —Salter.

(1774.) Hang me all the thieves in Gibbet Street to-morrow, and the place will be crammed with fresh tenants in a week; but catch me up the young thieves from the gutter and the doorsteps; take Jonathan Wild from the breast; send Mrs. Sheppard to Bridewell, but take hale young Jack out of her arms; teach and wash me this young unkempt vicious colt, and he will run for the Virtue Stakes yet; take the young child, the little lamb, before the great Jack Sheppard ruddles him and folds him for his own black flock in Hades; give him some soap, instead of whipping him for stealing a cake of brown Windsor; teach him the Gospel, instead of sending him to the treadmill for haunting chapels and purloining prayer-books out of pews; put him in the way of filling shop-tills, instead of transport ing him when he crawls on his hands and knees to empty them ; let him know that he has a body fit and made for something better than to be kicked, bruised, chained, pinched with hunger, clad in rags or prison gray, or mangled with jailer's cat ; let him know that he has a soul to be saved. In God's name, take care of the children, somebody ; and there will soon be an oldest inhabitant in Gibbet Street, and never a new one to succeed him !

—Household Words.

(1775.) When you show me a man who has been cultured, you ought to show me a man that is better built to meet the contingencies of life than any that are uncultured.

During the war we sent into the camp both classes ; and we expected the rude swain, who had known only coarseness, would make a better soldier, and resist all the hardships of the field more easily than the young man who had passed through college, or who had been brought up in the midst of wealth and refinement ; but experience did not justify that expectation. It was found, on the contrary, that although the regiments that were gathered from the country were physically harder than those that came from the cities, they, after all, could not endure the service as well. It was found that those who came from the cities, and had more mind, more brain-power, and had been brought up in wealth and with culture, were more efficient than the opposite class. It was found that educated intelligence was a better preservative than mere muscular strength, and that those who had been brought up in dainty conditions of life adapted themselves more easily to the hardships of the camp than those who came from the poorer ranks of society. It was found that men who had mental resources could bear up under wounds, and would recover, where those who were without such resources were more apt to sicken and die. It is the result of education to make men more enduring, not simply in the midst of favourable circumstance, but everywhere.

It is said that when the French nobility were expelled from France, after the French Revolution, they bore their exile and wanderings more nobly, and were more self-helpful, than the common peasantry, or than men in the lower ranks of life who were also expelled. And when the Hungarian expulsion brought Kossuth and his noble band to this country, no equal number of men ever justified culture more, by adapting themselves to their circumstances, and without complaint or repining meeting the hardships of their changed methods of livelihood. A true education makes a man larger and better, and fits him for revolutions. If one has lived in refinement, and in a changed condition goes down to the bottom, and comes in contact with barrenness and coarseness, that culture which he has acquired sustains him, and makes him superior to his condition.

ELECTION.

1. Its cause and method.

(1776.) Paul considers the chain of our salvation, depending on four links—election, vocation, justification, and glorification (Rom. viii. 30) ; the first whereof hath no beginning, the last no ending. Here is the kindness of a Father, that singles out some special children, to whom He bears the greatest affection, and intends most good ; and in this consists election. In good time He declares His affection, and makes His love manifest to them ; there is vocation. Then He conforms them to His own image, gives them a place in court, the honour of children, the earnest of His Spirit, in token of assurance ; there is justification. Lastly, He bids them enter into their Father's joy, makes them co-heirs with His eldest Son in the possession of bliss ; there is glorification. God hath chosen us before the world, created us with the world, called us from the world, justified us in the world, and He will save us in the world to come. He that chose us when we were not, and called us when we were naught, and hath justified us being sinners, will glorify us being saints. The Husbandman of heaven chooseth out a plot of ground at His own pleasure ; there is election : He sows this with the immortal seed, by His word ; there is vocation : He waters it with the dew of Hermon, the graces of His Spirit ; there is sanctification : when it is ripe He reaps it from the earth, and carries it into the barn of heaven ; there is salvation.

—Adams, 1654.

(1777.) In election we behold God the Father in choosing ; in vocation, God the Son teaching ; in justification, God the Holy Ghost sealing ; in salvation, the whole Deity crowning. God chooseth of His love ; Christ calleth by His Word ; the Spirit sealeth by His grace : now the fruit of all this, of God's love choosing, of Christ's Word calling, of the Spirit's grace sanctifying, is our eternal glory and blessedness in heaven. In election God bestows on us His love ; in calling He grants the blessing of His Word ; in justifying He communicates to us the sweetness of His Spirit ; in glorifying He doth wholly give us Himself. We see far with our body's eye, sense ; further with the mind's eye, reason ; furthest with the soul's eye, faith. The rational eye doth not so far exceed the sensual, as the spiritual exceeds the rational. Calling illuminates the mind with knowledge ; sanctifying seals up the heart with spiritual comfort ; salvation crowns all, even the soul with immortal bliss. This gradation of assurance is sweetly contracted by St. Paul ; " Whom He did predestinate, them He also called : whom He called, them He also justified : and whom He justified, them He also glorified." Wherein the fathers have found the four causes of our salvation. In predestinating, the efficient cause, which is God's love. In calling, the material cause, which is Christ's death, delivered in His Word that doth call us. In justifying there is the formal cause, a lively faith. In glorifying there is the final cause, that is, everlasting life. Paradise had four rivers that watered the earth : these four springs come from the Eden of heaven and run through the earth ; and howsoever neglected by many, they make glad the city of God. So Bernard sweetly : Eternal life is granted to us in election, promised in our vocation, sealed in our justification, possessed in our glorification. Conclude, then, faithfully to thy own soul, I believe, therefore I am justified ; I am justified, therefore I am sanctified ; I am sanctified, therefore I am called ; I am called, therefore I am elected ; I am elected, therefore I shall be saved. Oh ! settled comfort of joy, which ten thousand devils shall never make void !

—Adams, 1654.

(1778.) Inward holiness and eternal glory are the crown with which God adorns and dignifies His elect. But they are not the cause of election. A king is not made a king by the royal robes he wears, and by the crown that encircles his brow; but he therefore wears his robes, and puts on his crown, because he is a king.

—Saller.

2. Its design.

(1779.) What was God driving at in His electing some out of the lump of mankind? Was it only their impunity He desired, that while others were left to swim in torment and misery, they should only be exempted from that infelicity? No, sure; the Apostle will tell us more. "He hath chosen us in Him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy." Mark, not because He foresaw that they would be of themselves holy, but that they should be holy; this was that God resolved He would make them to be. As if some curious workman, seeing a forest growing upon his own ground of trees (all alike, not one better than another), should mark some above all the rest, and set them apart in his thoughts, as resolving to make some rare pieces of workmanship of them. Thus God chose some out of the lump of mankind, whom He set apart for this purpose, to carve His own image upon them, which consists in righteousness and true holiness; a piece of such rare workmanship which, when God hath finished, and shall show it to men and angels, will appear to exceed the fabric of heaven and earth itself.
—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

3. Furnishes no argument for continuance in sin.

(1780.) A temptation which Satan suggests into the minds of carnal men, God's decree of predestination is unchangeable as Himself; and, therefore, if thou art elected of God, thou mayest go on in thy sins, yet surely thou shalt be saved, and He will give thee repentance, though it be deferred to the last gasp. But if thou be rejected of God in His eternal counsel, then take what pains thou wilt, all is in vain, for those whom He has reprobated shall be condemned. And therefore much better were it to take thy pleasure whilst thou art in this life, for the punishments of the life to come will be enough, though thou addest no torments of this life unto them.

But if we consider of this temptation aright, and sound it to the bottom, we shall find, first, that it is most foolish and ridiculous; secondly, that it is most false and impious.

That it is most foolish will easily appear if we use the like manner of reason in worldly matters. For it is all one as if a man should thus say: Thy time is appointed, and the Lord in His counsel has set down how long thou shalt live. If, therefore, it be ordained that thy time shall be short, use what means thou wilt of physic and good diet, yet thou shalt not prolong it one day. But if God has decreed that thou shalt live till old age, take what courses thou wilt, run into all desperate dangers, use surfeiting and all disorder of diet, nay, eat no meat at all, and yet thou shalt live till thou art an old man.

Or, as if he should say: God has decreed already whether thou shalt be rich or poor. And if He has appointed thee to be poor, take never so much pains, follow thy calling as diligently as thou wilt, abstain from all wastefulness and prodigality, yet thou shalt never get any wealth. But if thou art pre-ordained to be rich, sell all that thou hast, and scatter it abroad in the streets, spend thy time in gaming, drinking, and whoring, never troubling thy head with care, nor thy hands with work, yet thou shalt be a wealthy man.

Now, who would not laugh at such absurd manner of reasoning, if any should use it? Because every man knows that as God has decreed the time of our life, so He has decreed also that we should use the means whereby our lives may be preserved so long as He has ordained that we should live, namely, avoiding of dangers, good diet, and physic; and as He has decreed that a man should be rich, so He has decreed also that he should use all good means of attaining unto riches, namely, providence and pains in getting, and care and frugality in keeping that he has gotten; and whosoever use not the means do make it manifest that they were not ordained unto the end. Although, indeed, because the Lord would show His absolute and almighty power, He does not always tie Himself unto means, but sometimes crosses and makes them ineffectual to their ends, and sometimes He effects what He will without or contrary to means; and hence it is that some quickly die who use all means to preserve health, and some become poor who use all means of obtaining riches, whereas others, being deprived of means, attain unto long life and riches by the immediate blessing of God. But ordinarily the means and end go together, and therefore it is fond presumption to hope without the use of means to attain unto the end. And thus it is also in spiritual matters appertaining to everlasting life. They whom God has elected He has also ordained, that they should attain unto and use all good means tending thereunto—namely, faith, repentance, sanctification, and newness of life.

But as this temptation is foolish, so also it is false; for whereas He says that though we live in our sins without repentance, yet we may be elected and therefore saved, and though we take never so great pains in God's service, and most carefully endeavour to spend our lives in holiness and righteousness, yet we may be reprobates, and therefore shall be condemned. This is utterly untrue. For whomsoever the Lord has ordained to everlasting life, those also He has ordained to use the means whereby they may be saved: and consequently whosoever use these means may be assured of their salvation. Whosoever neglect and despise these means they manifestly declare that they are not in the number of the elect, so long as they continue in their neglect and contempt. For the end and the means are inseparably joined in God's decree: so that they who use the one shall obtain the other. Those who neglect and condemn the means shall never attain unto the end.

(1781.) Predestination is pleaded. If I be written to life, I may do this; for many are saved that have done worse. If not, were my life never so strict, hell appointed is not to be avoided. These men look to the top of the ladder, but not to the foot. God ordains not men to jump to heaven, but to climb thither by prescribed degrees. He that decreed the end, decreed also the means that conduce to it. If thou take liberty to sin, this is none of the way. Peter describes the rounds of this ladder: "Faith, virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, charity." Thou runnest a contrary course in the wild paths of unbelief, profaneness, ignorance, riot, impatience, impiety, malice; this is none of the way. These are the rounds or a ladder that goes downward to hell. God's predestination helps many to stand, pusheth none down. Look thou to the way, let God alone with the end. Believe, repent, amend, and thou hast God's promise to be saved.

4. No reason for neglecting God's offers of mercy.

(1782.) We have no ground at first to trouble ourselves about God's election. "Secret things belong to God;" God's revealed will is, "that all that believe in Christ shall not perish." It is my duty, therefore, knowing this, to believe, by doing whereof I put that question, Whether God be mine or no? out of all question; for all that believe in Christ are Christ's, and all that are Christ's are God's. It is not my duty to look to God's secret counsel, but to His open offer, invitation and command, and thereupon to adventure my soul. And this adventure of faith will bring a rich return of faith unto us. In war men will venture their lives, because they think some will escape, and why not they? In traffic beyond the seas many adventure a great estate, because some grow rich by a good return, though many miscarry. The husbandman adventures his seed, though sometimes the year proves so bad that he never sees it more. And shall not we make a spiritual adventure in casting ourselves upon God, when we have so good a warrant as His command, and so good an encouragement as His promise, that He will not fail those that rely on Him?

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(1783.) Suppose a rope cast down into the sea for the relief of shipwrecked men ready to perish, and that the people in the ship or on the shore should cry out unto them to lay hold on the rope, that they may be saved; were it not unseasonable and foolish curiosity for any of those poor distressed creatures, now at the point of death, to dispute whether did the man that cast the rope intend to save me or not, and so, minding that which helpeth not, neglect the means of safety offered?—or as a prince proclaiming a free market of gold, rich garments, precious jewels, and the like to a number of poor men upon a purpose to enrich some few of them, whom of his mere grace he purposeth to make honourable courtiers and great officers of state; were it fitting that all these men should stand to dispute the king's favour, but rather that they should repair to the market, and by that means improve his favour so graciously tendered unto them? Thus it is that Christ holdeth forth, as it were, a rope of mercy to lost sinners, and setteth out an open market of heavenly treasure. It is our parts, then, without any further dispute, to look upon it as a principle afterwards to be made good, that Christ hath gracious thoughts towards us, but for the present to lay hold on the rope, ply the market, and husband well the grace that is offered. And as the condemned man believeth first the king's favour to all humble suppliants before he believe it to himself, so the order is, being humbled for sin, to adhere to the goodness of the promise; not to look to God's intention in a personal way, but to His complacency and tenderness of heart to all repentant sinners. This was St. Paul's method, embracing by all means that good and faithful saying, "Jesus Christ came to save sinners," before he ranked himself in the front of those sinners. —Rutherford, 1661.

(1784.) Your proper business is, instead of prying into the secrets of God, to attend to His discoveries; instead of stumbling at His unknown purposes, to listen to His known and gracious invitation. I bring you to one test of your sincerity, in deriving from the secret purposes of God an excuse for treating these invitations with indifference or rejection, and saying, whether lightly or indignantly, "If I am of the chosen, good and well; and if I am to be damned, I cannot help it." The test is a fair and simple one.

If you have any belief in a superintending Providence, you must be convinced that there are secret purposes of God in regard to temporal things, as well as in regard to spiritual. You shall have full credit for such sincerity whenever I see you applying your principle alike on both sides;—when, in time of sickness, I see you refusing to have recourse to any means of cure till you can ascertain the secret purpose of God whether you are to recover or die;—when, in agriculture I hear you say, "Not a ploughshare shall break up a ridge of my fields, not a handful of seed will I throw away, nor shall a harrow be allowed to pass over it, till I know what is the intention of Providence as to the harvest—whether it be the purpose of God to send a favourable season and allow me a fair return for my toil and expense, or to visit me with a famine and a failure of my hopes;—when, in case of fire in your dwelling, you use no means of escape, make no effort either to quench the flames or to flee from them, but sit still, or lie still, where you chance to be, till you know whether it be the decree of heaven that the fire should reach you, or, reaching, injure you;—when, in one word, I see you give up food itself, refuse all means of sustenance, till you can discover how long the God of your life has purposed that you should live.

You are a passenger, let me suppose, on board a ship at sea. The storm rises and rages. The vessel strikes on a rocky coast. The waves break over her, and she is in danger every moment of going to pieces. Your own life and the lives of all on board are in jeopardy. In the instinct of dread, you shriek out for help. The humane spectators on the beach respond to the cry, and hasten to the rescue. They launch and man the life-boat. And, just as they are pushing off to dash through the foaming breakers, I coolly come up to them and say, "What folly is all this? why this useless ado? how vain this exposure of yourselves to peril! If these men are destined to survive, He who has so ordered it will save them without any aid from you; and if otherwise He has purposed, and has doomed them to a watery grave, what puny power of yours can rescue them from the doom?" Would you, in these circumstances, like the doctrine? would you relish this kind of application of your own principle? Yet the cases are parallel. If you would not relish it then, be assured you are deceiving yourselves, or you are hypocritically deceiving others, in applying it as you do now. If you were as much in earnest about your eternal as about your temporal interests—about the life of your souls as about the life of your bodies: if you felt your danger in the one case as you feel it in the other, and were as anxious for safety; Divine purposes would not give you another moment's thought;—you would listen at once to Divine entreaties and flee to the refuge.

I have said that the cases are parallel. There is one point, however, in which the parallelism fails; and that point is all against you. In regard to your present or temporal life, you have no assurance given you that by eating of the "meat that perisheth" it will actually be prolonged,—that a single day or hour will be added to it. Notwithstanding this ignorance, you eat. You eat from the mere knowledge of the necessity and the tendency, although entirely unassured of the actual effect. But in the case to which you are applying your principle, it is otherwise; and it is the only case in which it is so. With regard to the "bread of life,"—the "true bread,"—the "bread from heaven," that giveth life unto the world," you have the positive Divine assurance, that "whosoever eateth of this bread shall live for ever." How strange, then, the infatuation! You eat with avidity "the meat that perisheth," when you have no more than a peradventure that the frail life which it is meant to sustain shall continue for an hour; and yet you refuse the "living bread," although you have the assurance of Him who cannot lie, that none who eat of it can ever be "hurt of the second death," and that, if you eat of it, the eternal life of your soul is secure. You eat for the sake of the one life, on the ground of a probability; you refuse to eat for the sake of the other on the ground of a certainty! In the peril of a shipwreck, even the life-boat may fail you; but to the perishing sinner, who feels his danger, and who calls to Him for succour, Christ is a refuge that never fails. None ever applied to Him in vain; and none whose soul's salvation He undertakes can ever perish! If you do perish, then the blame rests with yourselves. You perish by an act of self-destruction. It is by no influence of any secret decree of heaven that you are lost;—it is the result of your own free and unconstrained choice. God offers you life, and you choose death;—He offers you holiness, and you choose sin;—He offers you His blessing, and you choose His curse;—He offers you Himself, and you choose the world;—He offers you heaven, and you choose hell!

§. Does not discharge us from the obligation to use the appointed means.

(1785.) Ludovicus, who was a learned man of Italy, yet wanting the guidance of God's Spirit, and so never considering advisedly of the means of His salvation, grew at last to this resolution: "Si salvabor, salvabor," &c.—"It is no matter what I do or how I live, for if I be saved I am saved; if I be predestinated to life I am sure of salvation; if otherwise, I cannot help it." Thus bewitched with this desperate opinion, he continued a long time, till at length he grew very dangerously sick, whereupon he sent for a skilful physician, and earnestly requested his help. The physician, beforehand made acquainted with his former lewd assertion, how he would usually say, "If I am saved I am saved," directed his speech to the same purpose, and said, "Surely it will be altogether needless to use any means for your recovery, neither do I purpose to administer anything unto you; for if the time of your death be now come, it is impossible to avoid it." Ludovicus, musing in his bed of the matter, and taking the physician's speech into serious consideration, makes out this conclusion to himself:—That if means were to be used for the health of the body, then much more had God also ordained means for the salvation of men's souls. And so, upon further conference (with shame and grief), he recanted his former opinion, took physic, and was happily cured both of soul and body together. Thus it is that the determinate counsel of God, in the matter of predestination, doth not take away the nature and property of secondary causes, nor exclude the means of salvation, but rather sets them in order and disposes of them to their proper end. And common sense and reason teach that in every action the end and the means of the end must go together. —Muxey, 1658.

(1786.) When you are dangerously sick, and the physician tells you unless you take such a course of physic, your case is desperate, do you use to reason thus: If I knew that God had decreed my recovery, I would take that course that is so like to restore me; but till I know that God has decreed my recovery I'll take nothing? Surely we should think such a reasoner not only sick, but distracted. Thus it is here. The sinner is ready to perish; apply thyself to Christ, says the Lord, cast thyself on Him, apply the promise; there is no other way to save thy life. Oh, says he, if I knew the Lord had decreed my salvation, I would venture on Christ; but till I know this, I must not believe. Oh, the unreasonableness of unbelief! This is as if an Israelite, stung with the fiery serpent, should have said, If I knew that the Lord had decreed my cure, I would look upon the brazen serpent; but till I know this, though there be no other way to save my life, I will not look on it. If all the stung Israelites had been thus resolved, it is likely they had all perished.

Or, as if one pursued by the avenger of blood, should have set him down in the way to the city of refuge, when he should have been flying for his life, and said, If I knew that the Lord had decreed my escape, I would make haste for refuge; but till I know this, I will not stir, till I die for it. Would not this be counted a wilful casting away his life, with a neglect of that provision which God had made to save it? Was it not sufficient that a way was made for his escape, and a way feasible enough, the city of refuge always open? Even so are the arms of Christ always open to receive a perishing sinner fleeing to Him for refuge. And wilt thou destroy thyself by suffering Satan to entangle thee with a needless, impertinent, and unreasonable scruple? If there be no way but one, and any encouraging probability to draw men into it, they fly into it without delay, never perplexing themselves with the decrees and secrets of God. This is thy case, Christ is thy way; there is no way but this one, fly to it as for thy life; and let not Satan hinder thee, by diverting thee to impossibilities and impertinencies. —Clarkson, 1621-1686.

(1787.) Heaven is not the purchase or reward of your striving. No soul shall boastingly say there, Is not this the glory which my duties and diligence purchased for me? And yet, on the other side, it is as true, that without striving you shall never set foot there. Say not, it depends on the pleasure of God, and not upon your diligence; for it is His declared will and pleasure to bring men to glory in the way, though not for the sake, of their own striving. As in the works of your civil calling, you know all the care, toil, and sweat of the husbandman avails nothing of itself, except the sun and rain quicken and ripen the fruits of the earth; and yet no wise man will neglect ploughing and harrowing, sowing and reaping, because these labours avail not without the influence of heaven, but waits for them in the way of his duty and diligence. Rational hope sets all the world to work. Do they plough in hope, and sow in hope, and will you not pray in hope, and hear in hope? —Flavel, 1630-1691.

(1788.) If you will needs be fools, let it be about these worldly things which you may better spare. Try your own opinion awhile, and give over eating and drinking and working; but do not be fool yourselves about the one thing necessary, and play not the madmen about the flames of hell, and do not in such jest throw away your salvation. It were a hundred times a wiser course for a man to set his house on fire, and say, "If God have decreed the saving of it, the fire shall not burn it; if he have not, it will perish whatsoever I do." I tell you again, God hath not ordinarily decreed the end without the means; and if you will neglect the means of salvation, it is a certain mark that God hath not decreed you to salvation. But you shall find that He hath left you no excuse, because He hath not thus predestinated you.

(1789.) I used to think that the doctrine of election was a reason why we need not pray, and I fear there are many who split upon this rock, who think it is to no purpose to pray, as things will be as they will be. But I now see that the doctrine of election is the greatest encouragement instead of a discouragement to prayer. He that decreed that any one should be finally saved, decreed that it should be in the way of prayer; as much as He that has decreed what we shall possess of the things of this life, has decreed that it shall be in the way of industry; and as we never think of being idle in common business, because God has decreed what we shall possess of this world's good, so neither should we be slothful in the business of our souls, because our final state is decreed.

—Andrew Fuller, 1754-1815.

(1790.) All events are equally sure and fixed of God, equally foreknown by Him; but this consideration does not repress our energies in other pursuits of a merely secular kind; why then should we suffer it to impede us in the search after salvation? Here is a house on fire, and the devouring element is rapidly enveloping the whole edifice and endangering the lives of its inmates. Now, God knows infallibly, and hath fixed beforehand, how much of the property will be destroyed, and how much will be spared, which of the inmates shall escape, and which will perish in the conflagration. But who, on this account, makes one effort less for the rescue of either goods or lives?

When Paul was shipwrecked off Melita, he told the whole crew that not a hair of their heads should perish; but it was by each one being commanded to make his way to the shore when the vessel went to pieces. Some swam, and some on boards and some on broken pieces of the ship did what they could for themselves. "And so it came to pass, that they all escaped safe to land."

—T. G. Horton.

(1791.) You have practically nothing to do with the Divine foreknowledge, or with God's predestinating decree. Your conduct should be just the same as if He knew nothing of the future, and whether you would at last be lost or saved. It is as if a mighty chain had been let down from heaven to earth, the extremities of which were hidden from us, while only the central links were visible to our gaze, or within the reach of our grasp. One end of that chain is concealed far away in the past, and the other lies equally remote in the future, but both, though alike hidden in darkness inscrutable, are alike firmly riveted to the throne of the Almighty. We cannot trace the links of this seemingly interminable progression either far forward or far backward. What then are we to do? Shall we waste our time in petulant complaints, because our knowledge is so limited? Shall we fold our hands in listless or in scornful apathy, because we may err in our conjectures concerning the past or future? No, let our course be that which alone wisdom dictates: let us lay hold on the links that are close at hand. Let us do the work which immediately demands our care. Let us repent and believe the gospel. And then we may know that as God is true, and His purpose unchangeable, we are in the high road to glory. —T. G. Horton.

Foreordination! that is a shameful sham. God's time is "now." He never has any other time. Foreordination is nothing for you to meddle with, any more in religious than in money-making matters. In each it is in equal force, but 'tis God's business, not yours. If you will meddle with it, you deserve to get befogged and puzzled, though there's nothing against, but everything for, you in it. But let it alone if it troubles you.

What farmer when the sun runs high, and the earth is ready for the seed, and the small rain and the dew are coming on the earth, says: "I believe in foreordination; I shall not take the trouble to plant. If I'm to have a harvest, I shall have one"? Or what merchant when he goes to his store in the morning, says: "If I'm to have a good large heap of money in my till to-night, I shall have it there. No need for me to trouble myself to please customers; I believe in foreordination"?

Men are not fools enough for this in temporal concerns, though plenty of them are so in regard to the interests of their immortal souls. No, when they see God working for them in nature, they take hold, with a right good will, and work too. And, as a general thing, they gain the blessing for which they strive. In other words, they do, in these minor matters, "work with God," to will and to do of His own good pleasure; but when it comes to spiritual work, they hold quickly back, and exclaim: "Oh! foreordination!" But this will be no plea for them, when they come forth from their graves, and when, from mountain and valley, and from the dark waves of the sea, they lift up their blanched faces to their Judge. Of all the myriads who will stand before Him, there will not be one who will have a word to say—they will be "speechless."

—Beecher.

6. Speculations concerning it are unwise and perilous.

(1793.) To inquire the way and manner by which God makes a few do acceptable works, or how out of a corrupt lump He selects and purifies a few, is but a stumbling-block and a temptation. Who asks a charitable man that gave him an alms where he got it, or why he gave it? Will any favourite, whom his prince only for his appliableness to him, or some half virtue, or his own glory, burdens with honour and fortunes every day, and destines to future offices and dignities, dispute or expostulate with his prince why he rather chose not another; how he will restore his coffers, how he will quench his people's murmuring, by whom this liberality is fed: or his nobility, with whom he equals new men; and will not rather repose himself gratefully in the wisdom, greatness, and bounty of his master? Will a languishing, desperate patient, that hath scarcely time enough to swallow the potion, examine the physician how he procured those ingredients, how that soil nourished them, which humour they affect in the body, whether they work by excess of quality, or specifically; whether he have prepared them by correcting, or else by withdrawing, their malignity, and for such unnecessary scruples neglect his health? Alas! our time is little enough for prayer, and praise, and society, which is for our mutual duties.

Moral divinity becomes us all, but natural divinity and metaphysic divinity almost all may spare. Almost all the ruptures in the Christian Church have been occasioned by such bold disputations de modo.
—Donne, 1573-1631.

(1794.) If a child of eight or ten years old, hearing a philosopher discourse of the greatness and course of the sun, should argue against him, and maintain that the same were no greater than a platter, neither of any swifter pace than a snail, the philosopher would not stand upon the delivery of the reason of his discourse unto him, because the child could not be capable to conceive it, but he would tell him, "Thou art yet a child:" even so is man, in comparison of God, infinitely less in knowledge than is a child in comparison of the most excellent philosopher in the world, and therefore he ought not to reason, strive, or dispute with God, why He either electeth some to salvation or reprobate others to damnation.
—Candray, 1609.

(1795.) Whatever the decrees of God be concerning the eternal state of men, since they are secret to us, they can certainly be no rule either of our duty or comfort. And no man hath reason to think himself rejected of God, either from eternity or in time, that does not find the marks of reprobation in himself. I mean an evil heart and life. By this indeed a man may know that he is out of God's favour for the present; but he hath no reason at all, from hence, to conclude that God hath from all eternity and for ever cast him off. That God calls him to repentance, and affords to him the space and means of it, is a much plainer sign that God is willing and ready to have mercy on him than anything else is, or can be, that God hath utterly cast him off. And therefore for men to judge of their condition by the decrees of God which are hid from us, and not by His Word which is near us and in our hearts, is as if a man wandering in the wide sea in a dark night, when the heaven is all clouded about, should yet resolve to steer his course by the stars which he cannot see, but only guess at, and neglect the compass which is at hand and would afford him a much better and more certain direction.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(1796.) Many men are swamped in the doctrines of election and predestination, but this is supreme impertinence. They are truths which belong to God, and if you are troubled by them, it is because you are meddling with what does not belong to you. You only need to understand that all God's agencies are to assist you in gaining your salvation, if you will but use them rightly. To doubt this is as if men in a boat, pulling against the tide, and with all their efforts going backwards every hour, should by and by find the current turning, and see the wind springing up with it and filling the sails, and hear the man at the helm exclaim, "Row away, boys! wind and tide are in your favour," and they should all say, "What shall we do with the oars? Do not the wind and the tide take away our free agency?"

—Becher.

(1797.) I don't blame a man for not understanding the mysteries of God any more than I should blame one, who was standing in the Atlantic Ocean, for saying, "I can't."

"Can't what?"

"I cannot."

"Cannot what?"

"I've been in ankle deep, and knee deep, and thigh deep; I've been in all over, and it's no use; I never can wade across the Atlantic Ocean."

"Of course you can't—nobody told you to. What did you try for? God never meant to have you do it, or He would have made it more shallow."

Just in this way do men act in regard to doctrines. They go out a little way on election, and back they come shaking their heads and saying, "It's very mysterious; I can't understand it." Then they try free agency, then decrees, &c., but they have no better success with them. Well, what of it? Man, by all his searching, cannot find out God. I am not ashamed to say that I do not understand His mysteries. I believe that what He says is true, if I cannot reconcile it. My own consciousness agrees with the most seemingly contradictory passages concerning free will and sovereignty. I know that I am free, that by my own choice I perform moral acts; that with me lies the power of sinning, or refraining from sin; and yet when I go forth with my most buoyant sense of freedom to think and act, I am conscious of influences, of barriers, which say, "Thus far, and no farther." I feel in my very nature that I am free, and yet that I do not direct my own steps, nor appoint my own bounds. I cannot reconcile this. I know it; and there it must rest.

God does us no violence. He uses us through the very nature which He gave to us, and through our free will. The mulberry leaves are stripped from the tree, and the food which they make for the worm acts upon it according to its own nature. As their nature dictates, the worms spin their cocoons, and sleep in them. Then when the little spinners have been despoiled, the loom is made, and the silk is woven and stamped by the skill of man. Everything has been used, according to its nature, in the construction of the silk. And the web which God is weaving, and the pattern with which He will mark it, will all be done in the same way. The whole plan is in His mind now, and it will result as He intends, but only through the free action of the nature He has given to man. His plan embraced this idea from the very beginning of things, and every contingency is provided for in the eternal mind.
—Becher.

7. How assurance of personal election is to be attained.

(1798.) Some are much troubled because they proceed by a false method and order in judging of their estates. They will begin with election, which is the highest step of the ladder; whereas they should begin from a work of grace wrought within their hearts, from God's calling by His Spirit, and their answer to His call, and so raise themselves upwards to know their election by their answer to God's calling. "Give all diligence," says Peter, "to make your calling and election sure," your election by your calling. God descends unto us from election to calling, and so to sanctification; we must ascend to Him beginning where He ends. Otherwise it is a great folly as in removing of a pile of wood, to begin at the lower first, and so, besides the needless trouble, to be in danger to have the rest to fall upon our heads.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(1799.) We know there is a sun in heaven, yet we cannot see what matter it is made of, but perceive it only by the beams, light, and heat. Election is a sun, the eyes of eagles cannot see it; yet we may find it in the heat of vocation, in the light of illumination, in the beams of good works.

—Adams, 1653.

(1800.) The head of Nilus cannot be found, they say; but many sweet springs issuing from it are well known. The head of our election is too high and secret to be found; yet we may taste the springs, our calling, holiness, justification, and upright life; and he that runs along by the bank of these rivers shall be brought at last to that fountain-head, even the place and book wherein his own name stands written.

—Adams, 1653.

(1801.) Mark in what order: first, our calling; then, our election: not beginning with our election first. It were as bold, as absurd, a presumption in vain men, first to begin at heaven, and from thence to descend to earth. The angels of God upon Jacob's ladder both ascended and descended; but, surely, we must ascend only from earth to heaven; by our calling, arguing our election. If we consider of God's working and proceeding with us, it is one thing: there, He first foreknows us, and predestinates us; then He calls us, and justifies us; then He glorifies us. If we consider the order of our apprehending the state wherein we stand with God—there, we are first called, then justified; and thereby come to be assured of our predestination, and glory. Think not, therefore, to climb up into heaven, and there to read your names in the book of God's eternal decree; and thereupon to build the certainty of your calling, believing, persevering: the course is presumptuously preposterous: but by the truth of your effectual calling and true believing, grow up at last, towards a comfortable assurance of your election; which is the just method of our apostle here, "Make your calling and election sure."

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(1802.) If any man would know whether the sun shineth or not, let him go no further, but look upon the ground to see the reflection of the sunbeams from thence, and not upon the body of the sun, which will but the more dazzle his sight. The pattern is known by the picture, the cause by the effect. Let no man, then, soar aloft to know whether he be elected or not, but let him gather the knowledge of his election from the effectualness of his calling and sanctification of his life, the true and proper effects of a lively faith stamping the image of God's election in his soul. —Negus.

ERROR.

1. Its source.

(1803.) When some men look up to the clouds, they imagine them to have the forms of men, of armies, castles, &c., whereas none else can see any such things, nor is there any true resemblance of such things at all; and some, again, there are who, when they have somewhat of rolls and tumbles in their thoughts, think that the ringing of bells, the beating of hammers, the report that is made by great guns, or any other measured, intermitted noise, doth articulately sound and speak the same which is in their thoughts. Thus it is that a strong imagination or fancy becomes very powerful as to persuasion in the matters of God and religion. Hence it is, therefore, that most of those who are unlearned and unstable wrest the Scriptures, thinking they find that in them which, indeed, is not there to be found; persuading themselves that the Scripture represents to them such formed opinions, such and such grounded tenets, when, without all doubt, they do but patch and lay things together without any reason at all; from whence have proceeded the senseless dotages of heretics, and of late the whimsical conceits of some dreamers, who have flown about in their most ridiculous papers, wherein they bring Scripture with them, but no sense, fancying the holy Word of God to strike, to ring, and chime to their tunes, to echo out unto their wild conceptions, and answer all their undigested notions.

—Torshell, 1649.

2. Is worse than ignorance.

(1804.) It is almost as difficult to make a man unlearn his errors as his knowledge. Malinformation is more hopeless than noninformation; for error is always more busy than ignorance. Ignorance is a blank sheet on which we may write; but error is a scribbled one on which we must first erase. Ignorance is contented to stand still with her back to the truth; but error is more presumptuous, and proceeds in the same direction. Ignorance has no light, but error follows a false one. The consequence is, that error, when she retraces her footsteps, has farther to go before she can arrive at the truth than ignorance.

—Collins.

(1805.) That time and labour are worse than useless that have been occupied in laying up treasures of false knowledge, which it will be one day necessary to unlearn, and in storing up mistaken ideas which we must hereafter remember to forget. Timotheus, an ancient teacher of rhetoric, always demanded a double fee from those pupils who had been instructed by others; for in this case, he had not only to plant in, but also to root out.

—Collins.

3. When it is most dangerous.

(1806.) Error is never so dangerous as when it is the alloy of truth. Pure error would be rejected; but error mixed with truth makes use of the truth as a pioneer for it, and gets introduction where otherwise it would have none. Poison is never so dangerous as when mixed up with food; error is never so likely to do mischief as when it comes to us under the pretensions and patronage of that which is true.

—Cumming.

(1807.) Error is sometimes so nearly allied to truth, that it blends with it as imperceptibly as the colours of the rainbow fade into each other.

—W. B. Chulow.

4. How it gains a footing in the world.

(1808.) In every religious error which has gained a footing in the world there is some mixture of truth. Absolute error, falsehood with no mixture of truth, would contradict men's sense of what is just and right too violently; it would not be sufficiently plausible, its leaden weight of absurdity would sink it. There must be some fragment of truth attached, in order to make it float; and in nothing has the craft of Satan and of his agents been more conspicuous than in the sagacity with which they mix a maximum of falsehood with a minimum of truth.

5. How it is diffused.

(1809.) As in dark nights pirates used to kindle fires and make great lights upon the rocks and maritime coasts, whither when the seamen steer in hope of harbour, they meet with wreck and ruin: so heretics flourish with Scripture, or at least with some flashes of it, like false lights; to which when distressed souls repair for succour, these pestilent seducers feed them with nothing but pernicious error.

—Origen.

(1810.) That opinion is justly to be suspected for erroneous which comes in at the postern-door of the affections, and not openly and fairly at the right gate of an enlightened and well-satisfied judgment. It is a thief that comes in at the back-door, at least strongly to be suspected for one. Truth courts the mistress, makes its first and fairest addresses to the understanding. Error bribes the handmaid, and labours first to win the affections, that by their influence it may corrupt the judgment.

—Flavel, 1630-1691.

(1811.) Hasty engagements in weighty and disputable matters have cost many souls dear. As hasty marriages have produced long and late repentance; so has the clapping up of a hasty match betwixt the mind and error. By entertaining of strange persons, men sometimes entertain angels unawares; but by entertaining of strange doctrines, many have entertained devils unawares. It is not safe to open the door of the soul to let in strangers in the night; let them wait till a clear daylight of information show you what they are.

—Flavel, 1630-1691.

(1812.) Error is of a spreading nature; it is compared to leaven, because it sours (Matt. xvi. 11), and to a gangrene, because it spreads (2 Tim. ii. 17). 1. One error spreads into more, like a circle in the water that multiplies into more circles; one error seldom goes alone. 2. Error spreads from one person to another; it is like the plague, which infects all round about. Satan, by infecting one person with error, infects more; the error of Pelagius did spread on a sudden to Palestine, Africa, and Italy; the Arian error was at first but a single spark, but at last it set almost all the world on fire.

—Watson.

(1813.) The progress of error, like that of sin, is from small beginnings to awful and unthought of consequences. Gospel truth, like a bank opposed to a torrent, must be preserved entire to be useful; if a breach is once made, though it may seem at first to be small, none but He who says to the sea, "Hitherto shalt thou come, but no farther," can set bounds to the threatening inundation that will quickly follow.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

6. The sinfulness of diffusing it.

(1814.) As he is a traitor to his prince who taketh upon him to coin moneys out of a base metal—yea, although in the stamp he putteth forth show the image of the prince—so he that shall broach any doctrine that cometh not from God, whatsoever he say for it, or what gloss soever he set on it, is a traitor unto God; yea, in truth, a cursed traitor, though he were an angel from heaven.

—Abbot, 1562-1635.

7. Our liability to it.

(1815.) Rays of light, whether they proceed from sun, star, or candle, move in perfectly straight lines: yet so inferior are our works to God's, that the steadiest hand cannot draw a perfectly straight line, nor with all his skill has man ever been able to invent an instrument capable of doing a thing apparently so simple. And it would seem to be as impossible for men to keep the even line of truth between what appear conflicting doctrines: such as the decrees of God and our free will; such as election by grace and the universal offer of the gospel; such as the justifying faith of Paul and the justifying works of James.

—Guthrie.

(1816.) The noblest spirits are most sensible of the possibility of error, and the weakest do most hardly lay down an error.

—Whitchole, 1610-1683.

8. Who are perverted by it.

(1817.) As the wind doth not carry away the sound wheat, but only the light chaff; neither doth a storm overturn a tree fast rooted: even so no more doth every wind of doctrine carry away true members of the Church, but the chaff and rotten members only, as heretics, ignorant persons, hypocrites, fantastical heads, newangled men, &c.

—Cowdrey, 1609.

(1818.) If we flinch never so little from God, presently error catcheth us; as chickens that will stray from the wings of the hen are in danger of the kite.

—Adams, 1653.

9. The evil of persistence in it.

(1819.) The cynic answered smartly, who, coming out of a brothel, was asked whether he was not ashamed to be seen coming out of such a bad house; "No," said he, "the shame was to go in, but honesty to come out." Oh sirs, it is bad enough to fall into an error, but worse to persist in it. The first shows thee a man, humanum est errare, but the last makes thee like a devil, that will not repent.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

10. How it is to be overthrown.

(1820.) My principal method for defeating heresy is by establishing truth. One proposes to fill a bushel with tares; now if I can fill it first with wheat, I shall defy his attempts.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(1821.) These are questions which having been again and again settled, still from time to time present themselves for re-solution; errors which having been refuted, and cut up by the roots, reappear in the next century as fresh and vigorous as ever.

Like the fabled monsters of old, from whose dis-severed neck the blood sprang forth and formed fresh heads, multiplied and indestructible; or like the weeds, which, extirpated in one place, sprout forth vigorously in another.

In every such case it may be taken for granted that the root of the matter has not been reached; the error has been exposed, but the truth which lay at the bottom of the error has not been disengaged. Every error is connected with a truth; the truth being perennial, springs up again, as often as circumstances foster it, or call for it; and the seeds of error which lay about the roots spring up again in the form of weeds, as before.

A popular illustration of this may be found in the belief in the appearance of the spirits of the departed. You may examine the evidence for every such alleged apparition; you may demonstrate the improbability; you may reduce it to an impossibility; still the popular feeling will remain; and there is a lurking superstition even among the enlightened, which in the midst of professions of incredulity, shows itself in a readiness to believe the wildest new tale if it possess but the semblance of authentication. Now two truths lie at the root of this superstition. The first is the reality of the spirit-world, and the instinctive belief in it. The second is the fact that there are certain states of health in which the eye creates the objects which it perceives. The death blow to such superstition is only struck when we have not only proved that men have been deceived, but shown besides how they came to be deceived; when science has explained the optical delusion, and shown the physiological state in which such apparitions become visible. Ridicule will not do it. Disproof will not do it. So long as men feel that there is a spirit-world, and so long as to some the impression is vivid that they have seen it, you spend your rhetoric in vain. You must show the truth that lies below the error.

The principle we gain from this is that you cannot overthrow falsehood by negation, but by establishing the antagonistic truth. The refutation which is to last must be positive, not negative. It is an endless work to be uprooting weeds; plant the ground with wholesome vegetation, and then the juices which would have otherwise fed rankness, will pour themselves into a more vigorous growth; the dwindled weeds will be easily raked out then. It is an endless task to be refuting error! Plant truth, and the error will pine away.

11. Error, schism, and heresy.

(1822.) As natural, so politic bodies have cutem or cuticulam. The little thin skin which covers all our body may be broken without pain or danger, and may reunite itself, because it consists not of the chief and principial parts. But if in the skin itself there be any solution or division, which is seldom without drawing of blood, no art nor good disposition of nature can ever bring the parts together again, and restore the same substance, though it seems to the eye to have soldered itself. It will ever seem so much as a deforming scar, but is in truth a breach. Outward worship is this cuticula: and integrity of faith the skin itself. And if the first be touched with anything too corrosive, it will quickly pierce the other; and so schism (which is a departure from obedience) will quickly become heresy (which is a wilful deflection from the way of faith), which is not yet, so long as the main skin is inviolate.

—Donne, 1573-1631.

(1823.) There is difference betwixt error, schism, and heresy. Error is when one holds a wrong opinion alone; schism, when many consent in their opinion; heresy runs further, and contends to root out the truth. Error offends, but separates not; schism offends and separates; heresy offends, separates, and rageth, making the party good vi et armis, if not with arguments of reason, yet with arguments of steel and iron. Error is weak, schism strong, heresy obstinate. Error goes out, and often comes in again; schism comes not in, but makes a new church; heresy makes not a new church, but no church. Error untiles the house, schism pulls down the walls, but heresy overturns the foundation. Error is as a child, schism a wild stripling, heresy an old dotard. Error will hear reason, schism will wrangle against it, heresy will defy it. Error is a member blistered, schism a member festered, heresy a member cut off. He that returns quickly from error, is not a schismatic; he that returns from schism, is not a heretic. Error is reprov'd and pitied, schism is reprov'd and punished, heresy is reprov'd and excommunicated. Schism is in the same faith, heresy makes another faith. Though they may be thus distinguished, yet without God's preventing grace, one will run into another; error will prove a schism, and schismatical follies will prove stigmatical furies.

—Adams, 1653.

12. How it is to be distinguished from truth.

(1824.) Reader, try the spirits. Error is often plausible, and the most ensnaring errors are those which are an obvious resemblance to truth. Even though the outside coating is not brass but real gold, the leaden coin is none the less a counterfeit; and, like the devil's temptation, wrapped up in a Scripture saying, many false doctrines come now-a-days with a sacred or spiritual glamour round them—quoting texts and uttering Bible phrases. But the question is not, Who has got a text on his side? but, Who has got the Bible?—not, Who can produce certain sentences torn from their connection, and rest of the purport which that connection gives them? but, looking at Scripture in its integrity—having regard to its general drift, as well as to the bearing of these special passages—who is it that makes the fairest appeal to the statute book of heaven?

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

13. Is not to be tolerated.

(1825.) The candour which regards all sentiments alike, and considers no errors as destructive, is no virtue. It is the offspring of ignorance, of insensibility, and of cold indifference. The blind do not perceive the difference of colours. The dead never dispute. Ice, as it congeals, aggregates all bodies within its reach, however heterogeneous their quality. Every virtue has certain bounds, and when it exceeds them it becomes a vice; for the last step of a virtue and the first step of a vice are contiguous.

14. The duty of public teachers in regard to it.

(1826.) In all churches there are men whom moral cowardice, or mistaken conceptions of duty, hinder from taking part in the settlement of great questions; and who gladly leave to others the responsibility of maintaining the truth. They are not unfaithful to their convictions, but they are unfaithful to the truth, concerning their duty to which their convictions are mistaken. Nobly absorbed, perhaps, in spiritual work—in preaching, in pastoral duties, in various efforts to save men's souls—they refuse both to examine their own ecclesiastical position and to defend the theological truths upon which the spiritual power of all churches must depend. They fear, perhaps, lest their own loosely formed convictions should be disturbed, or their practical spiritual work be hindered. To every Sanballat who challenges them, they reply, "We are doing a great work, so that we cannot come down;" the wisest of all replies, so long as the enemy remains below in the "plain of Ono;" but what if he has climbed to the very walls of the Holy City? What if he assaults the builder on its scaffold,—what if he is tampering with its watchmen, and raising an insurrection in its streets? To refuse to fight then were a cowardly infidelity to Christ, which even the most pious occupation could not justify. It is as if the harvest-man were to persist in the ingathering of his sheaves, regardless of the enemy who had landed upon his coasts. It may be a duty to sacrifice even a spiritual harvest in order to defend the territory upon which all spiritual harvests are to be produced.

—Henry Allon.

(1827.) When errors are public, they should be publicly met, notwithstanding that by so meeting them a certain extended publicity is given them. What would be thought of a physician who, at a time when a pestilence was raging in a city, should shut himself up in his own house, on the plea that by coming in contact with the smitten and the sound alternately he might spread the plague? Would he not be plainly told, that it was his duty to employ his skill in mitigating the pain of the sufferers, even at the risk of becoming infected himself, or of communicating the infection to others? Would he not be plainly told, that it would be wrong in him to refrain from doing the certain good through fear of a possible evil?

What would be thought of him further, were he to say, "I will not trouble myself; the normal condition of the people is health; if I let it alone, the pestilence will in due time die out of itself?" I think men would call him a driveller and a fool, and bid him bestir himself to shorten the course of the pestilence, and to endeavour to save those who seemed likely to become its victim. Even so I hold that a moral pestilence being widely diffused, I am justified in publicly doing what I can to arrest it. According to my judgment, I should shamefully fail in my duty, were I to sit at ease in my study, and say merely, "Truth will prevail; this is but a nine days' wonder, and will soon be forgotten." Truth will prevail, but what of those who are giving credence to the temporary lie? Should nothing be done to regain them to the truth?

In reasoning as in war, to be forewarned is to be forearmed; and it is better that you should even be made acquainted with these errors by me, than that you should learn them from some enemy of the truth. I hope you will excuse me if I say, that morally men are very like children mentally. You know that you need only put on a mask, however clumsy, and present yourself suddenly to your children, in order to frighten them. And you know, too, that it would be quite in vain for you to put on the mask, if you had previously shown it to them, and permitted them to handle it beforehand. So, too, when an errorist suddenly presents himself with his fallacies before the people, they are frightened out of their wits; it is all over, they think, with our preconceived ideas; their fathers were fools, and now they are going to be made wiser than them all. But if his fallacies have been explained to them beforehand, if they have been shown the other side of the mask, when the errorist appears before them he is greeted with deserved derision.

—R. A. Bertram.

15. Ultimately advances the truth.

(1828.) God suffers desperate opinions to be vented for the purging of His own truth. The truth of God is compared to silver. "The words of the Lord are pure, yea, as silver tried in a furnace of earth, purified seven times." Every corrupt opinion that comes to be vented against any truth of God is a new furnace; and the truth being cast into that furnace, it comes out the purer for it. "Purified seven times."

As it is with passengers of quality and note, were it not for some evil inveterate curs in the street, they might pass, and never be observed; the very barking of the dogs makes them to be noted.

—Arrowsmith, 1602-1659.

EVIL THOUGHTS.

1. Their sinfulness.

(1829.) Some please themselves in the thoughts of sinful sports, or cheats, or unclean acts, and sit brooding on such cockatrice-eggs with great delight. It is their meat and drink to roll these sugar-plums under their tongues. Though they cannot sin outwardly, for want of strength of body or a fit opportunity, yet they act sin inwardly with great love and complacency. As players in a comedy, they act their parts in private, in order to a more exact performance of them in public.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(1830.) A malicious thought and a malicious deed are from the same spring, and have the same nature; only the deed is the riper serpent, and can sting another; when the thought is as the young serpent, that hath only the venomous nature in itself. A lustful thought is from the same defiled puddle, as actual filthiness: and the thought is but the passage to the action: it is but the same sin in its minority, tending to maturity.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1831.) By sinful thoughts our formerly committed sins that were dead are revived again, and have a resurrection by our bosom ones; by our contemplating the same with delight. As the witch of Endor called up Samuel that was dead; so a delightful thought calls up a sinful action that was dead before. Hereby our sins, that were in a manner dead before, are revived, and have a resurrection.

—Ralph Erskine, 1685-1712.

2. Usually indicate character.

(1832.) Our thoughts are like the blossoms on a tree in the spring. You may see a tree in the spring all covered with blossoms, so that nothing else of it appears. Multitudes of them fall off and come to nothing. Ofttimes where there are most blossoms there is least fruit. But yet there is no fruit, be it of what sort it will, good or bad, but it comes in and from some of those blossoms. The mind of man is covered with thoughts, as a tree with blossoms. Most of them fall off, vanish, and come to nothing, end in vanity; and sometimes where the mind does most abound with them there is the least fruit, the sap of the mind is wasted and consumed in them. Howbeit there is no fruit which actually we bring forth, be it good or bad, but it proceeds from some of these thoughts. Wherefore, ordinarily, these give the best and surest measure of the frame of men's minds. "As a man thinks in his heart so is he." In case of strong and violent temptations, the real frame of a man's heart is not to be judged by the multiplicity of thoughts about any object, for whether they are from Satan's suggestions, or from inward darkness, trouble, and horror, they will impose such a continual sense of themselves on the mind as shall engage all its thoughts about them; as when a man is in a storm at sea, the current of his thoughts run quite another way than when he is in safety about his occasions. But ordinarily voluntary thoughts are the best measure and indication of the frame of our minds. As the nature of the soil is judged by the grass which it brings forth, so may the disposition of the heart by the predominancy of voluntary thoughts; they are the original acting of the soul, the way whereby the heart puts forth and empties the treasure that is in it, the waters that first rise and flow from that fountain.

—Owen, 1616-1683.

3. But often are interjected by Satan.

(1833.) Some thoughts be the darts of Satan; and these non nocent, si non placent. We cannot keep thieves from looking in at our windows, but we need not give them entertainment with open doors. "Wash thy heart from iniquity, that thou mayest be saved: how long shall thy vain thoughts lodge within thee?" They may be passengers, but they must not be sojourners.

—Adams, 1653.

(1834.) Satan silyly conveys evil thoughts, and then makes a Christian believe they come from his own heart. The cup was found in Benjamin's sack, but it was of Joseph's putting in; so a child of God oft finds atheistical, blasphemous thoughts in his mind, but Satan hath cast them in.

—Watson, 1696.

4. Are not as guilty as evil actions.

(1835.) It is a great mistake to say that sin in the heart is the very same as sin thrown into a deliberate and daring act. They are in the same line as our Lord has taught us, but the external act gives evil a power which it had not before, and which may prove fatally destructive. It is like a combustible material, which, if once exploded, may leave the man's nature a shattered and hopeless wreck. To repress sin from the actual life is something,—only let it not stop there, else it is a constant deception and danger.

—Ker.

5. Yet they are most powerful and disastrous in their influence.

(1836.) Indifferent looking, equal and easy conversation, appliableness to wanton discourses, and notions, and motions, are the devil's single money, and many pieces of these make up an adultery. As light a thing as a spangle is, a spangle is silver; and leaf-gold, that is blown away, is gold; and sand that has no strength, no coherence, yet knits the building. So do approaches to sin become sin, and fixed sin.

—Donne, 1573-1631.

(1837.) Set thy thoughts, examine thy thoughts: thy conscience must not only extend to deeds and words, but even to secret thoughts. They that are accustomed to evil thoughts can seldom bring forth good words, never good deeds. As the corn is, so will the flour be: if the meal be bad, the fault is not in the millstones that ground it, but in the miller that put in such base corn. All thy senses and members are but the millstones; the heart is the miller: if thy words and works be ill meal, thank the miller, thy heart, for such corrupt thoughts. As the wood is, so will the fire be: if it be wet and stinking wood, look for an unsavoury and unwholesome fire: if the wood be sweet and dry, it will perfume the room with a sweet and pleasant air. Such fuel as you lay on your thoughts; such fire shall you have in your actions.

—Adams, 1653.

(1838.) My works will be answerable to my thoughts; if my thoughts be wicked or fruitless, so will my actions be. My thoughts are the seed that lies in the ground out of sight; my works are the crop which is visible to others; according to the seed, whether good or bad, such will the crop be. If men are so careful to get the purest, the cleanest, and the best seed for their fields, that their harvest may be the more to their advantage; how much it concerns me that my heart be sown with pure and holy thoughts, that my crop may tend both to my credit and comfort! Lord, there is no good seed but what comes out of Thy garner. I confess, the piercing thorns of vicious thoughts, and the fruitless weeds of vain thoughts, are all the natural produce of my heart. Oh, let Thy good Spirit plough up the fallow ground of my soul, and scatter in it such seeds of grace and holiness, that my life may be answerable to Thy Gospel, and at my death I may be translated to Thy glory!

—Swinnock, 1673.

(1839.) Our heart is of that colour which our most constant thoughts dye it into. Transient fleeting thoughts, whether of one kind or another, do not alter the temper of the soul. Neither poison kills nor food nourishes, unless they stay in the body; nor does good or evil benefit or harm the mind, unless they abide in it.

—Gurnall, 1617-1669.

(1840.) As the thoughts are, the soul is. The cask, long after it has been emptied, still retains the scent of the liquor with which it was formerly filled; and in the same way do the thoughts leave behind them the trace of their nature and quality in the heart. And as wine is never put into a foul or fetid cask, so never does God pour His grace into the heart which is voluntarily defiled with evil thoughts. The thoughts are the soul's pinions, with which it wings its way either to heaven or to hell. With these it may either, like Noah's dove, light upon an olive tree, and pluck from it a twig; or, like the raven, settle upon a carcase and defile itself.

—Scriver, 1629-1693.

(1841.) Any one who has visited limestone caves has noticed the stalactite pillars, sometimes large and massive, by which they were adorned and supported. They are nature's masonry of solid rock, formed by her own slow, silent, but mysterious process. The little drop of water percolates through the roof of the cave, and deposits its sediment, and another follows it, till the icicle of stone is formed; and finally reaching to the rock beneath, it becomes a solid pillar, a marble monument, which can only be rent down by the most powerful forces.

But is there not going forward oftentimes in the caverns of the human heart a process as silent and effective, yet infinitely more momentous? There in the darkness that shrouds all from the view of the outward observer, each thought and feeling, as light and inconsiderable perhaps as the little drop of water, sinks downward into the soul, and deposits—yet in a form almost imperceptible—what we may call its sediment. And then another and another follows till the traces of all combined become more manifest, and at length, if these thoughts and feelings are charged with the sediment of worldliness and worldly passion, they have reared within the spirit permanent and perhaps everlasting monuments of their effects. All around the walls of this spiritual cave stand in massive proportions the pillars of sinful inclinations and the props of iniquity, and only a convulsion like that which rends the solid globe can rend them from their place and shake their hold.

Thus stealthily is the work done; mere fancies and desires, and lusts unsuspectingly entertained, contribute silently but surely to the result. The heart is changed into an impregnable fortress of sin. The roof of its iniquity is sustained by marble pillars, and all the weight of reason and conscience and the Divine threatenings are powerless to lay it low in the dust of humility.

Such is the power of those light fancies and imaginations and desires which enter the soul unobserved, and are slighted for their insignificance. They attract no notice. They utter no note of alarm. We might suppose that if left to themselves they would be absorbed in oblivion, and leave no trace behind. But they form the pillars of character. They sustain the soul under the pressure of all those solemn appeals to which it ought to yield.

How impressive, then, the admonition, "Keep thy heart with all diligence!" Things which seem powerless and harmless may prove noxious beyond expression. The power of inveterate sin is from the silent flow of thought. Your habitual desires or fancies are shaping your eternal destiny.

—American National Preacher.

(1842.) Beware of evil in the buddings of desire! Whoever allow themselves to indulge in evil imaginations or thoughts, are preparing themselves to commit the crimes they fancy. Desires are the seed of deeds. Working in the dark, and all the more dangerous that their progress, like a miner's, is silent and unseen, they sap the walls of virtue; and thus the man of God is overthrown by temptations that otherwise had broken on him, as breaks the mountain billow on a front of rock. May not the bad thoughts and fancies, that do their work secretly and unsuspected within the recesses of the heart, account for those sudden falls and sins on the part of such good men as David, that neither they nor others would have ever dreamt of? The mischief is due less to the temptation than to what preceded it—and prepared for it.

You are walking, for example, through a forest. Across your path and on the ground lies, stretched out in death, a mighty tree, tall and strong—fit mass to carry a cloud of canvas and bear unbent the strain of tempests. You put your foot lightly upon it; and how great your surprise when, breaking through the bark, it sinks deep into the body of the tree—a result much less owing to the pressure of your foot, than to the poisonous fungi and foul crawling insects that had attacked its core. They have left the outer rind uninjured—but hollowed out its heart. Take care your heart is not hollowed out; and nothing left you but the crust and shell of an empty profession.

—Guthrie.

6. How they are to be dealt with.

(1843.) The best Christian's heart here is like Solomon's ships, which brought home, not only gold and silver, but also apes and peacocks; it has not only spiritual and heavenly, but also vain and foolish thoughts. But these latter are there as a disease or poison in the body, the object of his grief and abhorrence, not of his love and complacency.

Though we cannot keep vain thoughts from knocking at the door of our hearts, nor from entering in sometimes, yet we may forbear bidding them welcome, or giving them entertainment. "How long shall vain thoughts lodge within thee?" It is bad to let them sit down with us, though but for an hour, but it is worse to let them lie or lodge with us. It is better to receive the greatest thieves into our houses than vain thoughts into our hearts. John Huss, seeking to reclaim a very profane wretch, was told by him, that his giving way to wicked, wanton thoughts was the original of all those hideous births of impiety which he was guilty of in his life. Huss answered him, that though he could not keep evil thoughts from courting him, yet he might keep them from marrying him; "as," says he, "though I cannot keep the birds from flying over my head, yet I can keep them from building their nests in my hair."

(1844.) Check them at the first appearance. If they bear upon them a palpable mark of sin, bestow not upon them the honour of an examination. If the leprosy appear in their foreheads, thrust them, as the priests did Uzziah, out of the temple; or as David answered his wicked solicitors, "Depart from me, ye evil doers: for I will keep the commandments of my God." Though we cannot hinder them from haunting us, yet we may from lodging in us. The very sparkling of an abominable motion in our hearts is as little to be looked upon as the colour of wine in a glass by a man inclined to drunkenness. Quench them instantly, as you would do a spark of fire in a heap of straw. We must not treat with them. Paul's resolve is a good pattern, not to confer with flesh and blood. We do not debate whether we should shake a viper off our hands.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(1845.) Use not your thoughts to take their liberty and be ungoverned: for use will make them headstrong and not regard the voice of reason; and it will make reason careless and remiss. Use and custom have great power on our minds: where we use to go, our path is plain: but where there is no use, there is no way. Where the water useth to run there is a channel.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1846.) Cast out vain and sinful thoughts in the beginning, before they settle themselves and make a dwelling of thy heart. They are more easily and safely resisted in the entrance. Thy heart will give them rooting and grow familiar with them, if they make any stay. Besides, it shows the greater sin, because there is the less resistance, and the more consent. If the will were against them, it would not let them alone so long. Yea, and their continuance tendeth to your ruin : it is like the continuance of poison in your bowels, or fire in your thatch, or a spy in an army : as long as they stay they are working toward your greater mischief. If these flies stay long they will grow and multiply : they will make their nests, and breed their young, and you will quickly have a swarm of sins.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1847.) With all possible might and speed oppose the very first risings and movings of the heart to sin ; for these are the buds that produce the bitter fruit : and if sin be not nipped in the very bud, it is not imaginable how quickly it will shoot forth. There be sudden sallies out of inherent corruption in these first motions which, though at first they are not so easily prevented, yet may be easily suppressed ; and these may be working in the heart, when there is no noise of any outward enormity in the actions. The fire may burn strongly and vehemently, though it does not flame. The bees may be at work, and very busy within, though we see none of them fly abroad.

Now these sins, though they may seem small in themselves, yet are exceedingly pernicious in their effects. These little foxes destroy the grapes as much or more than the greater, and therefore are to be diligently sought out, hunted, and killed by us, if we would keep our hearts fruitful. We should deal with these first streamings out of sin, as the Psalmist would have the people of God deal with the brats of Babylon ; " Happy shall he be who taketh and dasheth those little ones against the stones." And without doubt most happy and successful will that man prove in his spiritual welfare, who puts on no bowels of pity even to his infant corruptions, but slays the small as well as the great ; and so not only conquers his enemies by opposing their present force, but also by extinguishing their future race. The smallest children, if they live, will be grown men ; and the first notions of sin, if they are let alone, will spread into great, open, and audacious presumptions.
—South, 1633-1716.

7. Their cure.

(1848.) It is the part of a skilful surgeon or physician, not only to take away any appearing ulcer, or to cool the heat of a burning fever with outward applications, but to look into the inward causes and malignity of the disease, and so to order the matter, that the cause being taken away the effect may necessarily follow. Now, it is well known that the seed of all sins, and the well-spring of all wickedness, ariseth from the heart of man. The heart is, therefore, to be washed, as from all wickedness, so from all wicked thoughts, they being the source and originals of all unrighteousness.
—Mauverick, 1617.

(1849.) There is nothing so unaccountable as the multiplicity of thoughts in the minds of men. They fall from them like the leaves of trees when they are shaken with the wind in autumn. To have all these thoughts, all the several fragments of the heart, all the conceptions that are framed and agitated in the mind, to be evil, and that continually, what a hell of horror and confusion must it needs be ! A deliverance from this loathsome, hateful state is more to be valued than the whole world. Without it neither life, nor peace, nor immortality, nor glory, can ever be attained. The design of conviction is to put a stop to these thoughts, to take off from their number, and thereby to lessen their guilt. It deserves not the name of conviction of sin which respects only outward actions and regards not the inward actions of the mind ; and this alone will for a season make a great change in the thoughts, especially it will do so when assisted by superstition, directing them unto other objects. These two in conjunction are the rise of all that devotional religion which is in the papacy. Conviction labours to put some stop and bounds to thoughts absolutely evil and corrupt, and superstition suggests other objects for them, which they readily embrace ; but it is a vain attempt. The minds and hearts of men are continually minting and coining new thoughts and imaginations ; the cogitative faculty is always at work. As the streams of a mighty river running into the ocean, so are the thoughts of a natural man, and through self they run into hell. It is a fond thing to set a dam before such a river to curb its streams. For a little space there may be a stop made, but it will quickly break down all obstacles, or overflow all its bounds. There is no way to divert its course, but only by providing other channels for its waters, and turning them thereinto. The mighty stream of the evil thoughts of men will admit of no bounds or dams to put a stop unto them. There are but two ways of relief from them, the one respecting their moral evil, the other their natural abundance. The first is by throwing salt into the spring, as Elisha cured the waters of Jericho,—that is, to get the heart and mind seasoned with grace ; for the tree must be made good before the fruit will be so. The other is, to turn their streams into new channels, putting new aims and ends upon them, fixing them on new objects : so shall we abound in spiritual thoughts ; for abound in thoughts we shall, whether we will or no.

—Owen, 1616-1683.

EXAMPLE.

1. Is better than precept.

(1850.) Though " the words of the wise be as nails fastened by the masters of the assemblies," yet their examples are the hammer to drive them in, to take the deeper hold. A father that whipped his son for swearing, and swore himself whilst he whipped him, did more harm by his example than good by his correction.
—Fuller, 1608-1661.

(1851.) Examples do more compendiously, easily, and pleasantly inform our minds, and direct our practice, than precepts, or any other way or instrument of discipline. Precepts are delivered in a universal and abstracted manner, naked and void of all circumstantial attire, without any intervention, assistance, or suffrage of sense ; and, consequently, can have no vehement operation upon the fancy, and soon do fly the memory : like flashes of lightning, too subtle to make any great impression, or to leave any remarkable footsteps upon what they encounter ; they must be expressed in nice terms, and digested in exact method; they are various, and in many disjointed pieces conspire to make up an entire body of direction: they do also admit of divers cases, and require many exceptions or restrictions, which, to apprehend distinctly, and retain long in memory, needs a tedious labour, and continual attention of mind, together with a piercing and steady judgment. But good example with less trouble, more speed, and greater efficacy, cause us to comprehend the business, representing it like a picture exposed to sense, having the parts orderly disposed and completely united, suitably clothed and dressed up in its circumstances; contained in a narrow compass and perceptible by one glance, so easily insinuating itself into the fancy, and durably resting therein.

(1852.) Precepts instruct us what things are our duty, but examples assure us that they are possible. They resemble a clear stream wherein we may not only discover our spots, but wash them off. When we see men like ourselves, who are united to frail flesh and in the same condition with us, to command their passions, to overcome the most glorious and glittering temptations, we are encouraged in our spiritual warfare.

—Bates, 1625-1699.

—Loche, 1632-1704.

2. Its power for good.

(1854.) Nothing awakens our sleeping virtues like the noble acts of our predecessors. They are flaming beacons, that fame and time have set on hills, to call us to a defence of virtue, whensoever vice invades the commonwealth of man.

(1855.) It is Plutarch's observation concerning Cæsar's soldiers, that they who in service under other commanders did not exceed the ordinary rate of courage, nor excel their fellows, did yet, when he led them, become irresistibly valiant, being animated and inspired by his unparalleled gallantry: and who is there indeed so incurably heartless, so desperately sluggish, whom the sight of a valiant leader marching before into the mouth of danger, will not infuse fire and vigour into, and instigate forward into a participation of brave adventure? So example doth by a kind of contagion insinuate courage, or inveigle men thereto; beside that it is a kind of daring, and proclaimeth him a dastard that will not imitate it; which imputation the lowest courage of man can hardly digest, and will therefore by doing somewhat answerable strive to decline.

—Barrow, 1630-1677.

(1856.) A wanderer had to go a long and dangerous journey over a rugged and rocky mountain, and knew not the way. He asked a traveller for information, of whom he heard that he had come this same path. The traveller pointed out the road to him clearly and distinctly, together with all the by-ways and precipices of which he must beware, and the rocks which he should climb; moreover he gave him a leaf of paper, on which all these things were described skilfully and exactly.

The wanderer observed all this attentively, and at each turn and by-path he considered carefully the instructions and description of his friend. Vigorously he proceeded; but the more he advanced, the steeper the rocks appeared, and the way seemed to lose itself in the lonely dreary ravines.

Then his courage failed him; anxiously he looked up to the towering gray rocks, and cried: "It is impossible for man to ascend so steep a path, and to climb these rugged rocks. The wings of eagles and the feet of the mountain-goat alone can do it."

He turned away thinking to return by the way he had come, when suddenly he heard a voice exclaiming: "Take courage, and follow me!" He looked round, and to his joyful surprise he beheld the man who had pointed out the way to him. He saw him walk calmly and steadily between the ravines and precipices and the rushing mountain torrents. This inspired him with new confidence, and he followed vigorously. Before nightfall they had ascended the mountain, and a lovely valley, where blossomed myrtle and pomegranate trees, received them at the end of their pilgrimage.

Then the cheerful wanderer thanked his friend, and said: "How can I express my gratitude to thee? Thou hast not only guided me on the right way, but hast also given me strength and courage to persevere."

The other answered: "Not so; am I not a wanderer like thyself, and art thou not the same man as before? Thou hast only seen by my example what thou art, and what thou art able to do."

—Krummacher.

(1857.) An eminent Christian is a North Foreland Lighthouse, seen far and wide, and doing good to myriads whom he never knows.

—Kyle.

(1858.) The moral influence of a holy life cannot be lost. Like the seed which the wind wafts into hidden glades and forest depths, where no sower's hand could reach to scatter it, the subtle germ of Christ's truth will be borne on the secret atmosphere of a holy life, into hearts which no preacher's voice could penetrate. When the tongue of men and angels would fail, there is an eloquence in living goodness which will often prove persuasive. For it is an in-offensive, unpretending, unobtrusive eloquence; it is the eloquence of the soft sunshine when it expands the close-shut leaves and blossoms—a rude hand would but tear and crush them; it is the eloquence of the summer heat when it basks upon the thick-ribbed ice—blows would but break it; but beneath that softest, gentlest, yet most potent influence, the hard impenetrable masses melt away.

(1859.) The truth is, that no man or woman, however poor their circumstances or mean their lot, are without their influence; like an electric spark, passing from link to link, that runs flashing down the chain of successive generations. Indeed, a man's life is as immortal as his soul; and by its influence, though dead, he yet speaketh and worketh.

Men live after they are dead. Outliving our memory, and more enduring than any monument of brass or marble, our example may prove like the circle that rises round the sinking stone, and, growing wider and wider, embraces a larger and larger sphere, till it dies in gentle wavelets on the distant beach. It reaches a distant shore; your example a distant time.

Take care, then, how you live.

—Guthrie.

(1860.) The blossom cannot tell what becomes of its odour, and no man can tell what becomes of his influence and example, that roll away from him, and go beyond his ken on their perilous mission.

(1861.) A child, coming from a filthy home, was taught at school to wash his face. He went home so much improved in appearance, that his mother washed her face. And when the father of the household came home, and saw the improvement in domestic appearances, he washed his face. The neighbours, happening to call in, saw the change, and tried the same experiment, until all that street was purified; and the next street copied its example, and the whole city felt the result of one school-boy washing his face. That is a fable, by which we set forth that the best way to get the world washed of its sins and pollution, is to have our own heart and life cleansed and purified. A man with grace in his face, and Christian cheerfulness in his heart, and only consistency in his behaviour, is a perpetual sermon; and the sermon differs from others in that it has but one head, and the longer it runs the better.

3. Its power for evil.

(1862.) A virtuous man, shining in the purity of a righteous life, is a lighthouse set by the sea-side, whereby both the mariners sail aright and avoid danger: but he that lives in noted sins is a false lantern, which shipwrecks those that trust him.

(1863.) He that gives good receipts, and follows them by a bad example, is like a foolish man who should take great pains to kindle a fire, and when it is kindled, throw cold water upon it to quench it.

—Secher.

(1864.) When men first engage into the ways of God, they have a reverent esteem of those whom they believe to have been made partakers of that mercy before themselves; these they love and honour, as it is their duty. But after a while they find many of them walking in many things unevenly, crookedly, and not unlike the men of the world. Here sin is not wanting to its advantage. Insensibly it prevails with men to a compliance with them. "This way, this course of walking, does well enough with others; why may it not do so with us also?" Such is the inward thought of many, that works effectually in them. And so, through the craft of sin, one generation of professors corrupts another. As a stream arising from a clear spring, whilst it runs in its own peculiar channel, and keeps its water unmixed, preserves its purity and cleanness, but when it falls in its course with other streams that are turbid and foul, though running the same way with it, it becomes muddy and discoloured also; so is it in this case. Believers come forth from the spring of the new birth with some purity and cleanness; thus for a while they keep in the course of their private walking with God: but now, when they come sometimes to fall into society with others, whose profession flows and runs the same way with theirs, even towards heaven, but yet are muddled and sullied with sin and by the world, they are often corrupted with them and by them, and so decline from their first purity, faith, and holiness.

—Owen, 1616-1683.

(1865.) One watch kept right will do to try many by; but, on the other hand, one that goes wrong may be the means of misleading a whole neighbourhood: and the same may be said of the example we individually set to those around us.

—E. Cook.

4. Is no rule of life or excuse for sin.

(1866.) For any voluntarily to fall into such a frame as others are cast into by the power of their temptations, or to think that will suffice in them which they see to suffice in others whose distempers they know, is folly and presumption. He that knows such or such a person to be a living man and of healthy constitution, if he sees him go crawling up and down about his affairs, feeble and weak, sometimes falling, sometimes standing, and making small progress in anything, will he think it sufficient for himself to do so also? Will he not inquire whether the person he sees have not lately fallen into some distemper or sickness that has weakened him and brought him into that condition? Assuredly he will so do. Take heed, Christians; many of the professors with whom ye do converse are sick and wounded, the wounds of some of them do stink and are corrupt because of their folly. If you have any spiritual health, do not think their weak and uneven walking will be accepted at your hands; much less think it will be well for you to become sick and to be wounded also.

5. Which to follow.

—Adams, 1653.

(1868.) Let us then look out better precedents to follow: "Be followers together of Me, and mark them which walk so as ye have us for an ensample." We must not imitate every one, but such as Paul; nor Paul in every thing, but wherein he follows Christ. That great apostle encouraged our imitation, but gave a limitation: Do not you follow after me, unless you see the track of Christ before me. Let us follow good men, but only in what they are good. In our Christian imitation, there is one example necessary; Christ who is called the way; Via in exemplo, veritas in promisso, vita in premio: others but in some actions, and at some occasions; their lives being lines so far to be followed, as they swerve not from the original copy, Christ. We are not bound to be good men's apes: let us follow David where he followed God's heart, not where he followed his own heart; if he turn toward lust and blood, let us leave him there. Let us follow Peter's confession, not his abnegation: All our following hath the so far; if our precedents go out of the way, let us shake hands and bid them farewell. Two of us are going towards Jerusalem, but saith one, I must needs call in at Rome, or go a little about by Samaria. Nay, then I leave you; here our ways part.

—Adams, 1653.

(1869.) The way to excel in any kind, is to propose the highest and most perfect examples to our imitation. No man can write after too perfect and good a copy; and though he can never reach the perfection of it, yet he is like to learn more than by one less perfect. He that aims at the heavens, which yet he is sure to come short of, is like to shoot higher than he that aims at a mark within his reach.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(1870.) Example is a dangerous lure; where the wasp got through the gnat sticks fast.

—La Fontaine, 1621-1695.

6. Importance and value of the human examples set before us in Scripture.

(1871.) God hath provided and recommended us to one example, as a perfect standard of good practice; the example of our Lord. That indeed is the most universal, absolute, and assured pattern; yet doth it not supersede the use of other examples, not only the valour and conduct of the general, but those of the inferior officers, yea, the resolution of common soldiers, do serve to animate their fellows. The stars have their season to guide us, as well as the sun; especially when our eyes are so weak as hardly to bear the day. Even, considering our infirmity, inferior examples by their imperfection sometimes have a peculiar advantage. Our Lord's most imitable practice did proceed from an immense virtue of Divine grace, which we cannot arrive to; it, in itself, is so perfect and high, that we may not ever reach it; looking upon it may therefore sometimes dazzle and discourage our weakness: but other good men had assistance in measure, such as we may hope to approach unto; they were subject to the difficulties which we feel; they were exposed to the perils of falling which we fear: we may therefore hope to march on in a reasonable distance after them; we may, by help of the same grace, come near in transcribing their less exact copy.

(1872.) It is true that with the sun shining we feel no need for those lesser orbs that lose their lustre in his overwhelming brightness. But it is not true that with a perfect model of every virtue and grace in Jesus Christ we have no need of any other. Children must creep before they can walk; and on such as are only yet able to make feeble efforts in the direction of what is good, the very fact that Christ presents not merely a high, but a perfect model, may have somewhat of a depressing and deterring influence. To live like Him seems a hopeless task. Greatly superior to us as Abraham, Moses, David, and Paul appear, they resemble those lofty mountains to whose tops, though raised high above the level plain and piercing the clouds with their glistening snows, a brave crag-man may climb; but Jesus, occupying a higher region, seems like the star that shines above them, which, though we should mount up on eagle's wings, it would be impossible to reach. It is not impossible. We are assured that when we shall see Him, we shall be like Him as He is. Yet there are times of defeat, of spiritual depression, when one, who might otherwise give up in despair, will attempt the imitation of an imperfect model, and find in its very imperfections encouragement to persevere.

Besides, while Jesus was, in a sense, tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin, and while His life does certainly illustrate the grand principles of our duty toward God and man, the saints are very valuable as models, since they teach us how to act in circumstances in which our Lord was never placed, but we often are. Though bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh, and as such having a fellow-feeling with all our infirmities, He was not a fallen man, as we are, and the saints were. Animated by the same passions, placed in the same relationships, and called to endure the same trials as ourselves, their footprints teach us where to walk, and their triumphs how to conquer. We look on Jesus, nor can hope to be altogether such as He was, till death's strong hand break the mould of clay, and we are brought forth, to the admiration and joy of angels, a perfect image of our Lord and Master. But in the faith of Abraham and the chastity of Joseph, the meekness of Moses and the patience of Job, the piety of David and the fidelity of Daniel, the zeal of Paul and the love of John, we see what attainments others have reached, to what heights of grace we ourselves may aspire.

—Guthrie.

FAITH.

I. ITS NATURE.

1. It is confidence in truth.

(1873.) Faith is a theological term rarely used in other matters. Hence its meaning is obscured. But faith is no strange, new, peculiar power; supernaturally infused by Christianity; but the same principle by which we live from day to day, one of the commonest in our daily life.

We trust our senses; and that though they often deceive us, we trust men; a battle must often be risked on the intelligence of a spy. A merchant commits his ships with all his fortunes on board to a hired captain, whose temptations are enormous. Without this principle society could not hold together for a day. It would be a mere sand-heap.

Such too is religious faith; we trust on probabilities; and this though probabilities often are against us. We cannot prove God's existence. The balance of probabilities, scientifically speaking, are nearly equal for a living person or a lifeless cause: immortality, &c., in the same way. But faith throws its own convictions into the scale and decides the preponderance.

Faith, then, is that which, when probabilities are equal, ventures on God's side, and on the side of right, on the guarantee of a something within which makes the thing seem to be true because it is loved. It is so defined by St. Paul: "Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things unseen."
—F. W. Robertson, 1816-1853.

2. It is confidence in the ability of persons.

(1874.) Religious faith, like natural faith, exists, not perhaps in opposition to, but in distinction from, present knowledge. That is to say, in the exercise of faith we do many things both in nature and religion, of the results of which we do not possess, at the present time, any certain foresight. If faith did not carry us beyond the reach of our own understanding, beyond the line of human reason, beyond what we can now perceive, it would not be faith; and those who might walk within the circle described by that measurement, could not be said to walk by faith but by sight.

The daughter of a celebrated physician was once attacked by a violent and dangerous fever; but she exhibited great resignation and tranquillity. She said she was ignorant of what might effect her cure; and if it were left to herself to prescribe, she might desire remedies which would be prejudicial. Shall I not gain everything, she added, by abandoning myself entirely to my father? He desires my recovery; he knows much better than I do what is adapted to the restoration of my health; and having confidence therefore, that everything will be done for me which can be done, I remain without solicitude either as to the means or the result.—This was an instance of natural faith; believing without knowing; and entirely peaceable and tranquil, while trusting itself in the hands of another. Religious faith, in like manner, trusts itself in the hands of God; knowing nothing and enduring all things, in the full confidence that it will be well in the end.

—Upham.

3. It is confidence in the character of persons.

—F. W. Robertson, 1816-1853.

(1876.) The child that sets out with his parents upon a long and untried journey, without a doubt that his parents will supply his wants, and guide him in the right way, and will bring him home again in safety (if, indeed, he feels that he can have a home but in the arms and presence of those parents), knows what it is to believe. The young man who for the first time enters upon business for himself, and, in the prosecution of the plans and labours which now devolve upon him, finds it necessary to implicate himself with his fellow-men, and to enter into arrangements and contracts which imply the discharge of duties and the fulfilment of promises on the part of others, knows what it is to believe. The man of more mature years, who is called by his countrymen to the high office of sustaining and administering the laws, but who is obviously unable to do it, without confidence in himself, without confidence in his subordinate agents and in the community at large, knows what it is to believe. So complicated are the relations of society, and so dependent is man on his fellow-man, that it is difficult to see, if man had not faith in others, how he could exist in the world for any length of time.

—Upham.

4. It is trust in the testimony of others.

(1877.) There is more of belief than reason in the world. All instructors and masters in sciences and arts require, first, a belief in their disciples, and a resignation of their understanding and wills to them. And it is the wisdom of God to require that of man which his own reason makes him submit to another which is his fellow-creature. He, therefore, that quarrels with the condition of faith, must quarrel with all the world, since belief is the beginning of all knowledge; yea, and most of the knowledge in the world may rather come under the title of belief than of knowledge; for what we think we know this day we may find from others such arguments as may stagger our knowledge, and make us doubt of that we thought ourselves certain of before; nay, sometimes we change our opinions ourselves without any instructor, and see a reason to entertain an opinion quite contrary to what we had before. And if we found a general judgment of others to vote against what we think we know, it would make us give the less credit to ourselves and our own sentiments. All knowledge in the world is only a belief depending upon the testimony or arguments of others; for, indeed, it may be said of all men, as in Job viii. 9, "We are but of yesterday, and know nothing."

(1878.) It is easy to show that, even considering faith as trust in another, it is no irrational or strange principle of conduct in the concerns of this life.

For when we consider the subject attentively, how few things there are which we can ascertain for ourselves by our own senses and reason! After all, what do we know without trusting others? We know that we are in a certain state of health, in a certain place, have been alive for a certain number of years, have certain principles and likings, have certain persons around us, and perhaps have in our lives travelled to certain places at a distance. But what do we know more? Are there not towns (we will say) within fifty or sixty miles of us which we have never seen, and which, nevertheless, we fully believe to be as we have heard them described? To extend our view;—we know that land stretches in every direction of us a certain number of miles, and then there is sea on all sides; that we are in an island. But who has seen the land all around, and has proved for himself that the fact is so? What, then, convinces us of it? The report of others; this trust, this faith in testimony which, when religion is concerned, then, and only then, the proud and sinful would fain call irrational.

And what I have instanced in one set of facts which we believe, is equally true of numberless others, of almost all of those which we think we know.

Consider how men in the business of life, nay, all of us, confide, are obliged to confide, in persons we never saw, or know but slightly; nay, in their hand-writings which, for what we know, may be forged, if we are to speculate and fancy what may be. We act upon our trust in them implicitly, because common sense tells us that, with proper caution and discretion, faith in others is perfectly safe and rational. Scripture, then, only bids us act in respect to a future life as we are every day acting at present.

—Newman.

(1879.) How certain we all are when we think on the subject that we must sooner or later die. No one seriously thinks he can escape death; and men dispose of their property and arrange their affairs, confidently contemplating, not indeed the exact time of their death, still death as sooner or later to befall them. Of course they do; it would be most irrational in them not to expect it. Yet observe, what proof has any one of us that he shall die? Because other men die? How does he know that? Has he seen them die? He can know nothing of what took place before he was born, nor of what happens in other countries. How little, indeed, he knows about it at all, except that it is a received fact, and except that it would, in truth, be idle to doubt what mankind as a whole witness, though each individual has only his proportionate share in the universal testimony.

—Newman.

8. It is trust in God.

(1830.) Faith is that conviction upon the mind of the truth of the promises and threatenings of God made known in the Gospel; of the certain reality of the rewards and punishments of the life to come, which enables a man, in opposition to all the temptations of a corrupt world, to obey God, in expectation of an invisible reward hereafter.

(1881.) In vain will you hope to please God, and secure those rewards which He confers on them that diligently seek Him, unless yours is a practical faith. Faith is more than assent; it is active assent. Whatever a man believes, moves him in proportion to its importance; and if a man is told anything that concerns him greatly, and it does not move him at all, it is proof sufficient that he does not believe it. At the commencement of the late war, there appeared in the "Daily News" a most exciting letter from one of its correspondents, detailing the treatment to which he and some other Englishmen had been subjected at Metz. Arrested as Prussian spies, they were nearly murdered by the mob, and were with difficulty got into a guard-room by the soldiers. There they were examined by the General in command. Their answers to his questions appeared by no means to satisfy him. The correspondent says, "He then looked at us in the face, and, addressing the officers, police agents, and men in blouses who surrounded him, said, 'Gentlemen, you know that Metz is in a state of siege, and therefore no longer under the common law. We have been too humane, too noble-hearted, too generous. While the Prussians have committed the most horrible crimes against inoffensive Frenchmen and other officers, we have suffered the enemy to abuse our generosity, and this is the gratitude we receive. But it must stop once for ever. It is a hard thing, but the law gives me the right to shoot any one I choose in the market-square; and an example must be given, or we shall never have peace.' 'Bravo, General! bravo, commander!' cried all of them in a chorus. The man in a blouse left the room, and in a second the whole square echoed with cries of 'Bravo, le General!' 'Mort aux espions!' As I felt pretty safe that M. le General would think twice before making his experiment on an English subject, I said frankly that what he had been saying was all nonsense." The situation was a terrible one—a man with absolute power threatening death, and a yelling mob applauding the sanguinary decree—and yet the Englishman was not terrified. Why? Because he did not believe that the threats were real. His calmness proved sufficiently that he had no faith in them.—Is it not thus with you, who live in daily and constant neglect of the great salvation? In what other way could you more plainly avow your disbelief in God's declarations concerning your danger? He assures you in His Word that His wrath abides upon all who do not penitently seek forgiveness from Him through Jesus Christ, that when this brief life is over He will bar heaven against you, and consign you to endless woe; and you? What is it that you do? By going on just as you did before, you give Him the lie. If not with your lips, by your lives, you reply that what He says is unworthy of credit, nay, even of serious consideration! Consider now, I pray you, how you will answer for the dishonour which you thus put upon Him when you meet with Him face to face in the Judgment Day.

—R. A. Bertram.

II. ITS NECESSITY.

1. To the existence of society, and to all forms of human activity and excellence.

(1882.) In matters of daily life, we have no time for fastidious and perverse fancies about the minute chances of our being deceived. We are obliged to act at once, or we should cease to live. There is a chance (it cannot be denied) that our food to-day may be poisonous,—we cannot be quite certain,—but it looks the same and tastes the same, and we have good friends round us; so we do not abstain from it, for all this chance, though it is real.

—Newman.

(1883.) The power, whether of painter or poet, to describe rightly what he calls an ideal thing, depends upon its being to him not an ideal but a real thing. No man ever did or ever will work well but either from actual sight, or sight of faith.

—Kushin.

(1884.) In the business of life, what is it but faith or trust that guides a man? A merchant, for instance, embarks his capital in a foreign speculation. On what security does he proceed? Simply on that of faith. He has no certainty for anything on which he rests his whole adventure. All is mere probability, and he risks so much on these probabilities simply because he has faith in them. He has faith in the elements, faith in the constancy of nature, faith in human nature; and on this he builds. Go to his counting-house, and ask him to give you mathematical demonstration or rational philosophical proof that his venture will be successful, he will laugh in your face, or pity you for an unhappy lunatic, whom too much study has made mad. All men, then, live by faith.

(1885.) Faith is the basis of all great, active enterprises. If a man cannot think well nor write well without faith; so in all difficult enterprises, which imply physical as well as mental effort, he cannot act well. Without faith there would have been no Parthenon, and no Pyramids of Egypt. Without faith there would have been no Thermopylæ, and no memorable Marathon. Hannibal could not have passed the Alps without faith. Cincinnatus could neither have ploughed nor have left the plough; could neither have sowed for the harvest, nor trained soldiers for victory, without faith. Columbus could not have crossed the ocean without faith. And here we speak not of religious, but of natural faith. Cortes could not have conquered Mexico without faith. Park, Ledyard, Cooke, and Bruce could not have explored unknown countries without faith. The English Revolution, the French Revolution, the American Revolution, whatever faults or crimes may have accompanied any or all of them, could not have been accomplished without faith. The same may be said of all great civil and political movements. A mere sneerer, the man who sits in his easy-chair, believing in nothing and laughing at everything, could have done nothing of these things. No oceans are crossed by him; no nations are conquered; no boundless forests are subdued; no rude barbarism is tamed; no new civilisation is planted and reared up, at the expense of toil and blood in mighty triumph.

—Upham.

(1886.) Faith, which is the source of so much human happiness, is the mainspring of human life. It moves more than half the machinery of life. What leads the husbandman, for example, to yoke his horses when, no bud bursting to clothe the naked trees, no bird singing in hedgerows or frosty skies, nature seems dead? With faith in the regularity of her laws, in the ordinance of her God, he believes that she is not dead but sleepeth; and so he ploughs and sows in the certain expectation that he shall reap, and that these bare fields shall be green in summer with waving corn, and be merry in autumn with sunbrowned reapers. The farmer is a man of faith. So is the seaman. No braver man than he who goes down to see God's wonders in the deep. Venturing his frail bark on a sea ploughed by so many keels, but wearing on its bosom the furrows of none, with neither path to follow nor star to guide, the mariner knows no fear. When the last blue hill has dipped beneath the wave, and he is alone on a shoreless sea, he is calm and confident—his faith in the compass-needle, which, however his ship may turn, or roll, or plunge, ever points true to the north. An example his to be followed by the Christian with his Bible, on that faith venturing his all, life, crew, and cargo, he steers his way boldly through darkest nights and stormiest oceans, with nothing but a thin plank between him and the grave. And though metaphysicians and divines have involved this matter of faith in myste y, be assured that there is nothing more needed for your salvation or mine than that God would inspire us with a belief in the declarations of His Word as real, heartfelt, and practical, as that which we put in the laws of providence—in the due return of day and night, summer and winter, seed-time and harvest.

—Guthrie.

(1887.) Conviction, which is only another word to express faith, lies at the root of all consistent action. A mechanical genius conceives an idea. It is as clear as noon-day in his mind, but ere that idea is embodied in a wheel, a spring, or a lever, he must believe in the possibility of its embodiment; and just in proportion to the strength of his conviction as to the practicability and probable success of his idea will he be consistent and earnest in working it out. The mind must conceive and believe, before the hand or foot will move. Columbus conceived the existence of a continent; the conception grew into a conviction: the conviction was followed by consistent action, and that action was crowned with success by the discovery of America. A man believes that an observance of certain physical laws is conducive to health, and he acts accordingly. Another believes that obedience to certain moral laws is necessary to a good moral character, self-respect, and peace of conscience, and he obeys those laws.

Christianity, then, by making man's pardon and happiness to hinge upon faith, acts in accordance with the laws of his mental and moral being. It is no arbitrary requirement; it is as necessary to holy obedience as any cause is to an effect. . . . A man, for instance, must believe in God, or he will never serve Him; in law, or he will never obey it; in sin, or he will never see the necessity of a mediator. . . . In other words, there is a necessary connection between faith and practice. "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he." Convictions are the seedlings or springs of actions, and actions make the man.

—T. W. Tower.

2. To our happiness here and now.

(1888.) Hast thou faith? To this, an apostle's question, all men could, in a sense, return an answer in the affirmative; for it is not more true that no man liveth and sinneth not, than no man liveth and believeth not; or devil either; for "the devils also believe and tremble." Suppose a man without faith in any one, without faith in the honesty of his servants, faith in the integrity of his friends, faith in the affections of his children, faith in the fidelity of his wife, death would be to be preferred to a life like his. Better that our eyes were closed in death than that they should see every one with a mask on their face and a dagger beneath their cloak; with such a jaundiced vision, we should be "of all men the most miserable." On looking into the matter, you will find that faith, instead of belonging only to the elect of God, holy and chosen, is common to all, even the worst of men. The backbone, indeed, of the social, and the foundation of the commercial fabric, remove faith between man and man, and society and commerce fall to pieces. There is not a happy home on earth but stands on faith; our heads are pillowed on it; we sleep at night in its arms with greater security for the safety of our lives, peace, and property, than bolts and bars can give.

—Guthrie.

2. To enable us to please God.

(1889.) "One thing thou lackest." The want of one thing may make void the presence of all things else. Lacking its mainspring—which is but one thing—a watch with jewels, wheels, pinions, and beautiful mechanism, the finest watch indeed that ever was made, is of no more use than a stone. A sun-dial without its gnomon, as it is called, Time's iron finger that throws its shadow on the circling hours—but one thing also—is as useless in broad day as in the blackest night. A ship may be built of the strongest oak, with masts of the stoutest pine, and manned by the best officers and crew, but I sail not in her if she lacks one thing—that trembling needle which a child running about the deck might fancy a toy; on that plaything, as it looks, the safety of all on board depends—lacking that, but one thing, the ship shall be their coffin, and the deep sea their grave. It is thus with true piety, with living faith. That one thing wanting, the greatest works, the costliest sacrifices, and the purest life, are of no value in the sight of God—are null and void.

Still further, to impress you with the valuelessness of everything without true piety, and show how its presence imparts such worth to a believer's life and labours, as to make his mites weigh more than other men's millions, and his cup of cold water more precious than their cups of gold—let me harrow an illustration from arithmetic. Write down a line of ciphers. You may add thousands, multiplying them till the sheets they fill cover the face of earth and heaven, they express nothing; and are worth nothing. Now take the smallest number of the ten, the smallest digit, and place that at their head—magic never wrought such a change! What before amounted to nothing rises instantly by the addition of one figure, one stroke of the pen, into thousands, or millions, as the case may be; and whether they represent pounds or pearls, how great is the sum of them! Such power resides in true faith—in genuine piety.

It may be the lowest piety—but one degree above zero; it may be the love of smoking flax; the hope of a bruised reed; the faith of a mustard seed; the hesitating, fluttering confidence of him who cried, "Lord, I believe; help Thou mine unbelief." Still, so soon as it is wrought by the Spirit of God, it changes the whole aspect of a man's life and the whole prospect of his eternity. It is that one thing, wanting which, however amiable, moral, and even apparently religious we may be, our Lord addresses us, as He did the young ruler, saying, "One thing thou lackest."
—Guthrie.

III. ITS PRECIOUSNESS.

1. By it we are justified.

(1890.) Faith will be of more use to us than any grace; as an eye, though dim, was of more use to an Israelite than all the other members of his body; not a strong arm, or a nimble foot; it was his eye looking on the brazen serpent that cured him. It is not knowledge, though angelical, not repentance, though we could shed rivers of tears, could justify us: only faith, whereby we look on Christ.

—Watson, 1696.

2. By it we are grafted into Christ.

(1891.) Faith is the vital artery of the soul. When we begin to believe, we begin to love. Faith grafts the soul into Christ, as the scion into the stock, and fetches all its nutriment from the blessed vine.

—Watson, 1696.

3. By it our final salvation is ensured.

(1892.) Now, because Noah's faith was the thing that wrapped up his soul in the favour of God, the ground of all his perfection and righteousness, the virtue whereby he lived when all the world was drowned; how precious should this jewel be to us, without which we can neither live in this valley of tears, nor escape in the day of flames! There is no life but in the Son, and "he that hath the Son hath life," and he that hath faith hath the Son. Justus ex fide vivit: faith, like Eve, is the mother of all that live. God Himself is content to divide His praises with faith: whereas she can do nothing but by Him, she shall do anything with Him. She can work wonders: subduing kingdoms, strangling lions, quenching violent fires, with handfuls conquering huge armies, dividing seas, turning back streams, yea, commanding mountains to remove, overcoming the world; what call you these but wonders? Such wonders can faith do. Yea, God is pleased to do nothing for us without her, that doth all things of Himself. True faith is not less than miraculous in the sphere of her activity, and with the warrant of God's truth. It is no presumption nor offence to God's crown and dignity, to say, it is His own arm to the saving of men. There is a kind of omnipotence in faith, when it shall say to the sun and moon, Stand still, and be obeyed. But as Christ could do no miracle in Capernaum, because they had no faith; so where men want faith, it must be a miracle, yea, beyond a miracle, if they be saved. I know it is easy to say, I believe: there is a titular faith, but it shall never save any, until saying, Be filled, gives a man his dinner; or, Be warmed, makes him hot. But he that can believe, with Noah, in a storm of indignation, in a deluge of destruction, when the arrows of vengeance fly about, and the Lord raineth coals of fire like hailstones, in flaming trials, and strongest temptations; then to believe, shall bring a glorious crown in the day of Jesus Christ.

4. It brings peace.

(1893.) We have peace in believing. We have peace with our own conscience. When that stern sergeant shall take thee by the throat, and arrest thee upon God's debt, Pay that thou owest; let thy faith plead, I have paid it. How? Produce thy acquittance, that bloody acquittance, sealed in the wounds of thy Saviour, and given to thy faith. This shall turn the frowns of thy conscience into smiles; and that hand which was ready to hale thee to prison, shall now embrace thee with joy, encourage thee with kindness, and fight for thee with conquest.

—Adams, 1653.

(1894.) "Being justified by faith, we have peace with God," i.e., we enter into the state of peace immediately. "Peace is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart." And he is a rich man who has a thousand acres of corn in the ground, as well as he who has so much in his barn, or the money in his purse. They have rest and peace in the seed of it, when they have it not in the fruit; they have rest in the promise, when they have it not in possession; and he is a rich man who has good bonds and bills for a great sum of money, if he have not twelve pence in his pocket. All believers have the promise, have rest and peace granted them under God's own hand, in many promises which faith brings them under; and we know that the truth and faithfulness of God stands engaged to make good every line and word of the promise to them. So that though they have not a full and clear actual sense and feeling of rest, they are, nevertheless, by faith come into the state of rest.

—Flavel, 1630-1691.

5. Of all other graces it is the germ and animating power.

(1895.) Love, touched by the hand of faith, flames forth; hope, fed at faith's table, grows strong, and casts anchor within the veil; joy, courage, and zeal, being smiled upon by faith, are made invincible and unconquerable. What oil is to the wheels, what weights are to the clock, what wings are to the bird, what sails are to the ship, that faith is to all religious duties and services.

—Brooks, 1680.

(1896.) Faith has an influence upon other graces. It is like a silver thread that runs through a chain of pearls. It puts strength and vivacity into all other virtues. It made Abraham rejoice, and it made Noah sit still and quiet in the midst of a deluge. Faith is the first pin that moves the soul; it is the spring in the watch that sets agoing—all the golden wheels of love, joy, comfort, and peace.

Faith is a root grace, from whence spring all the sweet flowers of joy and peace. —Brooks, 1680.

(1897.) Faith is an assimilating grace; it changeth the soul into the image of the object. A deformed person may look on a beautiful object, but not be made beautiful; but faith looking on Christ transforms a man, and turns him into His similitude. Faith looking on a bleeding Christ, causeth a soft, bleeding heart; looking on an holy Christ, causeth sanctity of heart; looking on an humble Christ, makes the soul humble. —Watson, 1696.

(1898.) Faith hath influence upon all the graces, and sets them a-work; not a grace stirs till faith sets it a-work. As the clothier sets the poor a-work, he sets their wheel a-going: faith sets hope a-work. The heir must believe his title to an estate in reversion, before he can hope for it; faith believes its title to glory, and then hope waits for it. Did not faith feed the lamp of hope with oil, it would soon die. Faith sets love a-work, "Faith which worketh by love;" believing the mercy and merit of Christ causeth a flame of love to ascend. Faith sets patience a-work, "Be followers of them, who through faith and patience inherit the promise." Faith believes the glorious rewards given to suffering. This makes the soul patient in suffering. Thus faith is the master-wheel, it sets all the other graces a-running. —Watson, 1696.

(1899.) If the spring in a watch be stopped, it will hinder the motion of the wheels: if faith be down, all the other graces are at a stand.

—Watson, 1696.

(1900.) Every one knows that the seeds of plants and trees must be cast into the earth and become decomposed before vegetation will take place. This is one of nature's wonders, or rather of nature's God. Let us imagine, if we can, a man who had never seen this order exemplified in this particular instance, and he would be just as ready to disbelieve that plants and trees could spring from seed cast into the earth, as we are to calculate upon the certainty of the fact. What resemblance is there indeed between the future plant, and the seed from which it springs? How little could mere reason, without experience, venture to predict the result that follows from a few handfuls of grain scattered over the soil! So, when overwhelmed with our corruptions, and we can scarce discover the existence of any graces, and then look at the height and stature they have attained to in others, we are ready to doubt whether such a simple principle as faith, and that so weak, can ever spring up in the abundance of Christian fruitfulness we shall one day attain to. But what if this faith be a seminal principle, as the seed which contains the mighty oak? Let us take courage in the assurance of its progressive growth, and destined increase.

—Salter, 1840.

6. Without it no other grace is acceptable to God.

(1901.) Of all the virgins presented to Ahasuerus, none was so pleasing as Esther. "Let the maiden which pleaseth the king be queen instead of Vashti." When that decree was published, what strife, what emulations (may we think) was among the Persian damsels, that either were, or thought themselves to be, fair! Every one hopes to be a queen; but so incomparable was the beauty of that Jewess, that she is not only taken into the Persian court, as one of the selected virgins, but hath the most honourable place in the seraglio allotted to her. The other virgins pass their probation unregarded; when Esther's turn came, though she brought the same face and demeanour that nature had cast upon her, no eye sees her without admiration. The king is so delighted with her beauty, that, contemning all the more vulgar forms, his choice is fully fixed upon her. Our heavenly King is pleased with all our graces: hot zeal and cool patience pleaseth Him; cheerful thankfulness and weeping repentance pleaseth Him; charity in the height and humility in the dust pleaseth Him; but none of them are welcome to Him without faith, as nothing can please Him without Christ. There is none that dares venture into His presence, without faith; she is that Esther to which God holds out His golden sceptre. Adorn thy soul with this grace; "so shall the king greatly desire thy beauty."

—Adams, 1653.

7. It is the faculty whereby we realise unseen things.

(1902.) Faith is seated in the understanding, as well as the will. It has an eye to see Christ, as well as a wing to fly to Christ.

—Watson, 1696.

(1903.) Faith is the eye of the soul, and the Holy Spirit's influence is the light by which it is seen.

—Toplady, 1740-1778.

(1904.) Consider what impressions we gain from the sense of touch. It is touch which, more than any other sense, convinces us of the reality of matter. What you see might be merely a phantom, an optical illusion, a picture painted on the retina of the eye, and nothing more; but if you go up to the thing you see, and touch it, and handle it, you become assured of its existence, you know that it is substantial. Now what is faith! It may be defined as the faculty by which we realise unseen things—such as the Being and Presence of God, the work which our Lord did for us, the future judgment, the future recompense of the righteous, and the like unseen things.

I say the faculty (not by which we conceive, but) by which we realise these things, feel them to have a body and a substance. To imagine the truths of religion is not to believe them. We may from time to time imagine God as He is in heaven, surrounded by myriads of glorious angels,—we may imagine Christ looking down upon us from God's right hand, interceding for us, calling us to account at the last day, and awarding to us our final doom; but the mere picturing these things to ourselves is not the same thing as believing them; the believing them is the having such a conviction of their reality, as to live under their influence, and to be in some measure, at least, governed by them. In short, to imagine the truths of religion is like surveying things by the eye; to believe in the truths of religion is like grasping the same things with the hand, and thus proving them to have substance and consistency.

—Goulburn.

8. By it we are enabled to triumph over doubts.

(1905.) The eye of true faith is so quick-sighted, that it can see through all the mists and fogs of difficulties.

—Adams, 1653.

(1906.) Faith makes the discords of the present the harmonies of the future. —Robert Collyer.

(1907.) We may observe that we have three ascending degrees of faith, manifesting itself in the breaking through of hindrances which would keep from Christ in the paralytic (Mark ii. 4), the blind men at Jericho (Mark x. 48), and this woman of Canaan. The paralytic broke through the outward hindrances of things merely external; blind Bartimeus, through the hindrances opposed by his fellow-men; and this woman, more heroically than all, through apparent hindrances even from Christ Himself. These in their seeming weakness were the three mighty ones, not of David, but of David's Son, that broke through the hosts of the enemy, until they could draw living water from the wells of salvation. —Trench.

9. It enables us to exercise a wise foresight.

(1908.) Faith doth not only enable the soul to see the nature of all sin void of true treasure, but also how transient its false pleasures are: "I will not lose, saith faith, sure mercies, for transient uncertain pleasures." This made Moses leap out of the pleasures of the Egyptian court, into the fire of affliction, because he saw them "pleasures for a season." Should you see a man in a ship, throw himself overboard into the sea, you might at first think him out of his wits, but if a little while after you should see him stand safe on the shore, and the ship swallowed up of the waves, you would then think he took the wisest course. Faith sees the world, and all the pleasures of sin sinking; there is a leak in them which the wit of man cannot stop.

10. It enables us to walk safely.

(1909.) O faith! O gift of God! O divine torch which comes to clear up darkness, how necessary art thou to man. . . . O pillar of fire, at the same time so obscure and so luminous, of what importance is it that thou always conductest the camp of the Lord, the tabernacle and the tents of Israel, through all the perils of the desert, the rocks, the temptations, and the dark and unknown paths of this life?

—Massillon.

11. It opens the promises.

(1910.) Faith is the key that unlocks the cabinet of the promises, and empties out their treasures into the soul.

—Watson, 1696.

12. It gives calmness in trial and danger.

(1912.) Many animals act and are acted upon by fancy: so it is fancy in men that makes them fear where no fear is; dreading the danger, not trusting the Deliverer. The sheep at first sight of the wolf, apprehends him for a terrible object, naturally fears and flees him: the lion feels no terror, but passeth by him with an honourable scorn. A malkin frights a child, a man contemns it. Elisha's servant quakes at the Syrian army, no fear invades the prophet. He saw, and caused his man to see, a greater Deliverer above. In the street we see men walk in their equal stature and dimensions; they on a high turret appear little to us. Stand on a promontory, they with you are great, they beneath you seem small: the situation of the eye makes or mars all. So it is with men in the time of trouble; if their eyes be fixed on earth, their enemies appear great, and God that is so high seems little. Let our eyes be in heaven, and from thence look down upon our enemies, God will then appear mighty, our foes weak and contemptible. This was Jehoshaphat's confidence. "There is no strength in us to stand against this multitude; but our eyes are upon Thee" (2 Chron. xx. 12). . . . We are all weak; in this mighty Deliverer be our confidence. When little children first learn to go, feeling their own feebleness, they thrust out a hand to the wall to stay them. Our strength is but like children's; "Our help is in the name of the Lord."

(1913.) Haply those monstrous sons of Lamech came to Noah and asked him what he intended by that strange work; whether he meant to sail upon the dry land? to whom he relates God's purpose, and his own. They go laughing away at his idleness, and tell one another in sport, that too much holiness hath made him mad; that instead of a palace, he was building a prison; and because other men delighted in castles of stone, he (to be cross to the world) would have a house of wood. Yet cannot all this flout Noah out of his faith: still he preaches, and builds, and finishes. And when all they, like ghastly wretches, lay sprawling on the merciless waves, he lies safe at the anchor of hope and peace. The faith of the righteous cannot be so much derided, as their success is magnified. How securely doth he ride out of this universal uproar, of heavens, earths, waters, elements! He hears the pouring down of the rain above his head; the shrieking of men, women, and children, roaring and bellowing of beasts on every side; the rage of the waves under him: he saw the miserable shifts of the distressed unbelievers; and now, in the midst of all, sits quietly in his dry cabin, not feeling evil. He knew that the great Master of the world, whose judgments now overflowed the earth, would steer him in these deep waters; and that the same hand which shut him up, would preserve him.

Let me here again commend to you the blessedness of faith: what a sweet security and heavenly peace doth it work in the soul, in the midst of all the inundations of evils! This is the adamant which nothing will break; the palm that sinks not under the weightiest burden; the oil that ever overswims the greatest quantity of water that can be poured on it; the sheet-anchor that holds when all other tacklings break. The day of fire shall be more terrible and universal than was the day of water; this defaced earth, that shall melt the heavens. Yet still faith finds an ark, not of combustible wood, but of indissoluble strength; it is the opened side of Jesus Christ. There, when the earth is burning under her, heaven above her, the elements about her, reprobates shrieking beside her, death and hell trembling below her, she shall find assurance and peace; and at last be metamorphosed into that blessed vision, and eternal fruition of such joys; to which His mercy brings us, that they then may be known unto us. Amen.

(1914.) Faith is like a bee; it will suck sweetness out of every flower; it will extract light out of darkness, comforts out of distresses, mercies out of miseries, wine out of water, honey out of the rock, and meat out of the eater. —Brooks, 1680.

(1915.) Where the mind is stayed on God, it will be kept in perfect peace, before deliverance comes. A case will make my meaning plain.

I suppose you fallen into great distress, and a lawyer's letter is received, bringing doleful tidings that your person will be seized unless your debts are paid within a month. While the letter is perusing, an old acquaintance calls upon you, sees a gloom upon your face, and asks the cause of it. You put the letter into his hand: he reads, and drops a friendly tear. After some little pause, he says, "Old friend, I have not cash at present by me, but engage to pay your debts before the month is out." Now, if you thought this person was not able to discharge your debts, or not to be relied on, because his mind was fickle, his promise would bring no relief, because it gains no credit. You have no faith in him. But if you knew the man was able, and might be trusted, his promise would relieve you instantly. A firm reliance on his word would take away your burden, and set your mind at ease, before the debt was paid.

Well, if a firm reliance on the word of man has this sweet influence on the heart, a firm reliance on the Word of God will have the same.

—Brueridge, 1716-1793.

(1916.) Not many years since a number of workmen were engaged in constructing a railway tunnel. In the midst of their work there was a sudden fall of earth, which completely closed the entrance, and shut them up from the outer world. Their comrades outside, as soon as they discovered what had happened, began digging through the mass of earth. It was many hours before the task was accomplished. They found them quietly pursuing their labour inside the tunnel. Their work had never been interrupted. They had eaten their dinner, and gone on digging and boring. They knew, they said, that their fellow-workmen would rescue them; and so they went on with their labour. Transfer their state of mind to the Christian in his perplexities, and we see exactly what practical faith is. Faith teaches the believer, in the midst of the severest difficulty, not to set about forcing a way out of his trouble, but just to ply his pickaxe and spade in the work which is straight before him, leaving it to the Father above to make a way of escape for him. In the right manner, and at the right moment, the help comes, and the Christian goes on his way once more rejoicing.

—Hooper.

(1917.) What cares the child when the mother rocks it, though all storms beat without? So we, if God doth shield and tend us, shall be heedless of the tempests and blasts of life, blow them never so rudely.

—Becher.

(1918.) There is a view of God by which we may be lifted up into such a serene vision, such a glorious aspect, of a loving and forgiving God, that the soul says, "Thou art the Chief among ten thousand, the One altogether lovely. Whom have I in heaven but Thee? There is none upon earth that I desire beside Thee. Thou art my portion and my God." There is such a view possible, and there is such a view frequently given. It is offered to all; and it is offered never more than in times of distress. It is a view of God that compensates everything else, and enables the soul to rest in His bosom.

How, when the child in the night screams with terror, hearing sounds that he knows not of, is that child comforted and put to rest? Is it by a philosophical explanation that the sounds were made by the rats in the partition? Is it by an imparting of entomological knowledge? No; it is by the mother taking the child in her lap, and singing sweetly to it, and rocking it. And the child thinks nothing of the explanation, but only of the mother.

Now, it pleases God to take in His arms and bosom those that love Him and put their trust in Him. And that which comforts them and gives them rest is not so much this or that or the other thing which they can understand, as this: "God has enfolded me, and what can harm me? If God be for me, who can be against me?" There is in this infinite peace, if one can stay there. There is not the storm in all the world that can blow to his shipwreck, or to his disturbance, who abides in such a feeling.

—Becher.

(1919.) Birdie was only four years old, but she had already been taught that God loved her, and always took care of her. One day there was a very heavy thunderstorm, and Birdie's sisters and mamma even laid by their sewing, and drew their chairs into the middle of the room, pale and trembling with fear. But Birdie stood close by the window, watching the storm with bright eyes.

"O mamma! a'n't that bu'fu!" she cried, clapping her hands with delight, as a vivid flash of lightning burst from the black clouds, and the thunder pealed and rattled over their heads.

"It is God's voice, Birdie," said mamma, and her own voice trembled.

"He talks velly loud, don't He, mamma? S'pose it's so as deaf Betsey can hear, and the uver deaf folks."

"O Birdie, dear, come straight away from that window," said one of her sisters, whose cheeks were blanched with fear.

"What for?" asked Birdie.

"Oh! because the lightning is so sharp, and it thunders so loud."

But Birdie shook her head, and looking over her shoulder with a happy smile on her face, lisped out:

"If it funders, let it funder! 'Tis God makes it funder, and He'll take care of me. I a'n't a bit afraid to hear God talk, Maizy."

Was not Birdie's faith beautiful? Mamma and sisters did not soon forget the lesson.

13. It is our safeguard in temptation.

(1920.) An anchor being let fall, it passeth through the water, and violently maketh its way through all the waves and billows, never staying till it come at the bottom, where, taking hold of the ground that lieth out of sight, thus by a secret and hidden force staying the ship, so as though it be moved, yet it is not removed, but still keepeth her station. Of such use is faith to the soul of man. When it is in a stress, tossed with the waves and billows of temptations and trials, threatening to swallow it up, faith breaks through all, never resting till it come at God Himself, who is invisible, and taking hold upon Him by a secret force it stayeth the soul, and keepeth it from being driven upon the rocks or sands of desperation. An anchor it is, and a sure anchor, that sheet anchor which the soul must trust to, which it may ride and live by in whatsoever stress can come down upon it.

(1921.) When Christ saw how Peter should be tempted, He tells him that He had prayed that his faith should not fail (Luke xxii. 32), noting that while his faith held, all would be sure. Faith in this case is like the cork that is upon the net—though the lead on the one side sink it down, yet the cork on the other side keeps it up in the water.

—Ambrose, 1564.

(1922.) Faith is absolutely necessary for resistance. A man cannot fight upon a quagmire. There is no standing out without a standing, some firm ground to tread upon; and this faith alone furnishes. It lifts the soul up to the firm advanced ground of the promises and fastens it there, and there it is sure, even as Mount Zion that cannot be removed. The apostle says, not steadfast by your own resolutions and purposes, but steadfast by faith: (1 Pet. v. 9). When the soul is surrounded with enemies on all hands, so that there is no way of escape, faith flies above them, and carries up the soul to take refuge in Christ, where it is safe. It sets a soul in Christ, and there it looks down on all temptations, as at the bottom of the rock, breaking themselves into foam. When the floods of temptation rise and gather, so great and many that the soul is even ready to be swallowed up, then by faith it says, "Lord Jesus, Thou art my strength, I look to Thee for deliverance; now appear for my help." And thus it overcomes the guile of sin; that is answered by His blood, and the power of sin is conquered by His Spirit; and afflictions that arise are nothing to these. His love and gracious presence makes them sweet and easy.

—Leighton, 1611–1684.

14. It saves us from despair.

(1923.) A ship that lies at anchor may be something tossed, but yet it still remains so fastened that it cannot be carried away by wind or weather. The soul, after it has cast anchor upon God, may, as we see in David, be disquieted awhile, but this unsettling tends to a deeper settling. The more we believe, the more we are established.

—Sibbes, 1577–1635.

(1924.) Faith is a sheet anchor we cast into the sea of God's mercy, and by it we are kept from sinking in despair.

—Watson, 1696.

(1925.) An able seaman once said to me, "In fierce storms we have but one resource: we keep the ship in a certain position: we cannot act in any way but this; we fix her head to the wind; and, in this way, we weather the storm." This is a picture of the Christian: he endeavours to put himself in a certain position: "My hope and help are in God; He is faithful: 'weeping may endure for a night,' but 'I will bear the indignation of the Lord.'" The man who has learnt this piece of heavenly navigation shall weather the storms of time and of eternity; for he trusts a faithful God, and he shall find Him faithful. This confidence has supported thousands in perilous situations, where others would have given up all in despair.

(1926.) There are trying circumstances in which the only safety or confidence of a believer rest in walking by faith, and not by sight; in believing what the poet sings, how "behind a frowning providence," God hides a smiling face.

In ascending a lofty mountain, standing high above all its fellows, which the sun is the first to reach and the last to leave, I have seen the rock that crowned it cleft with storm, and its summit all naked and bare; and so, sometimes those who rise highest, and live nearest to God, whose heads are most in heaven, have often the bitterest cup to drink, and the heaviest burden to bear. What are they to do under such circumstances? I have known a timid traveller whose route lay across the Higher Alps, along a path no broader than a mule's foot-hold, that skirted a dreadful precipice, whence could be discerned the river far down below diminished to a silver thread; and on that dizzy precipice I have known a timid traveller who fancied it safest to shut her eyes, and not attempt to guide the course, nor touch the bridle—a fatal touch that would throw steed and rider over—till, bounding from shelf to shelf, they lay a mangled mass in the valley below. And there are times and circumstances in the believer's life when, if he would keep himself from sinful debts, if he would keep himself from falling into despair, he must, as it were, shut his eyes, lay the bridle on the neck of Providence, commit his way to God, and, however things may look, make this his comfort, "He will never leave me, nor forsake me."

—Guthrie.

15. It gives prevalency to prayer.

(1927.) In the several precedents of praying saints upon Scripture record, you may see how the spirit of prayer ebbed and flowed, fell and rose as their faith was up and down. This made David press so hard upon God in the day of his distress: "I believed, therefore I spake, I was greatly afflicted." This made the woman of Canaan so invincibly importunate; let Christ frown and chide, deny and rebuke her, she yet makes her approaches nearer and nearer, gathering arguments from His very denials, as if a soldier should shoot his enemy's bullets back upon him again; and Christ tells us what kept up her spirit undaunted: "O woman, great is thy faith!"

16. It stimulates to endeavour.

(1928.) See the spider casting out her film to the gale, she feels persuaded that somewhere or other it will adhere and form the commencement of her web. She commits the slender filament to the breeze, believing that there is a place provided for it to fix itself. In this fashion should we believingly cast forth our endeavours in this life, confident that God will find a place for us. He who bids us pray and work will aid our efforts and guide us in His Providence in a right way. Sit not still in despair, O son of toil, but again cast out the floating thread of hopeful endeavour, and the wind of love will bear it to its resting-place.

17. It brings deliverance.

(1929.) Beloved, ye all see into what sad times we are now fallen: there is no grace, I say, will stand us in more stead, or more able to turn away the evil that is now upon us, than faith is. Luther hath a notable story to this purpose: There was, saith he, a deadly contest between a great bishop, and a duke of Saxony: the duke of Saxony prepares for war against him: but before he would come upon him, he sends a spy to observe what the bishop was a-doing. The spy went: and being returned again; "Come," says the duke, "what is the bishop a-doing?" "Sir," says he, "he is idle, and secure, you may fall upon him and destroy him when you will." "Ay," says he, "but what says the bishop?" "Sir," he says thus: "I will feed my flock, I will visit the sick, I will preach the gospel; and as for the war, I will commit the whole weight and bulk of this war to God Himself, who fighteth for me." "Ay," says the duke, "did the bishop say so? Then," says he, "let the devil take up arms against him if he will, for I will not." Thus faith turns away the sword.

18. It is the secret of all heroic enterprises.

(1930.) History furnishes numerous illustrations. Christopher Columbus, if we have a right understanding of his personal character, was a man of a self-controlled and quiet spirit. The foundation of this subdued and immovable calmness of spirit, which supported him under immense labours, deprivations, and sufferings, was faith, undoubtedly. And it is very possible that it was, to a considerable degree at least, natural faith. That is to say, he had faith in his mathematical and geographical deductions; he had faith in his personal skill as a navigator; he had faith in his own physical and intellectual resources; he had faith in his personal influence over minds of less power; he had faith in his integrity of purpose. He felt, therefore, that he stood on a strong foundation; and this inward conviction, strengthened perhaps in some degree by religious sentiments, imparted both inwardly and outwardly that self-possessed and delightful calmness of spirit and manner, which is one of the surest indices of true greatness.

—Upham.

(1931.) Everywhere we find it to be true, that faith gives power. The history, for instance, of mechanical inventions, and of scientific improvements generally, furnishes an illustration of the subject. The labours of many persons, labours to which we are indebted for many of the most astonishing results in the mechanic arts and in the sciences, have been perseveringly and successfully prosecuted under circumstances of want, of opposition, and of ridicule. Nothing seemed sufficient to stop their efforts. And the inquiry naturally arises here, what was the secret of this remarkable perseverance, of this great energy, under circumstances exceedingly trying? Whatever incidental influences may have existed, one thing is certain, that one great element of their energy and perseverance was FAITH. They had faith in the value of the object; they had faith in the possibility of its being ascertained and realised; they had faith also in their ability to accomplish what they had undertaken to do. This was the secret (we do not say exclusively, but certainly in a very great degree), of their indomitable strength. When, therefore, at distant periods, we find individuals arising perhaps from the humblest walks of life, and accomplishing by their almost unaided efforts great results in science and the arts, the Franklins and Fultons of their generation, we may be assured that the element of natural faith, if not of any other and higher kind of faith, has sustained and invigorated the conceptions and efforts of natural genius.

—Upham.

19. It ennobles the whole life.

(1932.) One of the most piteous of things is to see how men live. I do not mean barbarians. I mean intelligent men. I mean men brought up by much care and culture. The world is piteous to live in, if this is the only world. If there is nothing but what is here, I do not wonder that the aspiring mind cries out, "We are of all men most miserable." But a Christian man, under precisely the same circumstances, has a ground transcendently higher. For if there be nothing for him that suits his ambition, or his yearnings, or his wants, here, he has the land beyond. He knows that he is but a stranger and pilgrim; and he comforts himself, as he goes through the wilderness, thinking of the home toward which he is travelling. And he weaves tapestries, and paints pictures, and carves various creations. Living as he does by faith, and not merely by sight, his imagining, his picture-painting, his idealising, his holy reverie, is filling the great empty heavens with all conceivable beauty. And what if it be evanescent? So is the wondrous frost-picture on the window; but is it not beautiful, and worth having? So is the summer dew upon the flower; but is it not renewed night by night? And faith is given to man to lift him above the carnal, the dull, the sodden, and to enable him to conceive beyond that to which any earthly realisation has yet ever attained.

—Becher.

(1933.) A transcendent faith, a cheerful trust, turns the darkness of night into a pillar of fire, and the cloud by day into a perpetual glory. They who thus march on are refreshed even in the wilderness, and hear streams of gladness trickling among the rocks.

—Chapin.

20. It gives calmness in death.

(1934.) When in your last hour (think of this) all faculty in the broken spirit shall fade away and sink into inanity—imagination, thought, effort, enjoyment—then will the flower of belief, which blossoms even in the night, remain to refresh you with its fragrance in the last darkness.

—Richter.

IV. SAVING FAITH.

1. Its nature.

(1935.) Every one that assents to the truth of what the Scriptures saith of Christ doth not believe on Christ. No, this believing on Christ implies an union of the soul to Christ, and fiduciary recumbency on Christ. Therefore we are bid to take hold of Christ (Isa. xxvii. 5), who is there called God's strength, as elsewhere His arm, "that we may make peace with God, and we shall make peace with Him." It is not the sight of a man's arm stretched out to a man in the water will save him from drowning, but the taking hold of it.

Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(1936.) Judas knew the Scriptures, and without doubt did assent to the truth of them, when he was so zealous a preacher of the gospel; but he never had so much as one denarius of justifying faith in his soul. "There are some of you which believe not, for Jesus knew from the beginning who they were that believed not, and who should betray Him." Yea, Judas's master, the devil himself, one far enough (I suppose) from justifying faith, yet he assents to the truth of the Word. He goes against his conscience when he denies them: when he tempted Christ he did not dispute against the Scripture but from the Scripture, drawing his arrows out of this quiver (Matt. iv. 6). And at another time he makes as full a confession of Christ (for the matter) as Peter himself did (Matt. viii. 22, compared with Matt. xvi. 17). Assent to the truth of the Word is but an act of the understanding, which reprobates and devils may exercise. But justifying faith is a compounded habit, and hath its seat both in the understanding and will: and, therefore, called a "believing with the heart" (Rom. x. 10), yea, a "believing with all the heart" (Acts viii. 37). It takes in all the powers of the soul. There is a double object in the promise; one proper to the understanding, to move that; another to the will, to excite and work upon that. As the promise is true, so it calls for an act of assent from the understanding; and as it is good as well as true, so it calls for an act of the will to embrace and receive it. Therefore he which only notionally knows the promise, and speculatively assents to the truth of it, without clinging to it, and embracing of it, doth not believe savingly, and can have no more benefit from the promise than nourishment from the food he sees and acknowledgeth to be wholesome, but eats none of it.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(1937.) How preferable is the light of the sun to the lustre of the moon! The former, while it illuminates the eye, and uncovers the elegant scenes of creation, warms the earth, and makes it fruitful, diffuses cheerfulness, and imparts enrichment to no fewer than six primary, and ten secondary worlds. As great is the difference between a cool historical faith that floats in a contemplative head and the faith of God's elect, which warms, invigorates, and purifies the members of Christ's Church. The former is a mere moonlight faith, which, however clear, so far as it goes, yet leaves us as cold and as barren as it found us. The latter, like the solar communications, enlivens and fertilises the soul, filling it with joy and peace through the power of the Holy Ghost; and adorning it with the flowers and fruits of grace.

—Salter.

(1938.) The difference between common and true faith may be thus illustrated. Suppose two persons to have been informed that the government had pledged itself to bestow a grant of ten thousand acres of land at the Swan River to any one who would settle there, subject to certain conditions as to capital and stock. The announcement is received by both parties, and believed. But the one is not moved to take any steps in consequence of it, the other hastens to fulfil the conditions, and actually goes out to take possession of the land. So the gospel report, and the blessings it is ready to bestow, are believed on, and their truth is not questioned by the nominal professor and the true believer; but the one is not influenced to adopt measures, or comply with the terms it proposes, in order to secure its blessings; but he who has the true faith takes effectual steps, and is careful to fulfil the conditions to obtain its blessings. —Salter.

(1939.) There can be little doubt that the conception of different kinds of faith, such as speculative and practical, historical and saving, &c., and, indeed, all the notions which have existed with reference to a difference in the act of faith itself, as put forth by a real Christian and a mere professor, owe their existence to a desire to account for the different effects of faith on different individuals. There are two men, both of whom appear to understand the gospel, and both profess to believe it. The conduct of one is regulated by its precepts, while that of the other is not. The conclusion has therefore been that the latter individual believes the gospel in the wrong way, or has not the right kind of faith; whereas the conclusion should have been that he believes the wrong gospel; or, in other words, that the thing believed is not the truth as it is in Jesus. No mistake can be greater than that which ascribes the difference in the results to some difference in the faith, understanding by the term the act of believing. For the practical effect of faith is, in all cases, to be ascribed not to the act of believing, but to the thing believed. I believe, we will suppose, that there are mountains in the moon; the belief is followed by no results, because the truth, to which credit is given, is not adapted to produce any. I believe that the roof of the house in which I am sitting is about to fall; I immediately rush out, because the truth credited is fitted to excite alarm, and precipitate retreat. I believe that God hath reconciled the world to Himself by Christ Jesus; I rejoice, and the joy springs from the report itself. It is not to be traced to the act of faith by which it is admitted into the mind; for that is the only instrument by which, in all cases, the truth to which credit is given is brought into contact with the mind. In vision it is the thing seen, and not the act of seeing, which produces the effect upon the mind. Just so it is in believing. It is the truth perceived and believed, and not the act of perceiving or believing it, that effects, in the hand of the Holy Spirit, so mighty a change in the experience and character of the individual who receives it. In reference to the three cases just alluded to, it is abundantly manifest that faith is not inert in the first instance and active in the second, because the approaching fall of the roof is cordially believed; for, if there were cordiality in either case, it would be surely in the former and not in the latter. And in the third case, though there is cordiality, that is, though the reports of the gospel is welcomed into the mind, the joy which subsequently pervades the mind is not to be ascribed to the manner of its entrance, but to the good news it brings.

—Payne.

(1940.) We all remember that poor man whom Jesus saw at Capernaum sitting to receive taxes and custom duties. Nothing can be shorter than the story as it stands: "He saith unto him, Follow me, and he arose, and followed Him." But I think it needs little sagacity to see that that which made this publican do what others of his degraded class thought not of doing, was not a clearer perception of evidences or probabilities, but a moral difference. He wished to become other than he was; some dissatisfaction which his present state had broken down the hedges which usage and prudence would mostly interpose against such a desertion of the calling by which one lives. Was it that he would no more minister to the oppressor above him who farmed the taxes, and grew rich out of the people? Was it that he could not endure the scowls of those in whose wrongs he was the agent? Was it that he had become sensible, from what he had heard of Christ's teaching, of the need of something better for his own soul than what his miserable vocation could furnish? At all events, it was a moral cause, for it altered at once all his life and prospects. It was not that he changed his opinion about Christ, and continued in other respects what he was before. It was an act of the will, and a strong one, which made him leave his office and his means of support, and cast himself upon a vague future, with no guide but Christ. This example serves to explain the share of the will in an act of religious faith. Faith is, as it has been objected, an intellectual act; but also it is a moral act in the next degree. How much or how little of our nature shall be implicated in our belief depends not on the nature of belief, but upon the objects of it. Last week we believed in an eclipse: it troubled no man's rest, it quickened no man's hopes, it roused no fears, as it might once have done. There was nothing in that object of belief to go down to the heart. Last week we thought that showers of cutting sleet would fall, and in deference to our belief we wrapped another garment round us, or planned a shorter walk. But to believe that a Father's care is over us, and that a higher life is waiting for us, and that a Son has taught us, and for our guilt has died, and that a life far more noble and beautiful than we thought is possible for us even here! Admit such thoughts in all their force of truth into the outer hall of our understanding, and their message shall ring through every passage and chamber, awakening them that sleep, and quickening with new strength the hands that hang down in despair. Belief is mere opinion! Yes; but a belief about God—about a Father not yet utterly estranged by all the meanness, selfishness, greedy self-seeking of one that He will still call His child—how shall such belief be limited to the mere understanding? No; the whole city within us is moved at His coming. Affections, feelings, bitter shames and regrets, fond longings after something better, all stir and troop forth at the mention of such a coming; and they strew their garments in the way, and throw down the torn branches in the way, and cry, Hosannah! save us! to Him that comes to them unexpectedly, blessed in the name of the Lord. Yes, belief is an opinion; but that God is and loves us is a great opinion, and it never dawns upon any understanding but for great issues.

—Thomson.

(1941.) This one thing I have noticed in everybody—the moment they come to a clear apprehension of the love of Christ, they turn right about upon the minister, or upon the Christians who have been labouring, perhaps for years, to bring them to that very point, and say, "Why didn't you tell us this before?"

Why, it's what we've been always telling them. I think that trying to point a man to the love of Jesus is like trying to show one a star that has just come out, the only star in the whole cloudy sky.

"I can see no star," says the man. "Where is it?"

"Why, there; don't you see?"

But the man shakes his head; he can see nothing. But by-and-by, after long looking, he catches sight of the star; and now he can see nothing else for gazing at it. He wonders that he had not seen it before.

Just so it is with the soul that is gazing after the Star of Bethlehem. Nothing in the world seems so hidden, so complex, so perplexing, as this thing; until it is once seen by the heart, and then, oh, there never was anything that ever was thought of that is so clear, so simple, so transcendently glorious! And men marvel that the whole world does not see and feel as they do.

—Becker.

(1942.) "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." Not in Christianity, but on Christ!

Mark that little yet great word on. It is not enough to believe in Christ Jesus. Millions of unconverted people believe in Jesus, just as they believe in Howard as a noble philanthropist, or in Washington as a pure patriot, or in Newton as a profound teacher of science. But they do not trust their souls to Jesus. They do not rest on Him for salvation. They do not build their hopes of heaven on Him. When a miner looks at the rope that is to lower him into the deep mine, he may coolly say, "I have faith in that rope as well made and strong." But when he lays hold of it, and swings down by it into the tremendous chasm, then he is believing on the rope. Then he is trusting himself to the rope. It is not a mere opinion—it is an act. The miner just lets go of everything else, and bears his whole weight on those well-braided strands of hemp. Now that is faith. And when a human soul lets go of every other reliance in the wide universe and hangs entirely upon the atoning Jesus, that soul "believes on Christ." That soul is intrusting itself to Jesus for guidance, for grace, for strength, for pardon, for final salvation.

Is not this the real core of faith? Is it anything else than simply trusting ourselves to Christ? Can there be a simpler, clearer idea of Bible faith than this? If so, we never have discovered it.

—Cuyler.

(1943.) Any faith in him, however small, is better than any belief about him, however great.

—George Macdonald.

2. Its object.

(1944.) As the act of healing through the eyes of the Israelites and the brazen serpent went together; so, in the act of justifying, these two, faith and Christ, have a mutual relation, and must always concur—faith as the action which apprehendeth, Christ as the object which is apprehended; so that neither the passion of Christ saveth without faith, nor doth faith help unless it be in Christ, its object.

—Cawdrey, 1609.

(1945.) Put yourselves upon the stream of the free grace of God, without having any foot on your own bottom; some men will learn to swim, and they are loth to lean themselves upon the stream of the water, but keep a foot at the bottom; and they never learn to swim, till they take up the foot: some would fain be evangelical, but they cannot lean themselves upon the stream of grace, but keep a foot at the bottom still upon something of their own.

Some there are that do, and work, and when they can work no further, then they eke it out with Christ's mediation. So indeed they make the mediation of Christ but an ekement to their own working, but away with these ekements! Oh, let Christ be all.

—Bridge, 1600–1670.

(1946.) Had the stung Israelites looked on any other object besides the brazen serpent, they had never been healed. Neither will the stung conscience find ease with looking upon any besides Christ in the gospel-promise. The Levite and the Priest looked on the wounded man, but would not come near him; there he might have lain and perished in his blood for all them. It was the good Samaritan that poured oil into his wounds. Not the law, but Christ by His blood, bathes and supple, cloeth and cureth the wounded conscience.

—Gurnall, 1617–1679.

(1947.) As the eye seeks for no other light than that of the sun, and joins no candles with it to dishonour the sufficiency of its beams, so no created thing must be joined with Christ as an object of faith. This is a dishonour to the strength of this Rock, which is our only foundation, this is to undervalue the greatness of the gift and the wisdom of the giver. It is a folly to seek for security anywhere else. Who would join the weakness of a bulrush with the strength of a rock for his protection? Who would fetch water from a muddy pond to make a pure fountain in his garden more pleasant? All other things are broken reeds under the most splendid appearances. Address yourselves only to Him, to find a medicine for your miseries, and counsel in your troubles.

—Charnock, 1628–1680.

(1948.) Nothing else of Christ can be the immediate and primary object of our faith, but His death. Nothing else but the priestly office of Christ and propitiation, and atonement He has made for sin (and thereby delivered us from the wrath to come), can be the formal object of faith in its first application. There are many things in Christ that faith afterwards considers, and that are worthy of our deepest inquiries and meditations; but this only is considered in the first application. What did the poor stung Israelites consider in their looking upon the brazen serpent? Did they consider it only as the figure of a serpent, or let their minds run out upon the excellency of the figure, the skill of the artificer, and the curiosity of the workmanship? These, indeed, to a sound man would have been a delightful employment; but as soon as ever he had been bitten, he would have laid aside all such thoughts, and cast his eye upon it, according to the intent of its elevation on the pole for the cure of his disease. What did the poor malefactor consider in his distress when he ran to the horns of the altar? He considered it only as a place of refuge, and not as a place of worship. A man in the first act of faith considers himself guilty before God, and in danger of eternal fire, under the dreadful displeasure of God by reason of his transgression of the law; he considers himself a breaker of that law, and consequently under the threatening and curse of it, and wishes for security from that fire; his conscience, by virtue of a violated law, flashes in his face. That, therefore, which prompts a man in this condition to go to Christ, is the belief and hope of a sure deliverance by Him. His great intentment is justification, freedom, and deliverance, and therefore he eyes Christ as a deliverer, and in that posture and method wherein He was a deliverer, i.e., as hanging upon the cross.

—Charnock, 1628–1680.

(1949.) Faith is described to be a “believing on the name of the Son of God,” viz., on His person. The promise is but the cabinet, Christ is the jewel in it which faith embraceth; the promise is but the dish, Christ is the food in it which faith feeds on. And as faith rests on Christ's person, so on His person under this notion, “as He was crucified.” Faith glories in the cross of Christ (Gal. vi. 14). To consider Christ as He is crowned with all manner of excellences, doth rather stir up admiration and wonder; but Christ looked upon as bleeding and dying, is the proper object of our faith; therefore it is called faith in His blood.

—Watson, 1696.

(1950.) To depend partly upon Christ's righteousness and partly upon our own, is to set one foot upon a rock and another in the quicksands. Christ will either be to us all in all in the quicksands, or else nothing at all; as He did the whole work, so He will have the whole praise. If He be not able to save to the uttermost, why do we depend upon Him at all? If He be, why do we lean upon any beside Him? If we lean partly on Christ and partly on ourselves, or our own good works, wishes, actions, or affections, we infallibly ruin ourselves. If a man set one foot upon dry land and the other upon deep water, and lean to them both with equal weight; yea, if he give any of his weight to the water, he will sink there. So here, if a person rest partly upon the merits of Christ, and partly, or in any degree, upon his self-righteousness for salvation, he will inevitably perish.

—Erskine, 1685–1752.

(1951.) The stupendous Falls of Niagara have been spoken of in every part of the world; but while they are marvellous to hear of, and wonderful as a spectacle, they have been very destructive to human life, when by accident any have been carried down the cataract. Some years ago two men, a bargeman and a collier, were in a boat, and found themselves unable to manage it, it being carried so swiftly down the current that they must both inevitably be borne down and dashed to pieces. At last, however, one man was saved by floating a rope to him, which he grasped. The same instant that the rope came into his hand, a log floated by the other man. The thoughtless and confused bargeman, instead of seizing the rope, laid hold on the log. It was a fatal mistake, they were both in imminent peril, but the one was drawn to shore because he had a connection with the people on the land, whilst the other, clinging to the loose, floating log, was borne irresistibly along, and never heard of afterwards. Faith has a saving connection with Christ. Christ is on the shore, so to speak, holding the rope, and as we lay hold of it with the hand of our confidence, He pulls us to shore; but our good works having no connection with Christ are drifted along down to the gulf of self despair. Grapple our virtues as tightly as we may, even with hooks of steel, they cannot avail us in the least degree; they are the disconnected log which has no holdfast on the heavenly shore.

—Spurgeon.

3. Is necessarily personal.

(1952.) In Gideon's camp every soldier had his own pitcher; amongst Solomon's men of valour every man wore his own sword; the five wise virgins had every one oil in her lamp. Luther was wont to say that there lay a great deal of divinity couched up in pronouns—as meum, tuum, suum (mine, thine, his). Thus, faith appropriated is all in all: a bird shall as soon fly with another's wings as thy soul mount to heaven by another's faith. Whosoever will go to God, whether it be in prayer or in any religious performances, he must have a faith of his own; it must be fides tua (thy faith). It is not enough to say, "Lord, Lord!" but to say, with David, "My Lord!" with Job, "My Redeemer!" with the blessed Virgin, "My Saviour!" not to say, "Credimus," but "Credo"—not "We believe," but "I believe in God." Every man must possess and be accountable for his own faith. When a man believes his own reconciliation by the merits of Christ Jesus, and strengthens this belief by a desire of pleasing God, this is fides sua, the right appropriation of faith.
—Spencer, 1658.

(1953.) It is not money in a rich man's hand, though offered to us, that will enrich us, unless we receive it. So it is not Christ's virtues or benefits will do us good, unless we receive them by the hand of faith.
—Watson, 1696.

(1954.) It is not a woman's believing a man to be rich and honourable, but her actual consent to take him for her husband, that makes marriage; so, it is not people's believing Christ to be a great and glorious Saviour, but actual reception of Him for theirs, that makes a spiritual marriage and union to Christ.
—Erskine, 1685-1752.

(1955.) What is needed on our part to make Christ's forgiving love our own? There must be the personal contact of my soul with the loving heart of Christ, the individual act of my own coming to Him, and, as the old Puritans used to say, "my transacting" with Him. Like the ocean of the atmosphere, His love encompasses me, and in it I live, and move, and have my being. But I must let it flow into my spirit, and stir the dormant music of my soul. I can shut it out, sealing my heart love-tight against it. I do shut it out, unless by my own conscious, personal act I yield myself to Him, unless by my own faith I come to Him, and meet Him, secretly and really as did the penitent apostle, whom the message, that proclaimed the love of his Lord, emboldened to meet the Lord who loved, and by His own lips to be assured of forgiveness and friendship. It is possible to stumble at noontide as in the dark. A man may starve outside of barns filled with plenty, and his lips may be parched with thirst though he is within sight of a broad river flowing in the sunshine. So a soul may stiffen into the death of self and sin, even though the voice that wakes the dead to a life of love be calling to it. Christ and His grace are yours if you will, but the invitations and beseechings of His mercy, the constant drawings of His love, the all-embracing offers of His forgiveness, may be all in vain if you do not grasp them, and hold them fast by the hand of faith.
—MacLaren.

(1956.) Multitudes of Christians as it were press upon Jesus Christ by hearing His word, receiving His sacraments, and performing the outward parts of religion; but few touch Him by a lively faith, by a true Christian life, by the prayer of charity, and by the meditation, love, and imitation of His mysteries.

—Quemad.

4. How it is exercised.

(1957.) As faith is called a trusting in God; so it is a practical kind of trust; and the principal trial of it lieth in forsaking all other happiness and hopes, in confidence of God's promise through Jesus Christ.

To open the matter by a similitude: Suppose that Christ came on earth again as He did at His incarnation, and should confirm His truth by the same miracles and other means; and suppose He should then tell all in the country, I have a kingdom at the Antipodes, where men never die, but live in perpetual prosperity; and those of you shall freely possess it who shall part with your own estates and country, and go in a ship of my providing, and trust me for your pilot to bring you thither, and trust me to give it you when you come there. My power to do all this I have proved by my miracles, and my love and will my offer proveth. How, now, will you know whether a man believe Christ and trust His promise or not? Why, if he believe and trust Him, he will go with Him and will leave all, and venture over the seas whithersoever He conducteth him, and in that ship which He prepareth for him: but if he dare not venture, or will not leave his present country or possessions, it is a sign that he doth not trust Him.

If you were going to sea, and had several ships and pilots offered you, and you were afraid lest one were unsafe, and the pilot unskilful, and it were doubtful which were to be trusted; when, after all deliberation, you choose one, and refuse the rest, and resolve to venture your life and goods in it; this is properly called trusting it. So trusting in God, and in Jesus Christ, is not a bare opinion of His fidelity, but a practical trust.
—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1958.) Oh, what a difference is there between this living faith in Christ, and the name of faith, which you presume upon! It is one thing for a man that is well to honour a physician, and another thing for a sick man to seek out to him, and beg his help, and willingly take anything that he giveth him. It is the common delusion of unconverted men, that they think that they believe in Christ already. This is a common belief that will never save them, and that they take up with, and look not after the saving faith. I cannot better open the difference to ordinary capacities, than by the aforesaid comparison. A man in health may truly believe that such a man is an able physician, and he may speak well of him and honour him. Now, suppose a man were deadly sick of a consumption, and did not know it; if this man honoureth the physician as much as any other healthful man, will this cure him, or save his life? No, but the patient that prayeth him to come to him, and will trust his life in his hands, and will take the bitterest medicine that he gives him, and will forbear any hurtful meat or drink, he it never so pleasant to him, this is he that is like to be healed by him. Christ is known among us to be the able Physician of souls; we all confess and praise His skill, and know that He can save us; we all hear of the freeness of His cure, that He takes nothing, but doth it, as soon for the poorest beggar as the greatest prince; but knowing all this, and speaking well of Him, will cure no man ; no, but you must go to Him believingly, and beg His help, and take Him for your Physician, and trust your souls upon His blood and Spirit, and apply His means, and take the bitterest cup that He shall reach you, and forsake the morsels of fleshly pleasure that have been sweet to you heretofore.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1599.) What, if all were as bad as thou dost fear, and none of thy sins were yet pardoned ; is not the remedy at hand ? Christ is willing if thou be willing. He offereth Himself and all His benefits to thee : He presseth them on thee, and urgeth thee to accept them. Why dost thou, therefore, stand complaining that thou art not pardoned and adopted, when thou shouldst take them, being offered thee ? Were he not mad that would lie weeping and wringing his hands, because he is not pardoned, when his prince stands by all the while offering him a pardon, and entreating, and threatening, and persuading, and correcting him, and all to make him take it ? Know ye not that pardon and adoption are offered you only on the condition of your believing ? And this believing is nothing else but the accepting of Christ for thy Lord and Saviour, as He is offered to thee with His benefits in the Gospel : and this accepting is principally, if not only, the act of thy will. So that if thou be willing to have Christ upon His own terms, that is, to save and rule thee, then thou art a believer : thy willingness is thy faith ; and if thou have faith, thou hast the surest of all evidences. Justifying faith is not thy persuasion of God's special love to thee, or of thy justification, but thy accepting Christ to make thee just and lovely. It may be, thou wilt say, "I cannot believe ; it is not so easy a matter to believe as you make it." Answer : Indeed, to those that are not willing, it is not easy, God only can make them willing. But to him that is willing to have Christ for King and Saviour, I will not say believing is easy : but it is already performed ; for this is believing. Let me, therefore, put this question to every doubting, complaining soul, What is it that thou art complaining and mourning for ? What makes thee walk so sadly as thou dost ? Because thou hast not Christ and His benefits ? Why, art thou willing to have them on the fore-mentioned condition, or art thou not ? If thou be willing, thou hast Him : thy accepting is thy believing : "To as many as receive Him (that is, accept Him), to them He gives power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on His name."

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1600.) The act of justifying faith lies in recumbency : we do rest on Christ alone for salvation. As a man that is ready to drown, catcheth hold on the bough of a tree : so a poor trembling sinner, seeing himself ready to perish, catcheth hold by faith on Christ the tree of life, and so is saved.

—Watson, 1696.

(1661.) To "receive" Christ, in the sense of Scripture, stands opposed to rejecting Him, or to such a non-reception of Him as was practised by the body of the Jewish nation (John i. 11, 12). An interest in spiritual blessings, and, of course, a persuasion of it, is represented as following the reception of Christ, and, consequently, is to be distinguished from it : "To as many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on His name." The idea that is generally attached to the term, in various cases, to which the reception of Christ bears an allusion, corresponds with the above statement. To receive a gift is not to believe it to be my own, though, after I have received it, it is so ; but to have my pride so far abased as not to be above it, and my heart so much attracted as to be willing to relinquish everything that stands in competition with it. To receive a guest is not to believe him to be my particular friend, though such he may be ; but to open my doors to him, and make him heartily welcome. To receive an instructor is not to believe him to be my instructor any more than another's ; but to embrace his instruction and follow his counsel. For a town, or city, after a long siege, to receive a king, is not to believe him to be their special friend, though such he may be, and in the end they may see it ; but to lay down their arms, throw open their gates, and come under his government. These remarks are easily applied.

(1662.) Every individual has full warranty to appropriate to himself the overtures addressed to the world. Only let a person announce to a multitude that all who come to him should receive a benefit, or that "whosoever," or any, or "every one" of them that would repair to a certain place should receive a benefit. It is not difficult to divine what will be the first thing in this case, as the effect of any one having believed the announcement. He will betake himself to the appointed place, and his alacrity in going will be just in proportion to his confidence in the honesty of him who made the promise. This may be applied to the faith of the gospel ; "eternal life" is held out as "the gift of God through Jesus Christ," and the way is prescribed by which to reach it. Now when the earthly benefactor in our supposed case scattered abroad among the multitude the promise of a certain benefit on their repairing to the appointed place, he did not bid them wait till faith was obtained before they moved. He bade them move, and they by instantly doing so prove that faith existed. These did not seek to ascertain their faith before rendering obedience ; by their obedience they ascertained their faith. So there are calls to obedience, and a man obeys them not by feeling inwardly for the faith, but by following outwardly the objects of faith. He must simply do what he is simply bid to do. A plain man is told what to hope for, and where to go for it, and without mysticism he hopes what he is told, and does what he is bid.

—Chalmers, 1780-1847.

(1663.) Faith says, if Thou wilt ; not, if Thou art able.

—Bengel.

(1664.) "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." Trust yourself to Christ and you are saved. That is what the Holy Ghost tells us through the lips of Paul.

This is an act—not simply an opinion. It is doing. It is a laying hold on Jesus. It is resting on Jesus. It is trusting Jesus to lead us, and going where He leads. What avails it to me to analyze Saratoga water, and to believe in its virtues. I must drink the water if I want its purifying power. And the soul that has not actually drank of Christ can never be purged of sin. Oh, thirsty, dying soul how long will you stand gazing at this precious water of life? Stoop down and drink! Saving faith is just as simple as drinking, if you will only try it.

—Cayler.

(1965.) A sea captain related at a prayer-meeting in Boston, a short time ago, a thrilling incident in his own experience. "A few years ago," said he, "I was sailing by the island of Cuba, when the cry ran through the ship, 'Man overboard!' It was impossible to put up the helm of the ship, but I instantly seized a rope and threw it over the ship's stern, crying out to the man to seize it as for his life. The sailor caught the rope just as the ship was passing. I immediately took another rope, and making a slip noose of it, attached it to the other, and slid it down to the struggling sailor, and directed him to pass it over his shoulders and under his arms, and he would be drawn on board. He was rescued; but he had grasped that rope with such firmness, with such a death-grip, that it took hours before his hold relaxed, and his hand could be separated from it. With such eagerness, indeed, had he clutched the object that was to save him, that the strands of the rope became imbedded in the flesh of his hands!"

Reader, has not God let down from heaven a rope to every sinner on the earth, is not every strand a precious promise, and ought we not to lay hold on it as for our very life?

(1966.) It was a time of spiritual awakening in a small manufacturing town. The foreman in a department of one of the factories became anxious about his soul. He was directed to Christ as the sinner's only refuge by many, and by his own master among the rest; but it seemed to be without result. At last his master thought of reaching his mind, and bringing him to see the necessity of God in the Gospel, by writing a note asking him to come to see him at six o'clock, after he left "the work."

He came promptly, with the letter in his hand. When ushered into his room, his master inquired, "Do you wish to see me, James?"

James was confounded, and holding up the note requesting him to come, said:

"The letter! The letter!"

"Oh," said the master, "I see you believe that I wanted to see you, and when I sent you the message you came at once."

"Surely, sir! surely, sir!" replied James.

"Well, see; here is another letter sent for you by One equally in earnest," said his master, holding up a slip of paper with some texts of Scripture written upon it.

James took the paper and began to read slowly: "Come—unto—me—all—ye—that—labour," &c. His lips quivered; his eyes filled with tears; and, like to choke with emotion, he thrust his hand into his jacket pocket, grasping his large red handkerchief, with which he covered his face, and there he stood for a few moments not knowing what to do. At length he inquired:

"Am I just to believe that in the same way I believed your letter?"

"Just in the same way," rejoined the master.

"If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater." This expedient was owned of God in setting James at liberty. He was a happy believer that very night, and has continued to go on his way rejoicing in God his Saviour, to point others to Calvary, and walk in the narrow way.

(1967.) How straight and simple is the way a child comes to Jesus! No doubt, no hesitation, only simple faith and perfect love. A little girl of my acquaintance was once looking at a picture, with which many of you may be familiar, which represents a rock in the midst of a stormy sea, bearing upon its summit a cross to which a female figure just recovered from the angry waves clings, faint and exhausted, while at her feet a hand, grasping a part of a wreck, is just disappearing in the black water.

"What does that mean?" asked the child.

"It is called 'The Rock of Ages,'" was the answer.—"That means Jesus to whom we cling for salvation."—"You know the hymn says, 'Other refuge have I none.'"

"Oh yes," said the child after a moment's hesitation, "but that rock isn't my Jesus; when I cling to Him He reaches down and clings too!"

Teach the little ones of this Jesus "who reaches down and clings to," to whom we hold, not so much from fear of falling, since underneath us are His everlasting arms; but because, like the trusting child whom the father safely carries, we love to cling, that we may draw Him closer.

(1968.) Little Alice was one of my Sabbath-school scholars—a fair-haired, blue-eyed little girl, whose beautiful face and sweet, winning ways made her a favourite with all. Methinks I can see now the soft, tender look of her mild eyes, fixed so earnestly upon me, as I endeavoured to impress upon her opening mind the Gospel plan of salvation.

One day I said to her: "Alice, what will you do when you die, and are called upon to stand before the judgment-seat of God, to answer for all the sins done here upon earth?"

Her face glowed with emotion as she answered: "Christ died for sinners; I will hide behind Him. God will not look at me; He will look at Christ."

Beautiful thought, to hide behind Christ, to lose ourselves in Him, and, casting aside our own impure works, to rest solely and entirely upon His finished work for salvation!

5. How it justifies and saves.

(1969.) Why hath God appointed the eye to see, and not the ear? Why the hand to take our food, rather than the foot? It is easily answered: because these members have a particular fitness for these functions, and not the other. Thus faith hath a fitness for the work of justification peculiar to itself. We are justified, not by giving anything to God,—what we do,—but by receiving from God, what Christ hath done for us. Now faith is the only receiving grace, and therefore only fit for this office.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(1970.) Some make works their righteousness; some make faith their righteousness: and they walk in this faith, not in Christ by faith; but it is not faith that saves merely, but Christ received by faith. As it is not the laying on the plaster that heals the sore, but the plaster itself that is laid on; so it is not our faith, or receiving of Christ, but Christ received by faith that saves us. It is not our looking to the brazen serpent mystical, but the mystical brazen serpent looked unto by faith, Christ received by faith, that saves us.

—Erschine, 1685-1752.

(1971.) What is the righteousness of God? What is the matter of it? Is it faith? I am asked by some one, Is it faith; forasmuch as in some of these passages it is called righteousness of faith? I answer No, in no wise; on no account. Faith is an act of man's own mind, whereas the righteousness of God is on a man—faith is the travelling forth of a sinner's emptiness to meet the Saviour's fulness; the Saviour's fulness is one thing, and the sinner's emptiness going forth to meet Him is another thing. Faith and the righteousness of God are not identical, for the text says, "it is on them."—I am asked by some, if these good works which flow from the exercise of faith in the Divine influence on the believing man, are the righteousness of God! I answer No! and I give this answer to the question for the same reason that I gave it to the other question—these good works are ours, just as the fruits gathered from the soil are called the fruits of the earth; they are the product of the influence of the sun, and rain, and dew, and a million atmospheric influences acting on the tree and the soil; and the fruits produced upon the tree are called the fruits of the earth; so those good works which are produced in the exercise of faith, as the result of a Divine influence on the believing man, are the man's, and he will be judged according to them at the last day; but righteousness is not man's, it is God's.

—Beaumont.

(1972.) Consider what faith is.—It is that strong buoy and confidence in God and His love which gives energy and spirit to do right without doubt or despondency. Where God sees that, He sees the spring and fountain out of which all good springs: He sees, in short, the very life of Christ begun, and He reckons that to be righteousness; just as a small perennial fountain in Gloucestershire is the Thames, though it is not as yet scarcely large enough to float a schoolboy's boat; and just as you call a small seedling, not bigger than a little almond peeping above the ground, an oak; for the word "justify" means not to be made righteousness, but to reckon or account righteous. Now observe, just as you count the seven springs to be the Thames, without a flood of waters, and without the navy that rides on the Thames, and just as you call the sapling an oak, without the acorns, so God reckons the trust in Him as righteousness, because it is the fountain and the root of righteousness, being indeed the life divine in the soul. He reckons it as such (that is, He justifies the soul that has it) without works—that is, before works are done, and not because of the works. But then that faith will not be without works; for the fountain must flow on, and the tree must grow, and the life of God in the soul, sanguine trust in God, the loving and good One, must spring up with acts; for to say that it does not would be to say that it is dead.

—F. W. Robertson, 1816-1853.

(1973.) Another mistake is sometimes perpetrated on the subject of faith. Many persons say faith now takes the place of works. The old law was, "justified by works; the new law, they say, is "justified by faith;" and they substitute the word "faith" for the word "works," and then as before. Now that is not the fact. Faith has no more merit than works; it is no more the ground of our acceptance than works. If it were so, we should be saved now by intellectual acumen, sifting and believing truth, instead of being saved by good works, paying the price of heaven, and so reaching it.

But that is absurd; it would be orthodoxy of creed as the ground of salvation, instead of orthodoxy of life as of old. How then does faith save us? It saves us as the instrument. If you put money into the hand of a poor man, it is not his hand that he thanks, but you. If you give bread to a starving man, it is not the trencher on which it lies that he thanks, but the donor. And when you obtain eternal life through faith, it is not faith that you thank, but the gift of that righteousness which is unto all upon all; and faith you recognise as a divine and precious instrument, that concurs with you in regarding Christ as all and in all.

—Cumming.

(1974.) Faith is receiving Christ into our emptiness. There is Christ like the conduit in the market-place. As the water flows from the pipes, so does grace continually flow from Him. By faith I bring my empty pitcher and hold it where the water flows, and receive of its fulness grace for grace. It is not the beauty of my pitcher, it is not even its cleanness that quenches my thirst: it is simply holding that pitcher to the place where water flows. Even so I am but the vessel, and my faith is the hand which presents the empty vessel to the flowing stream. Is it not grace, and not the qualification of the receiver, which saves the soul? And though I hold that pitcher with a trembling hand, and much of that which I seek may be lost through my weakness, yet if the soul be held to the fountain, that so much as a single drop trickle into it, my soul is saved.

—Spurgeon.

(1975.) It is often said that "faith is imputed for righteousness." But the special faith which justifies is faith in or on Christ Jesus. Its very essence, therefore, is trust upon Him and His sin-expiating and life-purchasing merits. Its very essence consists in its self-emptying, self-denying, Christ-grasping energy. The phrase to impute or reckon faith for righteousness represents no thinkable idea, unless it means to reckon as the righteousness of the sinner that righteousness which his faith trusts and appropriates. The mere act of leaning will never support a fainting man, unless he leans upon some object capable of supporting his weight. In that case it is the object which is reckoned his support, and not his act of leaning. The act of leaning is the same whether a man leans upon a broken reed or upon a rock, while the results differ. The act of trusting is the same whether a man trusts to a false foundation or to Christ. The difference in the result arises from the fact that the righteousness of Christ, upon which his faith reposes, is made his so far forth as to answer all the conditions and to secure all the rewards of the Covenant of Life.

—Hodge.

6. In what sense it is the gift of God.

(1976.) As the earth engendereth not rain, nor is able by its own strength, labour, or travail, to procure the same; but receiveth it of the mere gift of God from above: even so faith, grace, forgiveness of sins, and Christian righteousness, are given us of God without our works or deservings.

—Caudray, 1609.

(1977.) Is faith the gift of God? "Certainly," answers a chorus of theologians. What says the text? "By grace are ye saved, through faith, and that not of yourself, it is the gift of God." But a tyro in Greek knows that the pronoun translated "that" cannot refer to faith, and must refer to salvation by grace. Read the next verse. "Not of works, lest any man should boast!" What is not of works, faith, or salvation? To say that faith is not of works, is nonsense; to argue that salvation is not of works, is to do just what Paul is doing.

The grace of God, the pardon and sympathy and help of God, is God's free gift; it is nothing that we have earned or merited; it is gratuity; but the faith that appropriates the gift is not any part of the gift. God does not give us faith; He gives us salvation through faith, but we ourselves must believe. The Israelites in the wilderness might have said: "By this manna we are sustained through eating it; it is not any food that we have provided, it is the gift of God." But would that imply that the eating of the manna was the gift of God? The eating of the manna bore the same relation to the sustenance of the life of those who ate it, that faith bears to salvation. Faith is the act by which we appropriate God's forgiveness and God's saving help.

One who has just been rescued from drowning might say: "By the strength of this man I was saved, through taking hold of this rope. My deliverance from death was not wrought out by myself; I owe it all to my friend." But he would not by that testimony mean to imply that the taking hold of the rope was not his own act.

Salvation is a gift from God. But, as one has forcibly said, "a gift is not a gift until it is accepted." That which is forced upon another without his consent is not a gift, it is an imposition. A dose of medicine poured down the throat of an unconscious or a resisting patient is not in any sense a gift. The word implies two persons, one of whom is free either to bestow it or to withhold it; the other of whom is free either to accept it or to reject it. The act of accepting salvation is surely man's act, and that act is faith. The free act of God in bestowing salvation is grace; the free act of man in accepting it is faith.

—Gladden.

V. PROOFS OF ITS REALITY.

1. Holiness of heart and life.

(1978.) It was an unhappy division that has been made between faith and works. Though in my intellect I may divide them, just as in the candle I know there is both light and heat, but yet put out the candle, and they are both gone; one remains not without the other: so it is betwixt faith and works. Nay, in a right conception, fides est opus: if I believe a thing because I am commanded, that is opus.

—The Table Talk of John Selden.

(1979.) True faith is prolific, it brings forth fruit; faith hath Rachel's beauty and Leah's fruitfulness.

—Watson, 1696.

(1980.) True faith is never alone, but still joined with gospel-obedience: "As ye have received, so walk." He that would disjoin faith from obedience endeavours to walk with one foot, which is impossible. Faith and works, faith and holiness, are the two feet by which a man doth walk in Christ: and when the Spirit of Christ doth promote the one, He doth promote the other also. If a man should essay to go upon one foot, he could not walk, but only hop, which would be impossible for him to continue long in: neither can obedience be without faith, nor faith without obedience; but according to the measure of the faith, such will be the measure of the gospel-walk. As the fuller a vessel is the faster will it run over at the top; so, the fuller views a man gets of Christ, by faith, the faster will he run in the way of evangelical obedience.

—Erskine, 1685-1752.

(1981.) Many talk of practical religion in our day, but few know what it is to walk in it; they are like the lark that sings with the highest, but builds with the lowest: some sing with the highest, as if they were almost angels; but where do they build? where are their affections? where are their hearts, their aims, their ends? They are low, earthly, and sensual. You that profess to be friends to the gospel, oh, let the mouths that reproach religion be stopped by the power of religion in your walk. If the world call us Antinomians; "It is the will of God, that by well-doing we put to silence the ignorance of foolish men." We account them the greatest stars that give the greatest light; so men will account them still the greatest Christians that give the greatest light, by their gospel practice, in holiness toward God and righteousness toward men.

—Erskine, 1685-1752.

(1982.) Another reason why a gospel faith should have a gospel-practice is, because hereby the beauty of faith appears to others, and our light shines before men, so as they seeing our good works, do glorify God. The beauty of faith is seen by others, not in faith itself, but in the gospel-walk and practice that it produces. If a man would know in the morning whether the sun be risen in the east, he will readily look to the west, and see whether he can notice the reflection of the sunbeams upon the top of a house or the top of a hill; he looks the quite contrary way from the sun; and yet he does it ingeniously enough: even so here, if a man would know you to be a believer, he will not look into your faith, but will look out to your life, or look back to your conversation, and see what marks your faith makes there; hence saith the apostle, "Show me thy faith by thy works." Faith and works are contrary in point of justification, and yet when a man would see your faith, he will look to the contrary part, and see how it appears in your walk and work: and if it appears not there, the beauty of faith is not seen.

—Erskine, 1685-1752.

(1983.) There is a grievous error in inquiring whether we have faith, instead of seeking "the obedience of faith." A child called to receive an apple is at no loss to proceed. Yet the grounds on which he acts are not more obvious and apprehensible than are the doctrines of the Gospel, in which we are called to go forth to that heaven which stands with an open gate, and a waving flag of invitation in the perspective before us. The child is exclusively led on by its regard to the object. Still there is another process going on in the recesses of its little bosom, though unconsciously. But it would be quite preposterous to require the child to be quite sure that it had faith in the promise, before it does the plain thing that it is bidden. And it is childish folly to be inquiring whether we have faith, when we should be exclusively directing our attention to the object of promise, and going forwards at the voice of invitation.

(1984.) The faith which purifies the heart is an active moving thing. Stagnant waters are dead; springing waters are wont to be called "living." Fountains purify themselves: standing waters do not so. What doth your faith do? Doth it move your heart? Doth it transform? It is "with the heart man believeth unto righteousness." But when any must say, "My faith lets my heart lie as a dead thing still, as dead as a stone; an impure thing still;" is this, indeed, the faith upon which you will venture for eternity? A faith that effects nothing, a mere negative faith; to wit, a faith which only stands in not believing the contrary, or not disbelieving such and such things.

—Salter.

(1985.) So far from its being true that we have to trust only, to leave all in the hands of Jesus, having committed ourselves to Him, having put our faith in Him, we should now care more for His commandments than ever; we should feel more responsible than ever; we should feel that our obligations are heavier; and that, more than ever, we should be giving ourselves to the great work involved in the duties of the Christian life.

Take one or two human analogies, which, I think, aptly illustrate the case.

A sick man calls in a physician, in whom he has the most entire confidence. He believes that the physician can heal him: he commits himself into his hands. He tells him, "I leave it all with you; I am leaving it all with you." Well, is that all the sick man does? Does he, because he has left it all with the physician, do nothing more? Does not he listen to what the physician prescribes? Does not he take heed to follow the prescriptions? Does not he, just because he has such faith in the physician, does he not take care what he does, is he not careful about the medicines, is he not careful about the food he takes, is he not careful about the exercise prescribed to him, is he not more careful than ever he was just because he has such a very strong faith in this physician? If he were to say: "Now, I couldn't cure myself. I have tried many, and they couldn't cure me; and here is a physician at last who inspires me with confidence. He can, and will, cure me. I will give myself up to him; I will leave myself altogether with this physician, and do nothing at all,"—he could never get well—never, of course. But he never would do that. The more he trusted the physician the more attentive he would be to his prescriptions, the more careful he would be in his application, the more he would do, just because he had such a strong trust.

Or, a soldier is in a battle-field, and on the eve of battle, and his commander passes him by, and tells him to be of good courage and to trust in him, and he will go with and before him; he will carry him safely through, and give him the victory. And his words fire the soldier. He is full of confidence, cool and courageous in the front of the battle, because of his faith in the commander. But does that faith preclude his doing anything more?

Should he not do all the more because he trusts the commander? Does he not fight the more strenuously? Does he not go now as if everything depended on him, just because of the faith he has in his commander?

—David Thomas, B.A.

(1986.) "I am the way," says Christ. The way to walk in, not to look at, He means. If the night is overcast, if we are anxious to accomplish a journey, and a friend should hail us in the darkness, saying, "I am the way, or, "I will show you the way," we understand his meaning. We do not fold our hands and sleep. We rush into the night darkness, follow the sound of his footfall, and try to be so near as to catch the pantings of his breath. We follow, as we believe. Simple intellectual believing will never speed us on our journey, or bring us to a place of safety. So it is with Christ as the Way of Life.

2. Humility.

(1987.) Faith teacheth the creature to blot out his own name, and write the name of God in its room upon all he hath and doth. When the servants came to give up their accounts to the Lord, every one for his pound, those that were faithful to improve it, how humbly and self-denyingly do they speak! "Lord, Thy pound hath gained ten pounds," saith the first; "Thy pound hath gained five," saith another. Mark, not I have gained, but Thy pound hath gained ten, and five. They do not applaud themselves, but ascribe both principal and increase to God; Thy talent hath gained, that is, Thy gifts and grace, through Thy assistance and blessing, have gained thus much more. Only he that did least comes in with a brag and tells his Lord what he had done, "Behold, here is Thy pound which I have kept laid up in a napkin." Least doers are greatest boasters.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

—Ersine, 1685-1752.

(1989.) You may measure your faith and interest in Christ, not by the degree of your persuasion concerning Him as a Saviour, but rather by the degree of this virtue and power in you as a Lord; it is better to measure it by the depth of His work in you than by the height of your confidence in Him, which may be too proud and bold. If you should meet a man travelling upon the way, and should ask him how many hours high the sun is, you need not marvel, if instead of looking up to the sun to see how high it is, he should look down to your shadow to see how short it is; for he can tell that way better than looking upon the sun itself; even so, if a man would judge how much of Christ is in him, the best way to try is rather to look downward than upward; look into your heart, and see what dash your pride hath got, and what abatement your corruption is brought under; for the shorter these dark shadows are in you, the higher is the Sun of Righteousness. Now, the grand corruption of the heart of man, the great root-sin, which sets itself against Christ as a Lord, I will tell you what it is, it is that lord of all mis-rule, SELF; that is the lord that lords it over you; and all other sins are but the brats of Self; they are but under-servants to this great lord of self-love, self-pride, and self-righteousness. Now, a true believer is righteous by the righteousness of another; he lives by the life of another; he is acted on by the spirit of another; and, therefore, he, of any man in the world should have least of self in him; because Christ, as Lord, doth absolutely set Himself against this great corruption. And therefore, if you would know one excellent way of judging of Jesus Christ the Lord, His being in you, it is by the breaking and casting down of self; for the more full that a man is of self, the more empty is he of Christ; and the more full he is of Christ, the more empty he is of self; for the lord-self, and the Lord-Christ, cannot stand together: the lordship of Christ and the lordship of self are inconsistent: when you receive the Lord-Christ, then the lord-self is unthroned and thrown down.

VI. WEAK FAITH.

1. May be true faith.

(1990.) The little finger lives the same life as the hand or the foot does. So a weak Christian who has little grace, he lives by the same faith in Christ that is in glory, as well as they that are stronger.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(1991.) Diversity of degrees in quantity of a thing does not annihilate the existence and true being thereof. A small drop of water is as well and truly water as the whole ocean; a little spark is as true fire, both in respect of substance and quality, as well as a mighty flame; a little man is as truly a man as a great giant. And so a little faith is as well a true faith as a full persuasion.

—Downname, 1644.

(1992.) Though it be evident that divers of the saints mentioned in the Scriptures had a far greater measure of faith, and brought forth much more plentiful fruits than we can perceive in ourselves, yet this is no good reason to prove that our weaker and smaller faith is no faith, or ineffectual for our salvation. For this is an absurd consequence—The moon gives much less light than the sun, therefore it gives no light at all; one hand is far greater than another, therefore the lesser is not a true hand; this man excels another in the use of reason, and therefore the other is unreasonable. The divers degrees in the quantity of things do not take away the truth of their being and existence, so long as they are of the same nature and quality.

(1993.) Smoke is of the same nature with flame, for what is flame but smoke set on fire? The least spark of fire, if cherished, will endeavour to rise above the air, as well as the greatest: so, a little grace may be true grace, as the filings of gold are as good as gold, though nothing so much of it, as the whole wedge. A reed shaken with the wind is taken for a thing very contemptible at the best; how much more when it is bruised? The wick of a candle is little worth, and yet less when it comes to smoke, as yielding neither light nor heat, but only stink and annoyance, such as men bear not with, but tread out. So doth not God, who hath a singular sagacity, and can soon resent the least of provocations; yet the bruised reed He will not break, and the smoking flax He will not quench; nay, the very pantings, inquietations, and unsatisfiability in the matter of grace spring from the truth of grace, and are such as God makes high esteem of.

(1994.) If a prince say to a beggar, Go out of thy own country with me in this ship, and trust me to convey thee to Mexico or China, and I will make thee a lord or prince; if he venture and go with him, though he trembles with fear at every wave or pirate in the voyage, he truly trusteth him, and shall speed accordingly. If a physician say, "Trust me and take my medicine, and I will undertake to cure you," if the patient take his medicine, he shall be cured, though he tremble with fear, and doubt of the success: he trusteth him practically, if he cast his hopes upon him, though with fear. Though faith and obedience be formally two things, faith, which will cause us to consent, venture, and follow or obey Christ: preferring heaven, whatever we lose by it, is saving faith, whatever doubts, fears, or disquietment remain. If this were better understood, timorous and melancholy Christians (who know there is none but Christ to trust to, and therefore resolve to be ruled by Him) would not so ordinarily think they have no true faith, because it doth not cast out all their doubts and fears, and quiet and comfort them; which indeed a strong faith would do, which is not hindered by error or diseases.

—Baxter, 1615-1692.

(1995.) A weak faith may have a swooning fit, as to fail extraordinarily in an hour of temptation, so far as to deny Christ or shrink from Him in this fear: so did Peter; and not only he, but "all the disciples forsook Him, and fled." But yet he that, according to the habituated state of his soul, hath so much faith and love as will cause him to venture life and all upon the trust which he hath to the promises of the gospel, hath a true and saving faith. And here I desire all doubting Christians to lay by the common mistake in the trying of their faith or trust in Christ, and to go hereafter upon surer grounds. Many say, "I cannot believe or trust Christ for salvation, for I am full of doubts, and fears, and troubles; and surely this is not trusting God." The question is not, whether you trust Him perfectly, so as to have no fears, no troubles, no doubts; but whether you trust Him sincerely, so far as to venture all upon Him in His way. If you can venture all on Him, and let go all to follow Him, your faith is true and saving.

This would abundantly comfort many fearful, troubled Christians, if they did but understand it well; for many of them that thus fear would as soon as any forsake all for Christ, and let go all carnal pleasures and worldly things, or any wilful sin whatsoever rather than forsake Him; and would not take to any other portion and felicity than God, nor any other way than Christ and the Spirit of Holiness, for all the temptations in the world: and yet they fear because they fear; and doubt more because they doubt. Doubting soul, let this resolve thee; suppose Christ and His way were like a pilot with his ship at sea ; many more promise to convey thee safely, and many persuade thee not to venture, but stay at land : but if thou hast so much trust as that thou wilt go, and put thyself, and all thou hast into this ship, and forsake all other, though thou go trembling all the way, and be afraid of every storm and tempest and gulf ; yet thou hast true faith though it be weak. If thy faith will but keep thee in the ship with Christ, that thou neither turn back again to the flesh and the world ; nor yet take another ship and pilot (as Mahometans, and those without the Church), undoubtedly Christ will bring thee safe to land, though thy fear and mistrust be still thy sin.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1996.) Although the pearl of faith be small, it shines gloriously in God's eye. A goldsmith values filings of gold. That little spark in that smoking flax is a ray and beam of God's own glory. The greatest grace was once but as a grain of mustard seed. The oak was once an acorn. Abraham's faith was once in its infancy.

—Watson, 1696.

2. Is sufficient to save.

(1997.) As a little child doth as truly hold a precious ring with his finger as a giant with all the force of his hand, being one and the selfsame ring : so our faith, whether it be weak or strong, taketh hold upon the merits of Christ.

—Cawdray, 1609.

(1998.) Suppose that a prince be disposed to bestow on sundry malefactors a pardon, or some precious jewels (as signals of his civil respects) unto mere beggars, is not the one as fully acquitted from his offences, and the other made as actually rich by the possession of such jewels, though but received with a palsy-shaking hand, as they that receive them with one that is more strong and lusty ? Even so the case is here : Hast thou such a hand as doth reach out unto Christ, and the pardon of sins offered in and by Him, and dost clasp it about Him with all thy feeble strength—make no doubt but that thou art justified in the sight of God, and dost stand clearly acquitted from all thy sins. For it is the possession of the jewel, not the strong holding of it, that made those beggars rich ; and the king's pardon relieveth none but such as are willing to accept of it, and plead to it ; and so it is not our strong or weak faith that is our righteousness and full discharge before God, but Jesus Christ and His obedience—that is it that doth all. This only is required on our part, that we accept of Christ offered in the gospel, and rely on Him for full righteousness and redemption ; all which a weak and feeble faith doth as truly and entirely (if not more) as the strongest—nay, which is yet more for the comfort of such as are weak in faith, and cannot yet in an express and explicit manner believe on Christ, they have Christ, and enjoy Him unto righteousness, and the pardon of all their sins and transgressions committed.

—Bayne, 1617.

(1999.) We must understand that faith does not justify and save us by itself, as it is a virtue or faculty of the mind and heart, or in respect of its own excellency, quantity, and worthiness (for what were this but to embrace again the doctrine of the Papists which we have rejected, and to seek for justification in ourselves, and for our own merits and worthiness?), but as an instrument, whereby we lay hold of and apply to ourselves Christ with His righteousness and merits, by which only we appear just before God. A small and weak hand, if it be able to reach up the meat to the mouth, as well performs its duty for the nourishment of the body as one of greater strength, because it is not the strength of the hand but the goodness of the meat which nourishes the body ; so a weak faith laying hold of Christ, and, applying Him and His benefits to the believer, is sufficient to nourish him in everlasting life, as well as a stronger, because it is not the worthiness or excellency of the instrument, but of Christ which it apprehends that is effectual for our justification and eternal salvation.

A small and weak hand is able to receive an alms as well as a stronger and greater ; and a little eye sees the whole body of the sun, or some great mountain, as well as a bigger ; so our faith, though weak and small, apprehends Christ as truly and effectually for the salvation of the believer, as the greatest.

Our Saviour Christ compares Himself to the brazen serpent, and the believing Christian stung with the sting of sin to the Israelites who beheld it, to the end that they might be cured. (John iii. 14.) Now we know that all of them were not alike sharp-sighted ; but some were pur-blind, some blear-eyed, some saw it exceeding dimly. But as many as looked on it were cured and healed, though they were never so weak-sighted. So whosoever being stung with sin do look upon Christ with the eye of faith, resting upon Him alone for their salvation, though they be never so weak-sighted, yet they shall be restored to health and be eternally saved, because it is not in their sight but in the object thereof, Christ Jesus, to justify them before God, and to purchase for them eternal salvation.

(2000.) God accepts the will and earnest desire to believe for faith itself ; nor are we justified for the perfection of our faith, but for the perfection of that obedience which our faith apprehends. Among the Israelites stung with serpents, some (likely) had dim eyes, some were far off, yet by looking on the brazen serpent they were healed as well as the clear-sighted, to show that they were not cured for the virtue of their sight, but for the ordinance of God.

—Adams, 1653.

(2001.) The act of faith is to apply Christ to the soul ; and this the weakest faith can do so well as the strongest, if it be true. A child can hold a staff as well, though not so strongly, as a man. The prisoner through a hole sees the sun, though not as perfectly as they in the open air. They that saw the brazen serpent, though a great way off, yet were healed. The poor man's "I believe" saved him ; though he was fain to add, "Lord, help my unbelief." So that we may say of faith, as the poet of death ; that it makes lords and slaves, apostles and common persons, all alike acceptable to God, if they have it.

—Adams, 1653.

(2002.) A friend complained to Gotthold of the weakness of his faith, and the distress this gave him. Gotthold pointed to a vine which had twined itself around a pole, and was hanging loaded with beautiful clusters, and said : Frail is that plant ; but what harm is done to it by its frailty, especially as the Creator has been pleased to make it what it is : As little will it prejudice your faith, that it is weak, provided only it be sincere and unfeigned. Faith is the work of God, and He bestows it in such measure as He wills and judges right. Let the measure of it which He has given you, be deemed sufficient by you. Take for pole and prop the cross of the Saviour and the Word of God; twine around these with all the power which God vouchsafes. A heart sensible of its weakness, and prostrating itself continually at the feet of the Divine mercy, is more acceptable than that which presumes upon the strength of its faith, and falls into security and pride. Can you suppose that the sinful woman who lay and wept at the Lord's feet, was less approved than the swelling and haughty Pharisee? (Luke vii. 38.)—Scaver, 1629-1693.

(2003.) What can be more feeble than the ivy, the jessamine, or the vine? Yet these, by the assistance of their tendrils or claspers, rise and are supported, until they sometimes mount as high as the tree that sustains them. So the weak believer, laying hold on Jesus by the tendrils of faith, rises into the fulness of God, defies the storm, and becomes a fruitful vine upon the wall of an house.

3. Though weak, is of all things most precious.

(2004.) As a dim, dazzling (wavering) eye that looked on the brazen serpent in the wilderness, was of more avail to a poor Israelite then stung with a fiery serpent, than any use that could possibly be made of all his other members—little could the swiftness of his feet, strength of body, nimbleness of hands, volubility of tongue, quickness of the ear, or anything else have prevailed, had there not been an eye to have looked on it: so, without faith, we lie dead in sins and trespasses, and cannot but perish of the mortal stings which Satan hath blistered us withal; so that, had we perfect repentance, sound knowledge, and sincere love, not one of them, nor all of them together, could possibly cure us, if there were not faith to apprehend Christ for our satisfaction and propitiation for all our sins. It is only faith in Christ—a true faith, though a weak, dim-sighted faith—that, looking up to the typified serpent, Christ Jesus, can cure our wounded, sin-sick souls, and make us here to live unto God, and hereafter in all happiness with Him.

—Bayne, 1617.

4. There may be faith where there is no assurance.

(2005.) Faith is not assurance. If it were, Saint John might have spared his pains, who wrote to them that believe on the name of the Son of God, that they might know that they had eternal life. They might then have said, "We do this already." What else is our faith, but a believing that we are such as through Christ are pardoned, and shall through Him be saved?" But this cannot be so. If faith were assurance; then a man's sins would be pardoned before he believes, for he must necessarily be pardoned before he can know he is pardoned. The candle must be lighted before I can see it is lighted. The child must be born before I can be assured it is born. The object must be before the act. Assurance is rather the fruit of faith, than faith itself. It is in faith as the flower is in the root; faith in time, after much communion with God, acquaintance with the Word, and experience of His dealings with the soul, may flourish into assurance. But as the root truly lives before the flower appears, and continues when that hath shed its beautiful leaves, and is gone again: so doth true justifying faith live before assurance comes and after it disappears. Assurance is, as it were, the cream of faith. Now you know there is milk before there is cream, (this riseth not but after sometime standing), and there remains milk after it is fleted off.

How many, alas, of the precious saints of God must we shut out from being believers, if there is no faith but what amounts to assurance. We must needs offend against the generation of God's children, among whom some are babes not yet come to the use of their reflect act of faith, so as to own the grace of God in them to be true, upon the review that they take of their own actings; and must not the child be allowed to be a child till he can speak for himself, and say he is so? Others there are in Christ's family, who are of higher stature and greater experience in the ways of God, yet have lost those apprehensions of pardoning mercy, which once they were (through the goodness of God) able to have shown; shall we say their faith went away in the departure of their assurance? How oft then in a year may a believer be no believer? even as often as God withdraws and leaves the creature in the dark. Assurance is like the sun-flower, which opens with the day and shuts with the night. It follows the motion of God's face; if that looks smilingly on the soul, it lives; if that frowns or hides itself, it dies. But faith is a plant that can grow in the shade, a grace that can find the way to heaven in a dark night. It can "walk in darkness, and yet trust in the name of the Lord."

In a word, by making the essence of faith to lie in assurance, we should not only offend against the generation of God's children, but against the God and Father of these children; for at one clap we turn the greater number of those children He hath here on earth out of doors, yea, we are cruel to those that He is most tender of, and make sad the hearts of those that He would have chiefly comforted. Indeed, if this were true, a great part of gospel-provision laid up in the promises is of little use; we read of promises to those that mourn, "they shall be comforted;" to the contrite, "they shall be revived;" to him that walks in darkness (Isa. 1.) and the like:—these belong to believers, and none else; surely then there are some believers that are in the dark, under the hatches of sorrow, wounded and broken with their sins and temptation for them; they are not such as are assured of the love of God; but their mourning is turned into joy, their night into light, their sighs and sobs into praise.

5. How its strength is to be measured.

(2006.) Faith works by love, and therefore its strength or weakness may be discovered by the strength or weakness of that love it puts forth in the Christian's actings. The strength of a man's arm that draws a bow is seen by the force the arrow which he shoots flies with. And, certainly, the strength of our faith may be known by the force that our love mounts to God with. It is impossible that weak faith (which is unable to draw the promise as a strong faith can) should leave such a forcible impression on the heart to love God, as the stronger faith doth. If therefore thy heart be strongly carried out from love to God, to abandon sin, perform duty, and exert acts of obedience to His command, know thy place, and take it with humble thankfulness; thou art a graduate in the art of believing. —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

VII. MUST BE STRENGTHENED.

1. That we may not be overcome by temptation.

(2007.) The Christian's strength lies in his faith, as Samson's in his hair; if the uncircumcised one can deprive us of this, he may make sport enough with us. Hence it is that Satan's chiefest guns are shot against the royal fort of faith, knowing that that commands all; and if he can make a breach here, he fears not but to enter with success. The first mine which he ever sprang, to blow up the first Adam and his wife, and in them the whole race of mankind, was by weakening their faith: "If God said, In the day ye eat thereof, ye shall die?" When he came to the second Adam, he endeavoured to slay Him with the same sword; "If Thou be the Son of God, command that these stones, &c." —Swinnock, 1673.

(2008.) If thou wouldst preserve thy faith, labour to increase thy faith. None are in more danger of losing what they have, than those poor-spirited men who are content with what they have. A spark is sooner smothered than a flame; a drop easier drank up and dried than a river. The stronger thy faith is, the safer thy faith is from the enemy's assaults. The intelligence which an enemy hath of a castle being weakly provided for a siege, is enough to bring him against it, which else should not have been troubled with his company. The devil is a coward, and he loves to fight on the greatest advantage, and greater he cannot have than the weakness of the Christian's faith; didst thou but know, Christian, the many privileges of a strong faith above a weak, thou wouldst never rest till thou hadst it. Strong faith comes conqueror out of those temptations, where weak faith is foiled and taken prisoner. Those Philistines could not stand before Samson in his strength who durst dance about him scornfully in his weakness. When David's faith was up, how undauntedly did he look death in the face! (1 Sam. xxx. 6.) But when that was out of his heart, oh, how poor-spirited is he! ready to run his head into every hole, though never so dishonourably, to save himself! (1 Sam. xxi. 13.) —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2009.) There is as real a difference between the strong believer and the weak, or rather, I should say, between the believer who exercises strong faith, and the believer who has but a partial and weak faith, as there is among the armies that fight human battles, between the veriest coward that ever disgraced the standard under which he fought, and the bravest soldier who was the admiration of his friends and foes. For the one who exercises strong faith is ready to fight the strong fight of this world: on the contrary, the man who is not able to exercise faith in God's promises is scarcely able to hide himself from those foes which surround him: his thoughts are not in achieving victory—his state is not fit for fighting the good fight of faith—he is altogether occupied in resisting those temptations to which his unbelief is daily exposing him. —Baptist Noel.

(2010.) The ship does not ride the storm otherwise than by the hold her anchor takes of the solid ground. By that which lies in the calm depths below, as little moved by the waves that swell, and roll, and foam above, as by the winds that lash them into fury, she resists the gale, and rides the billows of the stormiest sea. But her safety depends on something else also. When masts are struck and sails are furled, and, anchored off reef or rocky shore, she is labouring in the wild tumult for her life, it likewise lies in the strength of her cable and of the iron arms that grasp the solid ground. By these she hangs to it; and thus not only the firm earth, but their strength also is her security. Let the flukes of the anchor, or strands of the cable snap, and her fate is sealed. Nothing can avert it. Powerless to resist, and swept forward by the sea, she drives on to ruin; and hurled against an iron shore, her timbers are crushed to pieces like a shell. And what anchor and cable are to her, the faith by which man makes God's strength his own is to believers in their times of trial. —Guthrie.

2. That all our other graces may be caused to flourish.

(2011.) The apostle says, "By faith ye stand." He does not say, by patience, or by hope, or the like. They are drawn from faith. Strengthen that, and strengthen all other that are infused from it. As a tree, we cast not water on the branches, but on the root. So strengthen faith. We strengthen love, and hope, and all, if we strengthen faith and assurance of God's love in Christ.

—Sibber, 1577-1635.

(2012.) The decay of a plant, though it appears first from the withering of the twigs and branches, yet it chiefly arises from a decay in the root. So the decay of grace may appear to the view, first in our company, carriage, speeches, &c.; but the primitive and original ground of the same is weakness of faith in the heart. Therefore it should be our wisdom, especially, to look to the feeding of the root.

—Sibber, 1577-1635.

(2013.) Christians are placed in this world in an inclement atmosphere; and there is as real a difference between him who exercises strong faith and he who is a weak and partial believer, as there is between the hardy and daring mountaineer when he carols in the mountain air and the poor consumptive sufferer who shivers in the summer breeze. The one is able to withstand no temptation, he is so languid; he feels that his soul is sick, he feels that he has nothing of the vigour and thriving of a well-ordered soul; whereas the other, who exercises strong faith, is growing more and more powerful, experiencing the promise of God: "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run, and not be weary; and they shall walk, and not faint." —Baptist Noel.

3. That our comforts may be increased and our peace perfected.

(2014.) As two ships sailing together, the one sound and well tackled, the other leaking and wanting sails, though both do arrive at the same port, yet not both alike disposed—the one comes in merrily and confidently, the other with much dif-

secularity and doubting: so the strong in faith doth singly travel towards heaven, goes on comfortably and with full assurance; when they of little faith do but, as it were, creep thither with many doubts, great fears, and small joy. And, therefore, as it is no wisdom for any man to continue poor that may be rich, or to live in fear when he may be free from it, so it is no point of wisdom, no piece of Christian prudence, for a man to content himself with a weak faith when by any means he may increase it.

—Williams.

(2015.) All the Christian's strength and comfort is fetched without doors, and he hath none to send on his errand but faith, which goes to heaven and knocks God up; therefore, when faith fails, and the soul hath none to go to market for supplies, there must needs be a poor house kept at home.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2016.) Strong faith frees the Christian from those heartrending thoughts which weak faith must needs be oppressed with. "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on Thee." So much inward peace and quietness. If little faith, then little peace and serenity, through the storms that our unbelieving fears will necessarily gather. If strong faith, then strong peace, for so the ingeneration in the Hebrew, peace, peace, imports. It is confessed that weak faith hath as much peace with God through Christ as the other hath by his strong faith, but not so much bosom-peace. Weak faith will as surely land the Christian in heaven as strong faith; for it is impossible the least drachm of true grace should perish, being all incorruptible seed; but the weak, doubting Christian is not like to have so pleasant a voyage thither, as another with strong faith. Though all in the ship come safe to shore, yet he that is all the way sea-sick hath not so comfortable a voyage as he that is strong and healthful. There are many delightful prospects occur in a journey, which he that is sick and weak loseth the pleasure of; but the strong man views all with abundance of delight; and though he wisheth with all his heart he were at home, yet the entertainment he hath from these do much to shorten and sweeten his way to him.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2017.) The saint's safety lies in the strength and faithfulness of God who is the promiser; but the present comfort and repose of an afflicted soul is fetched in by faith relying on God as such. Hence it is, though all believers are out of danger, when in the saddest condition that can befall them, yet too many of them, alas, are under fears and dejections of spirit, because their faith acts weakly on a mighty God, timorously and suspiciously on a faithful God: "Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith?" You see the leak at which the water came in to sink their spirits, they had "little faith." It is not what God is in Himself, but what our apprehensions at present are of God, that pacifies and comforts a soul in great straits. If a man fear the house will fall on his head in a storm, though it be as unmovable as a rock, yet that will not ease his mind till he thinks it so. Were a man under the protection of never so faithful a friend, yet so long as his head is full of fears and jealousies to the contrary, that he will at last leave and cast him off, this man must needs have an uncomfortable life, though without cause. You see, then, of what importance it is to keep up the vigour and vivacity of thy faith on the power and truth of the promises; and if thou meanest to do this, banish sense and reason from being thy counsellors. How came Abraham not to stagger in his faith, though the promise was so strange? The apostle resolves us, "He did not consider his own body" (Rom. iv. 19). And what made Zacharias reel? He made sense his counsellor, and thought he was too old for such news to be true. This is the bane of faith, and consequently of comfort in affliction. We are too prone to carry our faith with Thomas, at our finger ends; and to trust God no further than our hand of sense can reach. It is not far that sense can reach, and but little further that reason's purblind eye can see. God is oft on His way to perform a promise, and bring joyful news to His afflicted servants, when sense and reason conclude their case desperate.

4. How it is to be strengthened.

(2018.) The faith to which the Scriptures attach such momentous consequences, and ascribe such glorious exploits, is a practical habit, which, like every other, is strengthened and increased by continual exercise. It is nourished by meditation, by prayer, and the devout perusal of the Scriptures; and the light which it diffuses becomes stronger and clearer by an uninterrupted converse with its object and a faithful compliance with its dictates; as on the contrary it is weakened and obscured by whatever wounds the conscience or impairs the purity and spirituality of the mind.

—Robert Hall, 1764-1831.

(2019.) Activity in Christian life and work serves to defend and preserve the Christian faith. It does so because it is perpetually proving it. Christianity is a science. It is the knowledge of God. "This is eternal life, to know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom Thou hast sent. But Christianity is an applied science. It is a science put into daily and practical use; and the application of the science of the knowledge of God is walking with God. Now, it is with this just as it is with all other sciences, whenever you apply them practically. Every time you apply them successfully, it proves the truth of the science. Astronomy is a science. It teaches us the measurement of distances and the nature and movements of the heavenly bodies. Navigation is astronomy applied to practice; and by the help of what astronomy tells the sailor, he is able to steer his vessel from one port to another, and ascertain exactly from his chart the position of his vessel. Is it not clear that every time, out at sea, the sailor unfolds his map, and is enabled to mark on the chart the very spot where his ship is in the world's great space—every time he does that he has a fresh proof that astronomy is true? Every time he is able to bring his ship safely into port he has a fresh proof that science is true. And so with every practical art of life, whatever it may be. Every time science is worked out into your daily life, and you have a practical proof of its truth, your belief in the science becomes stronger and stronger. Can the sailor prove to us the truth of astronomy? There is many a captain or mate of a vessel who carries his vessel into port, who is quite sure his nautical tables are all true, although he cannot astronomically prove them. But he has a practical proof; and the oftener he avails himself of that, the oftener he tests the science, the surer he is that it is so. So with our faith. It is a Divine, an abstract, an abstruse, a very mysterious truth, if you attempt to resolve it into the proof of the One in Three, the Three in One,—the Trinity, the Incarnation, the Atonement. These are very mysterious things. How shall we prove them? We prove them as we find this to be true, that the faith that makes us know Him makes us know ourselves, and brings us into a nearer, and living, and a deeper communion with Him. The light from heaven shines upon the path, and as we take it step by step we feel a deeper and surer conviction that the light is from heaven. Prayer is a mystery—the deepest of all mysteries. Who can prove to us how and why prayer is answered? But who knows that prayer is answered? The man who has gone upon his knees before God and told Him all his needs; besought Him in his sorrow; cried for light in his darkness, and has risen up with a new light and a new strength that he knows has come from God. "So walk in Christ," so carry, so work, as it were, the Atonement, the Trinity, the Incarnation, the mysteries of your faith, into your life that they shall become living and continued proofs of the truth of your faith; and then that faith will have its daily proof from your daily life.

—Magee.

VIII. ITS RELATIONS TO OTHER FACULTIES, EMOTIONS, AND GRACES.

1. Sight.

(2020.) Some believe the better for seeing Christ's sepulchre; and when they have seen the Red Sea, doubt not of the miracle. Now, contrarily, I bless myself, and am thankful, that I live not in the days of miracles, that I never saw Christ nor His disciples. I would not have been one of these Israelites that passed the Red Sea, nor one of Christ's patients on whom He wrought His wonders; then had my faith been thrust upon me; nor should I enjoy that greater blessing pronounced to all that believe and saw not. 'Tis an easy and necessary belief to credit what our eye and sense hath examined: I believe He was dead and buried, and rose again; and desire to see Him in His glory, rather than to contemplate Him in His cenotaph or sepulchre.

—Sir I. Browne, 1605-1682.

(2021.) These three are like three members of the body—the hand, foot, and eye. Faith, like the hand, lays unremoved hold on Christ. Hope, like the foot, walks towards Him in a holy expectation, patiently enduring all wrongs, in hope of sweet issue. Sight, which belongs to the eye, shall fully apprehend Him, when it is glorified.

2. Reason.

(2022.) God does not expect us to submit our faith to Him without reason, or to subdue us to Himself by tyranny. But He does not intend to give us a reason for everything. And to reconcile these contrarieties, He is pleased clearly to show us those divine characters of Himself which may convince us of what He is, and to establish his authority by miracles and evidences that we shall be unable to resist,—in order that we might, afterwards, believe without hesitation whatever He teaches us, when we find no other reason to reject it, but because we are unable to know of ourselves whether it is true or not.

—Pascal.

(2023.) Religion passes out of the law of reason only where the eye of reason has reached its own horizon; and faith is then but its continuation, even as the day softens away into sweet twilight, and twilight, hushed and breathless, steals into darkness. It is night, sacred night; the upraised eye views only the stary heaven, which manifests itself alone; and the outward beholding is fixed on the sparks, twinkling in the awful depth (though suns of other worlds) only to preserve the soul steady and collected in its pure act of inward adoration to the great "I AM," and to "the Filial Word," that reaffirmeth it from eternity to eternity, whose choral echo is the universe.

(2024.) It is not scriptural, but fanatical, to oppose faith to reason. Faith is properly opposed to sense, and is the listening to the dictates of the higher part of our mind, to which alone God speaks, rather than to the lower part of us, to which the world speaks.

3. Fear.

(1.) There may be fear where there is no faith.

(2025.) Legal terrors are no parts of faith or conversion; they are neither essential nor integral parts. Those are essential parts which make up the essence of a thing, as soul and body are the essential parts of a man. Those are integral parts which make up the entireness of a thing, as the several members are integral parts of a man's body.

Those parts which give the essence to a thing begin with it, and continue with it while it is in being, but these terrors cease as soon as faith begins, and so they are no essential parts. A thing cannot be complete without its integrals; the body, when it wants some members, is lame, or maimed, or defective; but faith may be entire without these; it is not defective when these are vanished; so they are not integrals. They are so far from being parts, as they are no degrees of faith; though some step to it, yet not the least degree of it. As the dryness of wood is no degree of heat or fire which kindles the wood, though it tend something to make it kindle more easily; so these, though they may something dispose a man towards faith, yet they are not any degree of faith. The least degree of true faith is saving, but these humblings may be in those who shall never be saved.

(2026.) There may be the fear of hell, where there is not a spark of true faith; as we see in devils and reprobates. Their fear of the punishment of sin may take place, while their willingness to sin lives; and so this fear no more changes the inclination of their wills, than the whip or chain doth the nature of the fox or wolf. It is holy fear that works a godly sorrow, and it is this godly sorrow that brings forth those seven fruits you read of (2 Cor. vii. 11). And thus godly sorrow, which is the happy mother of so many good children, is caused, like Peter's weeping, by the looks of Christ. The reproofs, the frowns, the offences of a gracious God thaw the heart into melting fears, and would do so though there was no hell: as a meek child needs no other house of correction than his father's looks.

—Erskine, 1685-1752.

(2027.) Sea-going ships do not trust to themselves in the windings of a river. Where they are hemmed in between rock and quicksand, grazing now the one and now the other, they take care to have a steam tug, both to bear them forward and guide them aright. They hang implicitly upon its power. They make no attempt at independent action. But I have also observed, that as soon as they get clear of the narrows—as soon as they have attained a good offing and an open sea, they heave off, and hoist their own sails. They never want a steamer until they come to narrow water again.

Such is the trust in God which the unreconciled experience. In distress they are fain to lean on the Almighty. While they are in the narrows, death seeming near on every side, conscious that they have no power and no skill, they would hang on the help of a Deliverer. "My God, we know Thee" (Hos. viii. 2), is then their cry. Most devout they are, and most earnest. At every hour of their day and night they are exercised in spirit about pleasing God, and gaining this help in their need. The line of their dependence seems ever tight by their constant leaning. But when they begin to creep out of these shoals of life—when the path opens wide and clear and safe again, they heave off, and throw themselves on their own resources. They become a god unto themselves, whenever dangers are out of sight. Forthwith and henceforth they live without God in the world, until they are driven into straits again. Then they remember God and pray, as a distressed ship makes signals for help when she is entering a tortuous channel. This is not to have confidence in God. This is to provoke Him to anger.
—Arnol.

(2028.) Faith presupposes sense of misery. When the Lord brings a sinner to believe, He makes him thoroughly apprehensive of his miserable condition by reason of sin and wrath; he not only assents to it, but is sensible of it.

A man that has read or heard much of the sad effects of war, he may assent, believe that it is a great misery to be infected with war. Ay, but when the enemy is at his door, when they are driving his cattle, and plundering his goods, and firing his houses, he not only assents to it, but he sees, he feels the miseries of it; he has more sensible, more affecting apprehensions of it than ever.

A sinner that continues in unbelief, hearing the threatenings denounced against unbelievers, may assent to this, that unbelievers are in a miserable condition; but when the Lord is working faith, he brings this home to himself: he sees justice ready to seize on him, he feels wrath kindling upon him. He now not only believes it, but has a quick sense of it. He often heard how terrible the wrath of God is, but looking on it at a distance, it did no more affect him than a painted fire; ay, but now he feels the heat of it, it begins to kindle in his soul, and scorch his conscience. He heard of dreadful curses denounced against such and such sins, but he looked upon them as at a distance, as discharged at random; ay, but now he sees them levelled at himself, his soul in the butt, the mark to which those arrows are directed, and the poison thereof drinks up his spirits. He reads and hears the terrible things denounced against sin, as though he were another man, and is affected with them as though they were not the same things. He wonders at his former stupidity. This thunder is not afar off, but it startles him, as though he were even in the thunder-cloud.

Till it be thus in some degree, he will not come to Christ. The physician is neglected while the patient thinks himself in health. The whole, i.e., those that think themselves whole, see no need of the Great Physician. The malefactor will never sue for a pardon to purpose till he be (or apprehend himself in danger to be) condemned. No flying to this Stronghold, till there be some fear of pursuers. Lot would never have fled to the mountain, but that the country was all in a flame (Gen. xix. 28).

—Clarkson, 1621-1686.

(2029.) The helpless bird pursued by the kite, in danger to be devoured, runs under the wing of the dam. Thus it is with a sinner at the first working of faith, he apprehends himself pursued by wrath and judgment; he knows if they seize on him he must perish without remedy. Oh, the sad condition of such a soul! Oh! but he sees Christ spreading His wings ready to secure perishing sinners; he hears Him inviting in the gospel to come under His shadow. Oh, how sweet is that voice to him (however, while senseless he neglected)! He hears, obeys, and runs to Christ for shelter, and so he is safe: "How excellent is Thy loving-kindness, O God! therefore the children of men put their trust under the shadow of Thy wings."
—Clarkson, 1621-1686.

4. Repentance.

(2030.) The consideration of God's truth humbles us,—without it we would be fearless; the consideration of His mercy supports us,—without it we would be hopeless. Truth begets fear and repentance; mercy, fear and hope; and these two, faith and repentance, keep the soul even and upright, and steady, as the ballast and sail do the ship, that for all the rough waves and weather that encounter her in the troublesome sea of this world, she miscarries not, but arrives safe and joyful in the haven where she would be. Faith without repentance is not faith, but presumption, like a ship all sail and no ballast, that tips over with every blast; and repentance without faith is not repentance, but despair,—like a ship all ballast and no sail, which sinks with her own weight. What is it then we are to do to turn away God's wrath from us, and to escape the judgments He threatens against us? even this, as, in His comminations He joins mercy and truth together, so are we in our humiliation to join faith and repentance together. His threatenings are true, let us not presume of forbearance; but fear, since He has threatened, that unless we repent He will strike us. Yet His threatenings are but conditional, let us not despair of forbearance, but hope, although He has threatened, that yet if we repent He will spare us.
—Sanderson, 1587-1662.

(2031.) As a prisoner that lies in hold for debt, if a man should promise him that he would take order to pay his debts, and thereby discharge him of his imprisonment, he first believes that he is both able and willing so to do it, then he hopes for it, and lastly, he is, as it were, dissolved into love, ravished with the thoughts of such an unexpected relief, and therefore seeketh to do all things that may please him—so it is with a repenting convert : he first believes that God will do what He hath promised, that is, pardon his sins and take away his iniquities : then he resteth, that what is so promised shall be performed ; and from that, and for it, he leaves sin, forsaketh his old course of life, which was displeasing, and, for the time to come, maketh it his work to do that which is pleasing and acceptable in His sight.

(2032.) It is impossible that we should believe the doctrine of salvation by grace in an impenitent state of mind, or without feeling that we have forfeited all claim to the Divine favour. We cannot see things but as they are to be seen ; to suppose that we first believe in the doctrine of free grace, and then, as the effect of it, perceive the evil of sin, and our just exposedness to Divine wrath, is like supposing a man first to appreciate the value of a physician, and by this means to learn that he is sick. It is true the physician may visit the neighbourhood, or the apartments, of one who is in imminent danger of death, while he thinks himself mending every day ; and this circumstance may be held up by his friends as a motive to him to consider of his condition, and to put himself under his care. It is thus that the coming of Christ, and the setting up of His spiritual kingdom in the world, were alleged as motives to repentance, both to Jews and Gentiles. "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." "Repent ye therefore." "The times past of this ignorance God winked at ; but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent." But as it would not follow in the one case that the sick man could appreciate the value of the physician till he felt his sickness, neither does it follow in the other that faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ precedes such a sense of the evil of sin as involves the first workings of repentance toward God.

—Andrew Fuller, 1754-1815.

(2033.) The chief ground on which repentance toward God has been denied to precede faith in Christ in the order of nature, is, that no man can repent of sin till he entertain the hope of forgiveness. Nay, it has been said, "No man can repent unless he knows himself to be of God ; and as this cannot be known till he hath received Christ, faith must precede repentance." . . .

If the principle that supposes this argument be true, it will hold good in reference to men as well as to God. And is it true that a man who is under just condemnation for breaking the laws, and who has no hope of obtaining a pardon, ought not to be expected to repent for his crime, and, before he die, to pray God to bless his king and country ? On this principle, all confessions of this kind are of necessity mere hypocrisy. Even those of the dying thief in the gospel, so far as they respect the justice of his doom from his countrymen, must have been insincere ; for he had no hope of his sentence being remitted. What would an offended father say, if the offender should require, as the condition of his repentance, a previous declaration of forgiveness, or even of a willingness to forgive ? A willingness to forgive might be declared, and it would heighten the criminality of the offender if after this he continued hardened ; but for him to require it, and to avow that he could not repent of his sin upon any other condition, would be the height of insolence. Yet all this is pleaded for in respect of God. "If I be a father, where is Mine honour ?" Besides, how is a sinner to "know that he is of God," otherwise than as being conscious of repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ ? Till he is sorry at heart for having dishonoured God, he is not of God, and therefore cannot know that he is so.

(2034.) A discussion arose between some members of a Bible class, in reference to the first Christian exercise of the converted soul. One contended that it was penitence or sorrow ; another that it was fear, another love, another hope, another faith, for how could one fear or repent without belief ? Elder G——, overhearing the discussion, relieved the minds of the disputants with this remark :—"Can you tell me which spoke of the wheel moves first ? You may be looking at one spoke, and think that it moves first, but they all start together. Thus, when the Spirit of God operates upon the human heart, all the graces begin to affect the penitent soul, though the individual may be more conscious of one than another."

5. Holiness.

(2035.) Wouldst thou preserve thy faith, look to thy conscience. A good conscience is the bottom faith sails in ; if the conscience be wrecked, how can it be thought that faith should be safe ? If faith be the jewel, a good conscience is the cabinet, in which it is kept : And if the cabinet be broken, the jewel must needs be in danger of losing.

—Gurnall, 1611-1679.

6. Faith and Love.

—Luther, 1483-1546.

—Quarles, 1592-1644.

—Coleridge, 1772-1834.

(2039.) Faith is that nail which fastens the soul to Christ ; and love is that grace that drives the nail to the head. Faith takes hold of Him and love helps to keep the grip. Christ dwells in the heart by faith, and He burns in the heart by love, like a fire melting the breast. Faith casts the knot, and love draws it fast.

—Erskine, 1685-1752.

7. Faith, Hope, and Love.

(2041.) Faith is the chief gospel grace, the head of the graces ; as gold among the metals, so is faith among the graces. Alexandrinus calls the other graces the daughters of faith. Indeed, in heaven, love will be the chief grace ; but, while we are here militant, love must give place to faith : love takes possession of glory, but faith gives a title to it. Love is the crowning grace in heaven, but faith is the conquering grace upon earth, "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith."

—Watson, 1696.

IX. IN WHAT SENSE IT IS TO CEASE.

(2042.) There is contained in this rest (Heb. iv. 9), a cessation from motion or action ; not of all the actions, but of that which hath the nature of a means, and implies the absence of the end. When we have obtained the haven, we have done sailing. When the workman hath his wages, it implied he hath done his work. When we are at our journey's end, we have done with the way. All motion ends at the centre, and all means cease when we have the end. Therefore, prophesying ceaseth, tongues fail, and knowledge shall be done away ; that is, so far as it had the nature of a means, and was imperfect. And so faith may be said to cease : not all faith, for how shall we know all things past, which we saw not but by believing ? How shall we know the last judgment, the resurrection of the body beforehand, but by believing ? How shall we know the life everlasting, the eternity of the joys we possess, but by believing ? But all that faith, which, as a means referred to the chief end, shall cease.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

FEAR.

1. ITS USES.

1. The fear of God delivers us from the fear of man.

(2043.) Noah is commanded by God to make such a vessel as should save him and his from a flood which should drown all the world beside ; he sets upon the work ; the people laugh at him, and think the poor old man doted, and had dreamed, not, as we say, of a dry summer, but a wet winter, and that he was no wiser than the prior of St. Bartholomew's, who, upon the vain prediction of an addle-headed astrologer, went and built him a house at Harrow-on-the-Hill to secure himself from a supposed flood that that astrologer had foretold. Many a broad jest, many a bitter scoff was, no doubt, broken upon Noah ; yet, for all that, he went not only about, but through the work that God had enjoined : so did Abraham, Lot, David. And thus, he that truly feareth God careth not for the affronts of men. He is a fool, we say, that will be laughed out of his coat ; but he is a fool indeed that will be laughed out of his skin—nay, out of his soul, out of his eternal salvation—because he is loth to be laughed at by lewd and wicked men. No, not the true fear of God will make a man set light by such paper-shot ; it will carry him through the pikes, not of evil tongues only, but of the most eager opposition that either Satan himself or any limb of his shall at any time be able to raise against him.

(2044.) Religious fear, when produced by just apprehensions of a Divine power, naturally overlooks all human greatness that stands in competition with it, and extinguishes every other terror.

—Addison, 1672-1719.

2. It restrains us from sin.

(2045.) Fear is the great bridle of intemperance, the modesty of the spirit, and the restraint of gaieties and dissolution ; it is the girdle to the soul, and the handmaid to repentance ; the arrest to sin, and the cure or antidote to the spirit of reprobation ; it preserves our apprehensions of the Divine Majesty, and hinders our single actions from combining to sinful habits ; it is the mother of consideration, and the nurse of sober counsels ; and it puts the soul to fermentation and activity, making it pass from trembling to caution, from caution to carefulness, and carefulness to watchfulness, from thence to prudence, and by the gates and progresses of repentance, it leads the soul on to love, and to felicity, and to joys in God, that shall never cease again. Fear is the guard of a man in the days of prosperity, and it stands on the watch-towers and spies the approaching danger, and gives warning to them that laugh loud and feast in the chambers of rejoicing, where a man cannot consider by reason of the noises of wine and jest and music ; and if prudence takes it by the hand, and leads it on to duty, it is a state of grace, and a universal interest to infant religion, and the only security of less perfect persons ; and, in all senses, is that homage we owe to God, who sends often to demand it, even then, when He speaks in thunder, or smites by a plague, or awakens us by threatenings, or discomposes our easiness by sad thoughts, and tender eyes, and fearful hearts, and trembling considerations.

—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

3. It leads to self-examination.

(2046.) Holy fear is a searching the camp that there be no enemy within our bosom to betray us, and seeing that all be fast and sure. For I see many leaky vessels fair before the wind, and professors who take their conversion upon trust, and they go on securely, and see not the under water till a storm sink them.

—Salter, 1840.

4. It keeps us humble.

—Hooker, 1533-1600.

(2048.) The suspicions and fears which arise in an awakened mind proceed, in a good measure, from remaining unbelief ; but not wholly so, for there is a jealousy and diffidence of ourselves, a wariness, owing to a sense of the deceitfulness of our hearts, which is a grace and a gift of the Lord. Some people who have much zeal, but are destitute of this jealous fear, may be compared to a ship that spreads a great deal of sail, but is not properly ballasted, and is therefore in danger of being overset whenever a storm comes.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(2049.) In the hands of a skilful husbandman even weeds are turned to good account. When rooted up and burnt, they are good manure, and conduce to fertilise the land they annoyed before. So the doubts and fears and the infirmities of the elect are overruled by Almighty grace to their present and eternal good ; as conducing to keep us humble at God's footstool ; to endear the merits of Jesus, and to make us feel our weakness and dependence, and to render us watchful unto prayer.

—Salter, 1840.

II. ITS ABUSES.

1. Morbid fear enfeebles the soul.

(2050.) What a thrifty, robust plant is the potato when out in the field it grows beneath the sun. Its leaf so coarse and green, its stem so stout and succulent, it is a pleasure to look upon a thing which seems so to take hold of all the elements of life. But when it has sprouted in the cellar, which has but one north window, half closed, it is a poor, cadaverous, etiolated, melancholy vine, growing up to that little flicker of light ; sickly, blanched, and brittle.

Like the cellar-growing vine is the Christian who lives in the darkness and bondage of fear. But let him go forth, with the liberty of God, into the light of love, and he will be like the plant in the field, healthy, robust, and joyful.

—Becher.

(2051.) Fear is far more painful to cowardice than death to true courage.

—Sir P. Sidney, 1554-1586.

—Montaigne, 1533-1592.

2. It paralyzes effort.

—Becher.

(2054.) Is there no argument of fear and doubt in the New Testament ? Yes. "Let us," says the apostle, "labour to enter into that rest, lest any man fall after the example of unbelief." There is argument of fear, but is it to be a paralyzing, chronic fear ? Is it to be anything more than a motive for us to make our calling and election sure ? There is a kind of fear which spreads over the soul like a mist and fog. It neither rains nor is dispelled. Day and night it wraps the soul in its chilling and visionless embrace. That is a very disastrous form of fear. It is low, annoying, deadening. There is another kind which is like a sharp rain-storm in summer. A great deal of thunder and lightning comes with it, but it soon passes away, and everything is better for it. This kind of fear, instead of being deadening and paralyzing, is quickening and vitalising, and it brings a man to see how important it is that he should examine his ground and know that he stands. It is a kind of fear which, so far from being injurious, is to the last degree salutary.

While, then, there is in the gospel a recognition of the function of fear, it is also taught that with it, and in part by it, we are to come to a state in which we have an abiding confidence that our souls shall be saved through the Lord Jesus Christ.

—Becher.

3. Leads to superstition.

tened by nature and by religion, by infelicities or cares, by sudden accidents or a sad soul ; and the devil observing that fear, like spare diet, starves the fever of lust, and quenches the flames of hell, endeavours to heighten this abstinence so much as to starve the man, and break the spirit into timorousness and scruple, sadness and unreasonable tremblings, credulity and trifling observations, suspicion and false accusations of God : and then vice being turned out at the gate returns in at the postern, and does the work of hell and death by running too inconsiderately in the paths which seem to lead to heaven. But so have I seen a harmless dove made dark with an artificial night, and her eyes sealed and locked up with a little quill, soaring upward and flying with amazement and fear, and an undiscerning wing ; she made toward heaven, but knew not that she was made a train and an instrument to teach her enemy to prevail on her and all her defenceless kindred : so is a superstitious man ; jealous and blind, forward and mistaken, he runs towards heaven, as he thinks, but he chooses foolish paths ; and out of fear takes anything that he is told ; or fancies and guesses concerning God by measures taken from his own diseases and imperfections. But fear, when it is inordinate, is never a good counsellor, nor makes a good friend ; and he that fears God as his enemy, is the most completely miserable person in the world.

4. Ensures failure.

—Becher.

(2058.) You have probably noticed that when men walk across a stream on stilts, if they look at their feet to see where they step, their head begins to swim, and very soon they have to swim or drown ; whereas, if they fix their eyes upon a single object on the opposite bank, and never look at their feet at all, they reach the other side in safety. Now if a man stands looking at this world, he gets dizzy and intoxicated, and falls ; whereas, if he fixes his eye upon the bank of the eternal world, he walks straighter in this world, and is more sure of reaching the other side in safety.

—Becher.

III. IS MERELY REPRESSIVE IN ITS INFLUENCE.

(2059.) The fear of visible vengeance, that sometimes strikes the wicked, or the apprehension of judgment to come, may control the licentious appetites from breaking forth into actual commission of sins. But as when the lions spared Daniel, it was not from the change of their wild devouring nature, for they destroyed his accusers immediately, but from the suspending their hurtful power; so when a strong fear lays a restraint upon the active powers, yet inward lust is the same, and would licitiously commit sin, were the restraint taken away. —Salter, 1840.

(2060.) Just like a frost, fear will hinder the breaking forth of carnal lusts into notorious acts, as the cold of winter binds the earth that noxious weeds cannot spring up; but love, like the summer heat, is productive of all good fruits. —Salter, 1840.

IV. DISTINCTION BETWEEN LEGAL AND EVANGELICAL FEAR.

(2061.) But you will say, "May not a man that is of a gospel spirit, and that is come to Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant, be full of fears about his condition?"

I answer, He may; but his fears arise from the weakness of his adherence and faith. The other's fears rather arise from the weakness of the ground he stands upon. As for example: two men are afraid of drowning, one stands upon a rock, and he is afraid of being drowned; the other stands upon a quicksand, and he is afraid of being drowned; both are afraid. He that stands on a rock is afraid of drowning, why? because he is afraid he shall be washed off; his fear arises from the weakness of his adherence. But the other's fear arises from the unsoundness of the ground he stands upon, for it is upon a quicksand. So here are two fears: a gracious gospel-heart fear, and a legalist fear. One fears from the weakness of his adherence: I am upon the Rock, but I am afraid I shall be washed off. But the other's fear arises from the weakness of the ground he stands upon; he stands upon the quicksand, upon his own duties, and his own works. —Bridge, 1600-1670.

V. SLAVISH AND FILIAL FEAR.

(2062.) There is a virtuous fear, which is the effect of faith; and there is a vicious fear, which is the product of doubt. The former leads to hope, as relying on God in whom we believe; the latter inclines to despair, as not relying on God in whom we do not believe. Persons of the one character fear to lose God; persons of the other character fear to find Him. —Pascal, 1622-1662.

(2063.) There are two kinds of fear; one full of suspicious watchfulness, of anxious apprehension, of trepidation, terror and dismay; the other such as can dwell in the same heart with confidence and love, and is but another form of reverence. Filial fear of God is a duty; slavish and servile dread of Him is a sin. Filial fear shrinks from sin, servile fear only from the smart of punishment. Filial fear keeps men from departing from the living God, servile fear drives them from Him, even as it impelled our first parents to hide themselves amongst the trees when they heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the garden. By filial fear men are made like the Man Christ Jesus, upon whom rested "the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the Lord;" by servile fear they may be scared from iniquity, as the wolf from the sheepfold by the shepherd's gun, but it does no more to make them holy than the fright does to destroy the wolf's ferocity. Filial fear animates us to avoid whatever would be offensive to our Heavenly Father, and, if the expression may be allowed, to consult His feelings and desires; but servile fear, as it springs from selfishness, causes us only to care for ourselves, and at best makes us not better, but only a little more prudent than the devil.

—R. A. Bertram.

FEELING.

1. Is necessarily variable.

(2064.) No one's spirit is always in an equal degree of health and even complexion; the wheels do not always move with an equal swiftness; reflection on a state of sin and the blackness of transgressions sometimes make us shrink and tremble; the wonderful greatness of God's mercy, like the light of the sun, sometimes dazzles and blinds our eye. Yet if we believe in Him with all these palsies, it will go well with us. —Charnock, 1628-1680.

(2065.) Christians are creatures of changeable frames; sometimes high, and at others low, according to circumstances. When the health is firm, and all things agreeable to the feelings, then the frames are in the ascendant: when troubles come, then, like the mercury in the thermometer, the spirits sink—sometimes below zero.

Let us not calculate on steady frames in this ever-changing world: but let us take the comfort, that our salvation is not effected by our frames, nor depends upon our creature stability, but on the atonement of Christ and the faithfulness of Him who is "without variableness, or shadow of turning." —Bowden.

(2066.) "Mother,"—said a little limpet sticking to the rock; "mother,—what has become of the sea? I am so dry here!"

"Nothing unusual has taken place, dear," said the old limpet affectionately.

"Oh, it was so nice to be in the deep water," said the little one. "Is the sea all gone?"

"It will come again by and by, love," replied the kind old limpet, who had had long experience of ebb and flow.

"But I am so thirsty and almost faint, the sea has been away so long."

"Only wait awhile in hope, little one; hold fast to the rock, and the tide will soon come back to us."

And it did come, soon came; rolling up the beach, and humming over the sands, making little pools, and forming tiny rivers in the hollows; and then, it rolled up against the rocks, and at last, it came to the limpet; bathed it with its reviving waters; and so amply supplied its wants that it went to sleep in peace, forgetting its troubles.

Religious feeling has its ebbs and flowings. But when former sensible comforts are departed, still to hold fast unto the immovable, unchangeable Rock, Christ Jesus, is the soul's support and safety.

—Bowden.

(2067.) "What a lamentable change has taken place in my condition!" said the frozen brook. "Only a short while ago I ran along a lively stream, glistening in the sunshine, dancing in the shade, and doing my work with joyous pleasure; but now, alas! I am cold and motionless!—what a melancholy change has come over me; and oh! what if I should never recover from this torpor; never flow again!"

A sturdy oak, which had outlived a hundred winters, and now also stood bare and comparatively leafless, overhearing, tried to comfort it.

"Don't despair," said the oak, whose branches reached forward towards the sorrowing brooklet, "Don't despair; these changes are common to seasons and affect you now so powerfully because you are so shallow. As long as streams have been exposed to climates of this nature, they have endured what you now suffer. But, the glorious sun retains his power in the heavens; and depend on it, that by and by we shall both again feel his quickening influences—myself to put on a new dress of foliage, and you to flow with the freedom and freshness of the genial spring."

The old oak was not mistaken. In due time the sun poured forth bright beams from the sky. The atmosphere underwent a happy alteration. The air became soft and balmy. The little rivulet, too, had burst its icy bonds, and again coursed through the meadows, glittering in the sunlight, and leaped its way over the pebbles, "rejoicing as a strong man to run a race," till, in the end, it reached and united with the mighty ocean, and was no longer subject unto the ills which had so powerfully affected it while but a feeble rivulet.

The Christian has his wintry season, when, cold and lifeless, as it were, and lamenting the absence of former spiritual enjoyments, he prays, "O Lord, revive Thy work." "Quicken me in Thy way, according to Thy Word." "Lift Thou up on me the light of Thy countenance." "I will run the way of Thy commandments, when Thou shalt enlarge my heart."

How precious to know the Lord is in His place above—"Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever." "He giveth power to the faint; and to them that have no might He increaseth strength." And then at last, when the days of the believer's earthly warfare are ended, he shall endure no more changes; heaven will be his home, God his rest, "and sorrow and sighing shall flee away."

—Bowden.

2. The connection between faith and feeling.

(2068.) There is as much connection between faith and hallowed feeling as there is between the root and the flower. Faith is permanent, just as the root is ever in the ground; feeling is casual, and has its seasons. Just as the bulb does not always shoot up the green stem, far less is it always crowned with the many, many coloured flowers. Faith is the tree, the essential tree; our feelings are like the appearance of that tree during the different seasons of the year. Sometimes our soul is full of bloom and blossom, and the bees hum pleasantly, and gather honey within our hearts. It is then that our feelings bear witness to the life of our faith, just as the buds of spring bear witness to the life of the tree. Anon, our feelings gather still greater vigour, and we come to the summer of our delights; again, perhaps, we begin to wither into the scar and yellow leaf of autumn; nay, sometimes the winter of our despondency and despair will strip away every leaf from the tree, and our poor faith stands like a blasted stem without a sign of verdure. And yet, my brethren, so long as the tree of faith is there we are saved. Whether faith blossom or not, whether it bring forth joyous fruit in our experience or not, so long as it be there in all its permanence we are saved. Experience, if I may so speak, is like a sundial. When I wish to know the time of the day with my spirit I look upon it. But then there must be the sun shining, or else I cannot tell by my sundial what and where I am. If a cloud passes before the face of the sun, my dial is of little service to me; but then my faith comes out in all its excellency, for my faith pierces the cloud, and reads the state of my soul—not by the sunshade on the dial, but by the position of the sun in the heavens themselves. Faith is a greater and grander thing than all experience, less fickle, more stable. It is the root of grace, and these are but the flowers, the germs, the buds. Yet let us not speak against experiences; let us value them, for it is a grand thing to sit in the sunshine of God's presence; it is a noble thing to eat the grapes of Eshcol even while we are in the wilderness.

—Spurgeon.

3. Undue importance is not to be attached to it.

—Cawdray, 1609.

—Cawdray, 1609.

(2071.) The heir of a great estate, while a child, thinks more of a few shillings in his pocket than of his inheritance: so a Christian is often more elated by some frame of heart than by his title to glory.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

4. Not the measure of God's love for us.

(2072.) Measure not God's love and favour by your own feeling. The sun shines as clearly in the darkest day as it does in the brightest. The difference is not in the sun, but in some clouds which hinder the manifestation of the light thereof. So God loves as well when He shines not in the brightness of His countenance upon us as when He does. Job was as much beloved of God in the midst of his miseries, as he was afterwards when he came to enjoy the abundance of His mercies.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

5. It is neither possible nor desirable that it should always be intense.

(2073.) Our most exalted feelings are not meant to be the common food of daily life. Contentment is more satisfying than exhilaration; and contentment means simply the sum of small and quiet pleasures. We ought not to seek too high joys. We may be bright without transfiguration. The even flow of constant cheerfulness strengthens; while great excitements, driving us with fierce speed, both rack the ship and end often in explosions. If we were just ready to break out of the body with delight, I know not but we should disdain many things important to be done. Low measures of feeling are better than ecstasies, for ordinary life. God sends His rain in gentle drops, else flowers would be beaten to pieces.

—Becher.

(2074.) One of the things which men learn by a Christian experience is how to work from a lower intensity of motive-power. When young persons begin their course as Christians they are said to have exaggerated ideas. It is with a religious life as it is with colours. We laugh at negroes, Indians, and uncultivated people because they love flashy colours. It is true that their fondness in that direction is in part owing to their balance of organisation; but it is in a great measure owing to the fact that it requires intense excitement to make an impression on that faculty in them which appreciates colour. It is only by the most glaring yellows and reds that their sense of colour can be waked up. But as persons become cultivated, they take in lower tones, until by and by they have what is called an exceedingly refined taste. And what is the meaning of that? Simply that it does not take one-tenth part as much colour to excite the feeling of colour in them as at first. They see beauty in lower tones, because their susceptibility to colour is increased.

Now, Christian duty, in the beginning, requires intense specific moral feeling; but as the work goes on, and habit comes in, it does not require one-tenth part of the feeling to put a person on a certain course of conduct that it did in the beginning. His moral susceptibilities are so raised that less fire is necessary to make him boil.

A Christian is like a man who has been out in the cold all night, and is brought in chilled through. When he gets thawed out a little, he complains of the cold, and says, "I cannot keep warm," although the thermometer is up to eighty degrees, such is his reduced state. After a while the heat begins to penetrate his system, and he is stronger; and although the thermometer has gone down to seventy degrees, he says, "Why, I am sweating!" At last, when he is warmed through, and his accustomed vigour has returned, he can let the thermometer go down to sixty degrees, and not be as cold as when it was at eighty degrees. When the body is in a healthy state, it can work in a low temperature better than when it is unhealthy. And what is true of physical life in this regard is true of Christian life. Many Christians commit the mistake of wanting high feeling when it is against nature that they should have it. It is an ordinance of God that the sensibility of your soul should enable you to live and work well with low measures of joy and feeling, and that this should give a much more healthy Christian development than where there are high reaches of feeling that touch only one or two points. I have told you that it is well to live in an atmosphere of high religious feeling in the realisation of God's presence. So it is. But it is also true that the experience of Christian life should so educate and refine the soul in its moral sense that it can appreciate and make use of all the lower ranges of incitement.

—Becher.

6. Should not be separated from action.

(2075.) It is a perilous thing to separate feeling from acting; to have learnt to feel rightly without acting rightly. It is a danger to which, in a refined and polished age, we are peculiarly exposed. The romance, the poem, and the sermon teach us how to feel. Our feelings are delicately correct. But the danger is this:—feeling is given to lead to action; if feeling be suffered to awake without passing into duty, the character becomes untrue. When the emergency for real action comes, the feeling is as usual produced: but accustomed as it is to rise in fictitious circumstances without action, neither will it lead on to action in the real ones. "We pity wretchedness and shun the wretched." We utter sentiments, just, honourable, refined, lofty—but somehow, when a truth presents itself in the shape of a duty, we are unable to perform it. And so such characters become by degrees like the artificial pleasure-grounds of bad taste, in which the waterfall does not fall, and the grotto offers only the refreshment of an imaginary shade, and the green hill does not strike the skies, and the tree does not grow. Their lives are a sugared crust of sweetness trembling over black depths of hollowness: more truly still, "whited sepulchres"—fair without to look upon, "within full of all uncleanness."

—Robertson, 1816-1853.

(2076.) "I have often blamed myself," said Boswell, "for not feeling for others as sensibly as many say they do." "Sir," replied Johnson, "don't be duped by them any more. You will find these very feeling people are not very ready to do you good. They pay you by feeling."

A. P. Russell.

FORMS AND CEREMONIES.

1. Their necessity and value.

(2077.) The external part of religion is, doubtless, of little value in comparison with the internal; and so is the cask in comparison with the wine contained in it; but if the cask be staved, the wine must perish. If there were no Sundays or holy days, no ministers, no churches or religious assemblies, no prayers or sacraments, no scriptures read, or sermons preached, how long would there be any religion left in the world: and who would desire to live in a world where there was none?

—Lorne, 1730-1792.

(2078.) Forms are necessary to religion as the means of its manifestation. As the invisible God manifests His nature, His power, wisdom, and goodness, in visible material forms, in the bright orbs of heaven, in the everlasting hills, in the broad earth with its fruits and flowers, and in all the living things which He has made,—so the invisible soul of man reveals its convictions and feelings in the outward acts which it performs. As there could be no knowledge of God without the visible forms in which He reveals Himself, so there could be no knowledge of the religion which exists in the soul of man without the outward forms in which it expresses itself. A form is the flag, the banner, the symbol of an inward life; it is to a religious belief what the body is to the soul; as the soul would be utterly unknown without the body, so religion would be unknown without its forms, a light hidden under a bushel, and not set up in a candlestick that it may give light to all that are in the house.

Forms are necessary not only to the manifestation of religion, but to its nourishment and continued existence. A religion which expressed itself in no outward word or act would soon die out of the soul altogether. The attempt to embody truth and feeling, to express it in words and actions, is necessary to give it the character of living principle in the soul: in this respect forms are like the healthy exercise which at once expresses and increases the vigorous life of the body, or they may be compared to the leaves of a tree, which not only proceed from its inward life, but catch the vitalising influences of the light, the rain and the atmosphere, and convey them down to the root.

What, then, is that formalism which is everywhere in the scripture, and especially in the discourses of our Lord, described as an offence and an abomination in the sight of God? I answer, formalism is the substitution of the outward rite in the place of the inner spirit and life of the soul; it is the green leaf which still hangs upon the dead branch which has been lopped off.

—David Loxton.

(2079.) The Church must avoid all formalistic tendencies. Forms, creeds, liturgies are indispensable. Apples must have rinds; nuts must have shells; corn must have husks; rising walls must have scaffolding; and Christianity must have these outside forms and decencies. But mere outward proprieties will not make a useful Church.

—Talmage.

2. How their value is to be estimated.

(2080.) In every work are two things to be regarded; the end and the means. The thing is to be chosen as being good in itself; the means as being good for attaining that end. The husbandman sows not for the sake of sowing, but of procuring food for man. The factory is constructed, and the road laid down, with a view to something quite distinct from themselves: the clothing which the one is to prepare, the distant town which the other is to enable us to reach. There is a work of God to be done on earth through the Church; which, like all other works, can be understood only by looking to its end, and to its means severally. Its end is called in scripture man's being made "one with God," and thereby, also, one with his fellow-man. It is fulfilled in the condition of human spirits ruled by faith, that worketh by love; and in the harmony which this establishes in their relation one to another. The Gospel is committed to the Church as the grand means to this end being accomplished, both in and through the Church. But the Church as a body of men placed in circumstances, some common to all men, some temporary and local, must use this grand means in a vast diversity of methods and channels. Hence are preaching and teaching, arrangements for worship, variety of office, and ministration in the Church; whatever belongs to its ordering for the achievement of its great end. And, as in things natural, so in the grand spiritual society also, the means are good, because of their fitness to attain the end, and for no other reason: the machine for the work it does; the road for the ease and safety with which it takes us to our destination; the Church order and services for their aptness to strengthen and diffuse, in the Church and through the Church, the life of God in the soul of man, and at the heart of a human society.

—A. J. Scott, 1866.

(2081.) None, I suppose, will contend, if the principle of expediency, that is of fitness to an end, were admissible as a foundation for rules of the Church during scriptural times, that it is inadmissible now: that plans adopted for their usefulness' sake three thousand or eighteen hundred years ago, may not for usefulness' sake be changed for others at the present day. It seems hardly needful to say, that the evidence of expediency being the scriptural ground for such arrangements, would not in any instance be a reason for change, but only a proof of the lawfulness of change, if sufficient reason can be shown. What was suited to a given purpose in Judea, A.D. 34, may be the best way of effecting the same thing in England, A.D. 1845: then in the strength of such reasonableness let it abide. But if, on the contrary, being chosen for its adaptation to certain circumstances, these have passed away, its fitness has passed along with them; and therefore let it not abide. The sundial, if it stand now surrounded by walls that shut out the rays, must be shifted into the sunshine. If the sea has receded by miles from the ancient harbour, let every stone of it be carried down within the water-mark. The Church is too venerable in her primeval and eternal essence for her to need or to care to amuse an antiquarian curiosity with the maintenance of mere monuments of necessities that exist no longer.

—A. J. Scott, 1866.

(2082.) Those forms are best which have been longest received and authorised in a nation by custom and use. Sir W. Temple, 1628-1699.

(2083.) Forms of piety, judiciously used, keep up the life of piety. The nut that has too thick a shell will have a wasted kernel, and that which has too thin, will have its meat liable to accident and decay, while in due proportion the one will help the life and growth of the other.

3. Ancient forms are not needlessly to be revived.

—Fuller, 1608-1661.

4. Ancient forms are not necessarily serviceable now.

(2085.) True reverence for antiquity seeks a Church presenting the clearest image of eternity in the midst of the mutations of time. This she is to do by the inward vigour of the essential principles of her life, dropping off forms no longer useful, as the oak has done the leaves of last summer. The live oak abides the same by its vitality, while it changes form and dimensions by growth: the mass of squared timber has lost its power of assimilation, its command of resources; death enables it to remain unchanged in form, till death brings decay that changes form and substance. What is dead is changed from without—what lives changes from within. Even in forms and methods, the old is not to be set aside for being old; nay, this is of itself so far in its favour. Let its antiquity be considered as a reason, not as foreclosing all reasoning about it.

I am far from maintaining that there are no ordinances of the Church which are unalterable. What is adapted to humanity, as such, will abide through all periods of human history. Sometimes this eternal adaptation is watched over by express declaration of the authority which originally established the rule—sometimes by the wisdom bestowed on the succeeding ages, to discern that it is still suitable for them. Otherwise, the mere existence of a regulation in the Church, or its existence during the biblical ages, or the wisdom of the spirit in him who introduced it, or its express Divine authority at the season and in the place of its introduction, constitutes of itself no authority, divine or human, for that constitution abiding in the actual state of things. That a minister, for instance, wore a certain dress in the second century may be a good example for a minister in the nineteenth wearing a different dress: because that worn in the second may have been the ordinary dress of decent citizens, and to wear the ordinary respectable dress of our own time is to follow that example. But the priest who puts on the chasuble in the nineteenth century, appearing in a piece of strange antiquity to strike the beholder, acts on a contrary principle. With as good reason a modern soldier might think he resembled Julius Cæsar by instituting the balista and the ram in the place of field-pieces and battering-cannon, and in encountering a foe who used these new resources of war.

This mistaken formality in the use of tradition shows itself in all quarters. Because George Fox wore the homeliest common dress of his time, setting an example of thrifty simplicity, the modern Quaker must put on a dress which is not at all homely, and not at all common. Because Roman court-houses were granted centuries ago for the meeting-places of the Christian Church—which, for convenience, the Church thankfully accepted—churches nowadays must have the ground-plan of a Roman court-house, whether convenient or not. In short, because it was wise and good to act in a certain manner in certain circumstances, we fancy it wise and good to mimic the mere outward details of that procedure, when all the determining circumstances are changed: as if, because protection against rain in the great need of our climate, missionaries were to be prepared with garments of water-proof for the dry heats of Egypt: as if some traditional chemist were to apply, as a remedy for gunshot wounds, some proved antidote to the poisoned arrows of the Picts, with whom our ancestors made war at the venerable distance of fourteen hundred years.

—A. J. Scott, 1866.

5. Are powerless to revive a declining faith.

(2086.) To expect to revive a declining faith merely by multiplying ceremonies, is as hopeless as to multiply pumps in a dry well or to try to restore the dead by more garments. The life to refill these empty veins must come from another source. It must come by prayer, from the Spirit of God.

—Huntington.

6. A multiplication of forms is hostile to religion.

"Our adversaries call images and picture books to teach laymen; but the Scriptures tell us they teach a lie. And if they be layman's books, they are full of errata in every page,—yea, there are more errata than true lines. The best that we can say of any ceremonies brought into the Church by men (because people would endeavour to excuse the first Reformers) is, that they thought at that time they were required because of the dullness of men; for so they say in the preface to the Common Prayer-book—that it was to stir up the dull minds of men. But, mark, if it could possibly be imagined that there could be any use in them in the first Retormation (which, indeed, there was not, but rather they did hurt, and made men's minds more dull, as I dare appeal to you who have lived under such inventions of men in God's worship),—but if possibly (I say) there could be imagined any use of them at the first, they were at best but as horn-books and fescues [pointers] for the childhood and infancy of the Church. They say themselves that they needed such things, but they could have needed them only as children need horn-books and fescues. And is it seemly always to learn upon them? What knowledge will be acquired if, when you set your children to learn to read, they shall be kept ten, twenty, or thirty years to their horn-books? Now, thus would our prelates [to-day our Puseyites] have debased people to keep them continually to learn the knowledge of God by these their beggarly elements."

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

(2088.) The Christian dispensation is distinguished for its simplicity in the worship of God. Superstition delights in introducing carnal rites, and values itself upon its own opinionative goodness. These men mistake the swelling of a dropsy for a substantial growth, and presume themselves to be more holy than others, for their proud singularity. Superstition is like ivy that twines about the tree, and is its seeming ornament, but draws its vital sap, and under its verdant leaves covers a carcass. Thus carnal ceremonies seem to adorn religion, but really dispirit and weaken its efficacy.

—Salter, 1840.

(2089.) It is in the nature of a religion of many forms to degenerate into one of form. By occupying and indeed engrossing the attention of the worshipper they withdraw it from the state of his heart, and prove as pernicious to true piety as a superabundance of leaves to the plant whose sap is spent on feeding the leaf, to the detriment of the fruit: and perhaps some churches might be benefited by a free use of the knife with which the gardener prunes away the flush of green wood to increase the crop of fruit.

Let us never forget that forms are not religion, but only its drapery; and that, as they dress children lightly who wish to brace their frames, as the labourer throws off his coat to work, and as in the ancient games the candidates stepped into the racecourse unencumbered with many, or heavy, garments, the fewer forms which religion wears, consistent with decency and order, the more robust she will grow—she will work with greater energy—and, like one of the beautiful mould and symmetry, she will walk with more native, queenly grace—when

—Guthrie.

7. Scripture authority is not to be demanded for every minute detail of ecclesiastical arrangement.

(2090.) If any be so vain, as to demand a scripture-proof of this; [i.e., the keeping a register of the Church members], let him first bring me a scripture-proof that he may read with spectacles, or write a sermon from the preacher's mouth, or use notes in the pulpit, or print, &c., and then I will give him proof of this.

—Baxter.

8. The folly of an indiscriminating zeal concerning them.

(2091.) There are some matters of opinion and practice that are but in the skirts of religion and godliness, far from the heart of it, e.g., the less considerable questions about rites, order, discipline, &c. If these take up as much or more of the vitals of godliness, we are like but to make an inconsiderable improvement in the main. And then whatever our proficiency be in minute things, and such as are not material, it will turn to no great account when God comes to seek for fruit. If we be more busy about the fringe and lace than the body and soul of religion, or if that which is but as the hair be of more regard with us than the head of it, we may be fruitful in trifles, but barren in what is of greatest value and consequence. This is as if a gardener should take much pains in watering and pruning one small branch or sprig, but should do nothing at all to the main arms, or the body or the root of the tree. That is not the way to make it bear well.

—Clarkson, 1621–1686.

9. Are not to be enforced by penalties.

(2092.) I must confess I am still guilty of so much weakness as to be confident “that some things, not evil of themselves, may have accidents so evil as may make it a sin to him that shall command them.” Is this opinion inconsistent with all government? Yea, I must confess myself guilty of so much greater weakness, as that I thought I should never have found a man on earth, that had the ordinary reason of a man, that had made question of it; yea I shall say more than that which hath offended, viz. “That whenever the commanding or forbidding of a thing indifferent is like to occasion more hurt than good, and this may be foreseen, the commanding or forbidding it is a sin.” But yet this is not the assertion that I am chargeable with, but that “some accidents there may be that may make the imposition sinful.” If I may ask it without accusing others, how would my crime have been denominated if I had said the contrary? Should I not have been judged unmeet to live in any governed society? It is not unlawful of itself to command out a navy to sea; but if it were foreseen that they would fall into the enemy's hands, or were like to perish by any accident, and the necessity of sending them were small, or none, it were a sin to send them. It is not of itself unlawful to sell poison, or to give a knife to another, or to bid another do it: but if it were foreseen that they will be used to poison or kill the buyer, it is unlawful; and I think the law would make him believe it that were guilty. It is not of itself unlawful to light a candle or set fire to straw; but if it may be foreknown, that by another's negligence or wilfulness, it is like to set fire to the city, or to give fire to a train and store of gunpowder that is under the parliament house, when the king and parliament are there: I crave the bishop's pardon, for believing that it were sinful to do it, or command it; yea or not to hinder it (in any such case,) when “qui non vetat peccare cum potest, jubet.” Yea, though going to God's public worship be of itself so far from being a sin, as that it is a duty, yet I think it is a sin to command it to all in time of a raging pestilence, or when they should be defending the city against the assault of an enemy. It may rather be then a duty to prohibit it. I think Paul spake not anything inconsistent with the government of God or man, when he bid both the rulers and people of the Church, not to destroy him with their meat for whom Christ died: and when he saith that he hath not his power to destruction, but to edification. Yea, there are evil accidents of a thing not evil of itself, that are caused by the commander: and it is my opinion that they may prove his command unlawful.

But what need I use any other instances than that which was the matter of our dispute? Suppose it never so lawful of itself to kneel in the reception of the sacrament, if it be imposed by a penalty that is incomparably beyond the proportion of the offence, that penalty is an accident of the command, and maketh it by accident sinful in the commander. If a prince should have subjects so weak as that all of them thought it a sin against the example of Christ, and the canons of the General Councils, and many hundred years practice of the Church, to kneel in the act of receiving on the Lord's day, if he should make a law that all should be put to death that would not kneel, when he foreknew that their consciences would command them all, or most of them, to die rather than obey, would any man deny this command to be unlawful by this accident? Whether the penalty of ejecting ministers that dare not put away all that do not kneel, and of casting out all the people that scruple it, from the Church, be too great for such a circumstance (and so in the rest), and whether this, with the lamentable state of many congregations, and the divisions that will follow, being all foreseen, do prove the impositions unlawful which were then in question, is a case that I had then a clearer call to speak to than I have now.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

FRIENDSHIP.

1. Defined.

(2093.) Friendship is a strong and habitual inclination in two persons to promote the good and happiness of each other.

—Addison, 1672-1719.

2. Its pleasures and advantages.

(2094.) Friendship improves happiness, and abates misery, by the doubling of our joy, and the dividing of our grief.

—Cicero.

(2095.) A principal fruit of friendship is the ease and discharge of the fulness of the heart which passions of all kinds do cause and induce.

—Lord Bacon, 1560-1626.

(2096.) A man hath a body, and that body is confined to a place; but where friendship is all offices of life are, as it were, granted to him and his deputy; for he may exercise them by his friend. How many things are there which a man cannot, with any face or comeliness, say or do himself! A man can scarce allege his own merits with modesty, much less extol them; a man cannot sometimes brook to supplicate, or beg, and a number of the like: but all these things are graceful in a friend's mouth which are blushing in a man's own.

—Lord Bacon, 1560-1626.

(2097.) Heraclitus saith well in one of his enigmas, "Dry light is ever the best," and certain it is that the light that a man receiveth by counsel from another is drier and purer than that which cometh from his own understanding and judgment; which is ever infused and drenched in his affections and customs. So there is as much difference between the counsel that a friend giveth, and that a man giveth himself, as there is between the counsel of a friend and of a flatterer; for there is no such flatterer as is a man's self, and there is no such remedy against flattery of a man's self as the liberty of a friend.

—Lord Bacon, 1560-1626.

(2098.) A friend shares my sorrow, and makes it but a moiety; but he swells my joy, and makes it double. For so two channels divide the river, and lessen it into rivulets, and make it fordable, and apt to drink up at the first revels of the Syrian star; but two torches do not divide, but increase the flame. And though my tears are the sooner dried up when they run on my friend's cheeks in the furrows of compassion; yet when my flame has kindled his lamp, we unite the glories, and make them radiant, like the golden candlesticks that burn before the throne of God; because they shine by numbers, by unions, and confederations of light and joy.

—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

(2099.) Get some Christian friend (whom thou mayest trust above all others) to be thy faithful monitor. Oh, that man hath a great help for the maintaining the power of godliness that hath an open-hearted friend that dare speak his heart to him. A stander-by sees more sometimes of a man than the actor can do of himself, and is more fit to judge of his actions than he of his own; sometimes self-love blinds us in our own cause, that we see not ourselves as bad as we are; and sometimes we are over-suspicious of the worst of ourselves, which makes us appear to ourselves worse than we are. Now, that thou mayest not deprive thyself of so great help from thy friend, be sure to keep thy heart ready with meekness to receive, yea, with thankfulness embrace, a reproof from his mouth. Those that cannot bear plain dealing hurt themselves most; for by this they seldom bear the truth.

—Gurnall, 1617-1619.

(2100.) Love is the greatest of human affections, and friendship the noblest and most refined improvement of love.

—South, 1633-1716.

(2101.) Friendship is the shadow of the evening, which strengthens with the setting sun of life.

—La Fontaine, 1621-1695.

(2102.) Friendship hath the skill and observation of the best physician; the diligence and vigilance of the best nurse; and the tenderness and patience of the best mother.

—Lord Clarendon, 1608-1673.

(2103.) We learn our virtues from the bosom friends who love us; our faults from the enemy who hates us. We cannot easily discover our real form from a friend. He is a mirror, on which the warmth of our breath impedes the clearness of the reflection.

—Richter, 1763-1825.

—Robert Hall, 1764-1831.

(2105.) A man in adversity is like a shipwrecked and dismantled ship upon the desert strand, he needeth much reparation and outfit before he can be of use to any one. A man in prosperity is like a ship full-laden with costly goods, which is a prize to every one that is needed, and an honour to every one who has in her any share of interest. A man who is rejected and despised of the world is like a ship that is not seaworthy, in which no one will risk an atom of his wealth, and which proves a clog upon the course of any free and fair sailing vessel; whereas, a man whom the world embraceth with its favours, and who flourisheth in prosperity, is like a convoy ship, under whose lofty and unarmed sides many sail in safety.

Who is he that hath had the world set against him, or whom the world hath dashed from his anchorage ground, that hath not known, amidst these backwaters of the soul, the good and the strength of heart there is in a friend upon whom to fall back, and by whom to be received as into a haven, and fitted out again for another encounter? Happy is he who hath one into whose ear his soul may tell its calamities, show its weakness, and lay open its wounds; from whose lips it may receive the consolation and tender counsels it needeth; at whose hand accept the help, and if need be, the medicine which cures adversity, and whose bitterness is savoury when administered by the hand of a friend.

—Irving, 1792-1834.

3. True friendship is rare.

(2106.) Some, through a kind of lightness in them, use their friends like nosegays, which longer than they are fresh are in no reckoning.

—Bayne, 1617.

(2107.) The friendship of most men is like some plants in the water, which have broad leaves on the surface of the water, but scarce any root at all; like lemons, cold within, hot without; full expressions, empty intentions; speak loud, and do little; like drums and trumpets and ensigns in a battle, which make a noise and a show, but act nothing—mere friendship in pretence and compliment, that can bow handsomely, and promise emphatically, and speak plausibly, and forget all. But a true, real, active friend, whose words are the windows of his heart, σύμβολα παθήματα (the notifiers of his affections)—such a friend is rare and hardly to be found.

—Spencer, 1658.

(2108.) There are some drugs very wholesome, but very bitter, good in the operation, but unkind in the palate: as the common saying is, "wholesome, but not toothsome." Such are some friends in the world, real in their love, but morose in their expressions of it, that a man is almost afraid of their very kindnesses. But it is the good fortune of few to meet with a man who shall be as full of sweetness as fidelity, whose love is not like a pill that must be wrapped in something else before a man can swallow it, but whose candour and serenity make his love as amiable as useful to his friend; so that he may very well be said to deserve the character given to one of the Roman emperors, "Neminem unquam dimisisti tristem:" of such a disposition, made up of love and sweetness, of such a balsamic nature, that is all for healing and helpfulness.

—Spencer, 1658.

(2109.) People young and raw and soft-natured think it an easy thing to gain love, and reckon their own friendship a sure price of any man's; but when experience shall have shown them the hardness of most hearts, the hollowness of others, and the baseness and ingratitude of almost all, they will then find that a friend is the gift of God, and that He only who made hearts can unite them.

—South, 1633-1716.

(2110.) When a man shall have done all that he can to make one his friend, and emptied his purse to create endearment between them, he may, in the end, be forced to write vanity and frustration.

—South, 1633-1716.

(2111.) A long life may be passed without finding a friend in whose understanding and virtue we can equally confide, and whose opinion we can value at once for its justness and sincerity. A weak man, however honest, is not qualified to judge. A man of the world, however penetrating, is not fit to counsel. Friends are often chosen for similitude of manners, and therefore each palliates the other's failings because they are his own. Friends are tender, and unwilling to give pain; or they are interested, and fearful to offend.

(2112.) When Socrates was building himself a house at Athens, being asked by one that observed the littleness of the design, why a man so eminent would not have an abode more suitable to his dignity? he replied, that he should think himself sufficiently accommodated if he could see that narrow habitation filled with real friends. Such was the opinion of this great master of human life, concerning the unfrequency of such a union of minds as might deserve the name of friendship, that among the multitudes whom vanity or curiosity, civility or veneration, crowded about him, he did not expect that very spacious apartments would be necessary to contain all that should regard him with sincere kindness or adhere to him with steady fidelity.

So many qualities are indeed requisite to the possibility of friendship, and so many accidents must concur to its rise and its continuance, that the greatest part of mankind content themselves without it, and supply its place as they can with interest and dependence. —Dr. S. Johnson, 1709-1784.

4. True and false friendship.

(2113.) False friendship is like the ivy, decays and ruins the wall it embraces; but true friendship gives new life and animation to the object it supports.

—Robert Burton, 1556-1640.

(2114.) You may distinguish worldly friendship from that which is holy and virtuous, as the poisonous honey of Heraclea is known from the other: for as the honey of Heraclea is sweeter to the tongue than the ordinary honey, because of the juice of the aconite, which gives it an additional sweetness, so worldly friendship, ordinarily, produces a great profusion of sweet words, passionate expressions, with admiration of beauty, behaviour, and other sensual qualities, whereas holy friendship speaks a plain and sincere language, and commends nothing but virtue and the grace of God, the only foundation on which it subsists.

As the honey of Heraclea, when swallowed down, occasions a giddiness, so false friendship breeds a vertigo in the mind, which makes persons stagger in chastity and devotion, carrying them on to affected, wanton, and immoderate looks, sensual caresses, &c. But holy friendship has no looks but what are simple and modest; no caresses but pure and sincere; no sighs but for heaven; no familiarities but spiritual; no complaints but when God is not beloved,—infallible marks of honesty.

As the honey of Heraclea is troublesome to the sight, so this worldly friendship dazzles the judgment to such a degree that they who are infected, therewith think they do well when they do ill, and believe their excuses and pretexts for two reasons. They fear the light and love darkness. But holy friendship is clear-sighted, and never hides herself, but appears willingly before such as are good.

In fine, the honey of Heraclea leaves a great bitterness in the mouth; so false friendships change into lewd and carnal words and demands, or, in case of refusal, into injuries, slanders, imposture, sadness, confusion, and jealousies, which often terminate in downright madness. But chaste friendship is always equally honest, civil and amiable, and never changes, but into a more perfect and pure union of spirits.

—Francis De Sales.

5. Should neither be formed hastily, nor carried to excess.

—Solem.

—Downname, 1644.

(2118.) I will take heed both of a speedy friend and a slow enemy. Love is never lasting that flames before it burns. And hate, like wetted coals, throws a fiercer heat when fire gets the mastery. As the first may quickly fail; so the latter will hardly be altered. Early fruits rot soon. As quick wits have seldom sound judgment, which should make them continue; so friendship kindled suddenly is rarely found with durability of affection. Enduring love is ever built on virtue; which no man can see in another at once.
—Felltham, 1668.

(2119.) In the choice of a bosom friend, some respect ought to be had to his prudence. Some men, though holy, are indiscreet, and in point of secrets are like sieves—can keep nothing committed to them, but let all run through. A blab of secrets is a traitor to society, as one that causes much dissension. It is good to try him whom we intend for a bosom friend before we trust him; as men prove their vessels with water before they fill them with wine: if we find them leaking, they will be useless to that purpose. Many complain of the treachery of their friends, and say, as Queen Elizabeth, that in trust they have found treason; but most of these men have greatest cause, if all things be duly weighed, to complain of themselves for making no better choice. He is rightly served in all men's judgments, who has his liquor running out, which he puts into a leaking vessel or riven dish.

Too many are like the Dead Sea, in which nothing sinks to the bottom, but everything thrown into it swims at the top, and is in sight.

Companions of my secrets are like locks that belong to a house: whilst they are strong and close, they preserve me in safety; but weak and open, they expose me to danger, and make me a prey to others.

If thou hast found a man false once, beware of him the second time. He deserves to break his shins that stumbles twice at one stone. That proverb of the Italians is worthy of consideration: "If a man deceive me once, it is his own fault; if a second time, it is my fault." He had need to sit sure who backs that horse which once has cast his rider.

—Swinnoch, 1673.

(2120.) A long novitiate of acquaintance should precede the vows of friendship.

—Addison, 1672-1719.

(2122.) Real friendship is a slow grower, and never thrives unless engrafted upon a stock of known and reciprocal merit.

6. Should be formed only with the good.

—Adams, 1654.

(2124.) All company with unbelievers or misbelievers is not condemned. We find a Lot in Sodom, Israel with the Egyptians, Abraham and Isaac with their Abimelechs; roses among thorns, and pearls in mud; and Jesus Christ among publicans and sinners. So neither we be infected, nor the name of the Lord wronged, to converse with them, that we may convert them, is a holy course. But still we must be among them as strangers: to pass through an infected place is one thing, to dwell in it another. The earth is the Lord's, and men are His; wheresoever God shall find the merchant, let him be sure to find God in every place.
—Adams, 1654.

(2125.) It is thy interest to choose only the godly for thy friends. Others will one time or other prove false. These men will stick closer than a brother: Greet them that love us in the faith! such love will be firm. Ungodly men may be about us, as mice in a barn, whilst something is to be had; but when all the corn is gone, they are gone too; if thou ceasest to give, they will cease to love. When the weather is foul, as swallows, though they chattered about our chimneys, and chattered in our chambers, they will take their flight, and leave nothing behind but dirt and dung as the pledge of their friendship. Haman's friends, who when he was in favour were ready to kiss his feet, no sooner saw the king incensed against him, but they were as ready to cover his face, and help him to a halter. There is no faith in that man who has no fear of the great God.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(2126.) Hasten out of evil company, if thou hast no hopes of doing good. That company may well be to thee as the torrid zone, where wickedness sits in the chair, and religion is made a footstool. Though thou mayest pass through such a climate as thy occasions require, yet it is not safe to dwell in so unwholesome an air; men that are forced to walk by unsavoury carcases, hold their breath, and hasten away as soon as they can. It is ill being an inhabitant in any place where God is an exile.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(2127.) Birds of a feather will flock together. Servants of the same Lord, if faithful, will join with their fellows, and not with the servants of His enemy.

When a man comes to an inn, you may give a notable guess for what place he intends by the company he inquires after; his question,—"Do you know of any travelling towards London? I should be heartily glad of their company,"—will speak his mind and his course. If he hear of any bound for another coast, he regards them not; but if he know of any honest passengers that are to ride in the same road, and set out for the same city with himself, he sends to them, and begs the favour of their good company. This world is an inn, all men are in some sense pilgrims and strangers, they have no abiding place here. Now the company they inquire after, and delight in, whether those that walk in the "broad way" of the flesh, or those who walk in the "narrow way" of the Spirit, will declare whether they are going towards heaven, or towards hell. A wicked man will not desire the company of them who walk in a contrary way, nor a saint delight in their society who go cross to his journey. "Can two walk together except they be agreed?"

The young partridges hatched under a hen, go for a time along with her chickens, and keep them company, scraping in the earth together; but when they are grown up, and their wings fit for the purpose, they mount up into the air, and seek for birds of their own nature. A Christian, before his conversion, is brought up under the prince of darkness, and walks in company with his "cursed crew," according to the course of this world; but when the Spirit changes his disposition, he quickly changes his companions, and delights only in the "saints that are on earth."

—Swinnock, 1673.

(2128.) A Christian should always be giving good or taking good, and that company is not for him that will neither give nor take this. What should a merchant do where there is no buying or selling?

—Gurnall, 1607-1679.

(2129.) When a man is in a strange country a thousand miles off, it doth him good to meet with his own countrymen, and talk with them about his friends, and family, and his estate and inheritance, and home which he must return to; one hour of this discourse is sweeter to him than a hundred with the strangers of the country about matters that are little to him: so is it here; a Christian that knoweth he is a stranger in this world, and that his God, his salvation, his home, his inheritance are all in the world to come; he had far rather discourse with a heavenly-minded man about his Father and everlasting works and blessedness, than with worldly men about this world.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2130.) We insensibly slide into the manners of those with whom we daily converse and constantly live: we catch the flame of virtue from them, by being always near them. For goodness does not only communicate favours and kindness; it even in some measure communicates itself. Just as those who have been long among the most fragrant objects not only are delighted with the odour that breathes from them, some of the very fragrantcy cleaves to and remains with them; they become fragrant themselves by staying long among objects that are so.

—Ser, 1747.

7. Profitlessness of friendship with the ungodly.

(2131.) Such friends as are tied unto us in mere worldly bonds are not to be esteemed, for when the bonds are broken the friends are scattered: like chaff or some such light matter, which lies with the good wheat in the sunshine and calm, but separates itself and flies away when the least blast of wind blows; or like unto the reed which stands upright and seems stiff and strong in fair weather, but bows and bends any way when the storm comes. So these worldly friends, whilst the sun of prosperity shines, adhere to us and seem firm and constant, as though they would never leave us; but when the least tempest of trouble comes, and when the world seems to frown, they either hang down the head, and will not see us, or frame idle excuses why they cannot help us. Or, like Job's comforters, they make poverty a crime, and argue and infer our faultiness, because we are fallen into affliction. And therefore let us not make choice of such friends if we have them not, nor trust unto them if we have them. For like the reed they will bow and flee from us, when being almost drowned in misery, we labour to catch hold of them,—or else breaking in our hands will wound us when we rely upon them. Or like the briar, they will fleece us of our wool when we flee to them for succour. Or like an old ruinous house, when we come to them for protection against the storm, they will fall upon us and beat us to the ground with their oppressions.

—Downham, 1642.

(2132.) Worldly friends are like hot water, that when cold weather comes, is soon frozen. Like cuckoos, all summer they will sing a scurvy note to thee, but they are gone in July at furthest: sure enough before the fall. They flatter a rich man, as we feed beasts, till he be fat, and then feed on him.

—Adams, 1654.

(2133.) The leaves drop from the trees in the beginning of autumn; such is the friendship of this world: whilst the sap of wealth and honour lasts with me, and whilst I enjoy a summer of prosperity my friends swarm in abundance; but in the winter of adversity they will leave me naked. Oh, how miserable is that person who has no friend but of this world.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(2134.) The heat and light of a wicked man's love, as a lamp, is fed with and flows from some earthly substance, and is extinguished when that is denied; but the heat and light of a saint's friendship, as the solar rays, spring from a heavenly cause, and therefore will continue.

My ungodly companion may abound in frothy words, but I must expect no faithful deeds from him, if ever I come to sufferings. Like a drum in a battle, he may make a grand sound, but will act nothing for my succour. Like a cipher, though now in prosperity he stands for thousands, in any adversity he will stand for nothing.

—Swinnoch, 1673.

(2135.) If I converse with great or rich men, what disdainful looks do they give me! at what a distance do they behold me! It is hard to obtain the liberty of speaking to them; but if I would obtain their favour, it will cost me more than it did the chief captain for his Roman freedom; unless I can gratify their lusts, I must not expect their love. Their friendship can hardly be got without a breach with my God; and what wise man would lose the good will of the Lord for the gain of the whole world? When I have by many friends, and with much difficulty, and even danger to my soul, procured their favour, how little am I the better for it! The most rotten tree is not so hollow; for, as cunning wrestlers, they will get within me to give me a fall. The wind itself is not more wavering than they are; except I can be contented to be their footstool, that by their treading upon me, they may be lifted higher in the world, I must expect to be quite cast by. It is possible, whilst they may make some use of me to decoy and trepan others, or to raise and advance themselves, they may carry me upon their shoulders, as men do their ladders, when there is hope thereby of climbing to their desired heights; but when that is done, or if the ladder prove too short, they will throw it upon the ground!

—Swinnoch, 1673.

(2136.) Friendship contracted with the wicked decreases from hour to hour, like the early shadow of the morning; but friendship with the virtuous will increase like the shadow of the evening, till the sun of life shall set.

—Herder.

(2137.) Such amities, being but transitory, melt away like snow in the sun.

—Salus.

8. Perilousness of friendship with the ungodly.

—Cawdray, 1609.

with him one that is ascending, than he who is going up can cause him to ascend that is running down: so he who holds an headlong course in wickedness can more easily carry with him one that is ascending the hill of virtue, being a motion contrary to natural disposition, than he can cause him to ascend with him. For in common experience we see, that the worse state prevails more in altering the better to its condition, than the better to make the worse like itself. The infected are not so soon cured by the sound, as they are tainted with their contagion. Rotten apples lying with the sound are not restored to soundness, but the sound are corrupted with their rottenness. Dead carcases united to living bodies are not thereby revived, unless it be by miracle, as we see in Elijah and Peter; but the living, if they continue any time united to the dead, partake with them in their mortality and corruption. And thus it is in our spiritual state, wherein the worse more prevails to corrupt the better, than the better to reform the worse.

—Downname, 1644.

(2140.) "That friendship," says Basil, "is very harmful which is contracted with maliciousness. For it is the law and condition of this friendship, by a similitude of nature, to infuse wickedness into those who are in amity with them. For as in pestilential places, the air stealingly, and by little and little, infects the whole body with a hidden disease; so through wicked acquaintance, we suck in manifold evils, although we do not presently perceive the discommodity of it." In which respect we are to condemn, yea, to hate this friendship of wicked worldlings, as being but like sugar which entices us to drink the poison of sin; and the devil's most prevailing orator, in persuading us to neglect all duty, and to set our hearts open for the entertaining of sin. Manifold evils come unto us through the familiar society of wicked worldlings.

Against which, if any shall object their own experience, namely, that they have frequented such company and entertained such love and amity, and yet feel themselves never the worse, to such I answer, that either they are so bad already, that they cannot be made much worse; or have but a little while been linked in this fellowship, and so the poison has not as yet its operation; or if longer time they have consorted with them and feel no ill, it is because wickedness has grown on them by degrees, and has therefore through their negligence been insensible, they having rather declined by little and little, than suddenly fallen into these mischiefs. But let not this encourage them in their course. Great floods do not suddenly rise, but after much dropping; metals are not presently melted as soon as they are put into the furnace; green wood does not forthwith flame out as soon as it is laid on the fire; but yet within a while with much and often raining the water arises, with great and continual heat the metals melt, and the green wood after some weak resistance is consumed. And so, although the fire of God's grace is not quenched at first with this water of worldly wickedness, yea, rather, perhaps it may through opposition make it to gather strength and burn more hotly; but yet if it be much and often cast upon it, it will in the end put it out. "Although," says Isidorus, "thou wert made of iron, yet standing continually before a great fire, thou wouldst at last be dissolved; and he that still dwelleth at the next door to danger cannot long be safe." . . . As therefore those diseases which grow upon us by degrees upon small and not apparent causes are of all others the most dangerous and incurable, so these spiritual diseases of the soul which steal upon us little by little are not easily cured, and most endanger us, because they are not discerned until custom has given them full possession, and as it were turned them into nature. And as men are no less fearful of a lingering consumption than of a hot burning ague, because it doth more certainly destroy us, though it doth not assault us with like violence; so that corruption, which stealthily infects us through the familiarity and near friendship which we have with a civil worldling, doth oftentimes more endanger us than all the violent provocation of men notoriously wicked, whereby they labour suddenly and all at once to plunge us headlong into wickedness.

—Downham, 1644.

(2141.) There is a generation of men that lavish their estates, as we say, fling the house out at the windows, that call themselves good fellows. But good fellows and evil men are incompatible. They are like Simon and Levi, sworn brothers, but brethren in evil. Perhaps they have more society than honest men, but not so good society. Briars and thorns twine more together than good plants. God is not in this fellowship; you shall meet Him at the church, not at the ale-house. But Satan puts in for a part: sometimes one drunkard plays the devil with another, in stabbing or overloading with drink; but if there be not always a personate devil, there is always a personal devil; Satan himself stands by. In this fellowship, riot is the host, drunkenness the guest, swearing keeps the reckoning, lust holds the door, and beggary pays the shot.

—Adams, 1654.

(2142.) It is opportunity that makes thieves. Look what a clear fountain is to the thirsty, what a shade to the scorched traveller; such is occasion to a man that is accustomed to do evil. Physicians may converse with sick men, and cure them; but if their disease be dangerous or contagious, they will not easily adventure on them, lest that in curing others they should kill themselves. Vices are of the same nature, and vicious persons and places are alike dangerous, and therefore to be shunned.

—Spencer, 1658.

(2143.) In infected places we get a disease, though we feel it not presently; so secretly our hearts are tainted by examples; as a man that walks in the sun, unawares, before he thinks of it, his countenance is tanned.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(2144.) Familiarity with the ungodly will be a blemish and scandal upon your good name. Every man's company declares what he is. Birds of a sort flock together. So that if they wrong not the conscience they wound the reputation.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(2145.) Man, being a sociable creature, is mightily encouraged to do as others do, especially in an evil example; for we are more susceptible of evil than we are of good. Sickness is sooner communicated than health; we easily catch a disease off one another, but those that are sound do not communicate health to the diseased. Or rather, to take

God's own expression that sets it forth thus,—by touching the unclean man became unclean under the law, but by touching the clean man was not purified. The conversation of the wicked has more power to corrupt the good, than the conversation of the virtuous and holy to correct the lewd.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(2146.) If thou choosest the ungodly for thy friends, thou art in danger of suffering, as well as of sinning with them. The wheat has many a blow for being among the chaff. The gold would not be put into the fire if it were not for the dross with which it is mingled.

It is ill being in a fellow's company when the officer of justice overtakes him. He may come to suffer for the treason, who harbours and abets the traitor.

He that would not be found amongst sinners in the other world, must take heed that he do not frequent their company in this. Those whom the constable finds wandering with vagrants, may be sent with them to the House of Correction.

O Lord, guard Thy servant so powerfully by Thy grace, that I may avoid all appearance of evil. As I would avoid Thy batteries, let me avoid the camp of Thine enemies.

—Swinmock, 1673.

(2147.) Flee unholy company, as baneful to the power of godliness. Be but as careful for thy soul, as thou wouldst for thy body. Durst thou drink in the same cup, or sit in the same chair, with one that hath an infectious disease? And is it not sin as catching a disease as the plague itself?

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2148.) As that honey is best which is gathered from the bosom of the most exquisite flowers, so that love which is founded upon the most exquisite communication is the most excellent. And as there is honey in Heraclea of Pontus, which is poisonous and makes those mad that eat it, because it is gathered from the aconite, which abounds in that country; even so the friendship grounded upon the communication of false and vicious goods, is altogether false and vicious.

—Salus.

9. By the choice of our friends, we reveal our own character.

—Lavater, 1741-1801.

10. Youthful friendships.

(2150.) For my own part, I found such friendships, though warm enough in their commencement, surprisingly liable to extinction; and of seven or eight whom I had selected for intimates out of about three hundred, in ten years' time not one was left me. The truth is that there may be, and often is, an attachment of one boy to another that looks very like friendship, and, while they are in circumstances that enable them mutually to oblige and assist each other, promises well and bids fair to be lasting; but they are no sooner separated from each other, by entering into the world at large, than other connections and new employments, in which they no longer share together, efface the remembrance of what passed in earlier days, and they become strangers to each other for ever. Add to this, the man frequently differs so much from the boy—his principles, manners, temper, and conduct undergo so great an alteration—that we no longer recognize in him our old playfellow, but find him utterly unworthy and unfit for the place he once held in our affections.

—Cromper, 1731–1800.

11. Is rarely formed late in life.

(2151.) It may be worth noticing as a curious circumstance, when persons past forty, before they were at all acquainted, form together a very close intimacy of friendship. For grafts of old wood to take, there must be a wonderful congeniality between the trees.
—Whately, 1787–1863.

12. Tested by adversity.

(2152.) Whilst you are prosperous, you can number many friends; but when the storm comes, you are left alone.
—Ovid.

(2153.) True friends visit us in prosperity only when invited, but in adversity they come without invitation.
—Theophrastus.

(2154.) Affliction, like the wind or fan, severs the chaff of flattery from the solid grain of faithful friendship; making parasites to flee from us, as smoke drives away bees, when they can raise from us no further advantage. And, as the only true touchstone, it discerns a lover of a man's self from him who is a lover of us; for, according to the proverb, "He who is a friend in need is a friend indeed," and evidently shows that our person, and not our prosperity, was the object of his love. In this respect, our afflictions are profitable, as they pluck from us false-hearted parasites, who, like the ivy, cling about us, to suck our sap, and to make themselves fat with our spoil; and to discover to us our true friends, who are hardly discerned from the other till this time of trial; for, as the son of Sirach says, "A friend cannot be known in prosperity, and an enemy cannot be hidden in adversity."
—Downname, 1644.

—Burroughs, 1599–1646.

(2156.) What is sweeter than a well-tuned lute, and what more delightful than a friend—one who can cheer us in sorrow with his wise and affectionate discourse! Nothing, however, is sooner untuned than a lute; and nothing is more fickle than human friendship. The tone of one changes with the weather, that of the other with fortune. With a clear sky, a bright sun, and a gentle breeze, you will have friends in plenty; but let fortune frown, and the firmament be overcast, and then your friends will prove like the strings of the lute, of which you will tighten ten before you will find one that will bear the stretch and keep the pitch.

—Scriver, 1629–1693.

(2157.) Oh, but a man is well off for friends while things flourish with him! The great world is always ready with its friendly ministry for whatever he may need. But sure as David, who harped in the palace of Saul, and had Saul's daughter to wife, had to take the wilderness of Sin for his refuge, and the rock of Machpelah for his habitation, when the countenance of Saul turned against him, so surely shall the man whom prosperity hath exalted have to shift for himself, forlorn and abandoned, when adversity setteth in upon him. And his talents shall now be discovered to have been nought, and his accomplishments to have been nought, and his services to have been nought. All the cords which lifted him on high and held him in his place, shall untwist rapidly, and he shall find himself solitary and unbefriended of all that fashionable crew who heretofore delighted to do him honour. Therefore, let every man rising in the world's favour look to his ways, and deal faithfully by his former friends and associates, and most faithfully by his God, that he may have a hiding-place and a secure refuge when the time of his trial and the days of his darkness come.
—Irving.

(2158.) "Who is a friend like me?" said the shadow to the body. "Do I not follow you wherever you go? Sunlight or moonlight I never forsake you."

"It is true," said the body; "you are with me in sunlight and moonlight, but where are you when neither sun nor moon shines upon me? The true friend abides with us in darkness."

(2159.) Sentiments of friendship which flow from the heart cannot be frozen in adversity.

13. Its surest proof is also its severest test.

—Sir W. Raleigh, 1552–1618.

(2161.) The noblest part of a friend is an honest boldness in the notifying of errors. He that tells me of a fault, aiming at my good, I must think him wise and faithful: wise, in spying that which I see not; faithful in a plain admonishment, not tainted with flattery.
—Felltham, 1678.

(2162.) It is one of the severest tests of friendship to tell your friend of his faults. If you are angry with a man, or hate him, it is not hard to go to him and stab him with words; but so to love a man that you cannot bear to see the stain of sin upon him, and to speak painful truth through loving words,—that is friendship. But few have such friends. Our enemies usually teach us what we are at the point of the sword.
—Becker.

14. Is easily destroyed.

(2163.) Life is full of paradoxes. There are some slight causes which will destroy the strongest friendship. Great causes will not always impair it. A sarcastic and disparaging speech made by a friend concerning his friend in his absence, and repeated by some mischief-maker, will invariably disturb friendship; while an angry altercation, or some injury to person or to property, will often leave friendship unharmed.

When alienation begins, it increases at a very rapid rate. The rust-spot multiplies apace. The mildew spreads quickly. The rift in the lute becomes longer and longer.
—S. Martin.

15. The difficulty of repairing its breaches.

—E. Cook.

16. How it is to be maintained.

—Felltham, 1668.

(2166.) He that doth a base thing in zeal for his friend, burns the golden thread that ties their hearts together.
—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

(2167.) It is a noble and great thing to cover the blemishes and to excuse the failings of a friend; to draw a curtain before his stains, and to display his perfections; to bury his weaknesses in silence, but to proclaim his virtues upon the house-top.
—South, 1663-1716.

(2169.) It is decreed by Providence that nothing truly valuable shall be obtained in our present state but with difficulty and danger. He that hopes for that advantage which is to be gained from unrestrained communication must sometimes hazard, by unpleasing truths, that friendship which he aspires to merit. The chief rule to be observed in the exercise of this dangerous office, is to preserve it pure from all mixture of interest or vanity; to forbear admonition of reproof when our consciences tell us that they are incited, not by the hopes of reforming faults, but the desire of showing our discernment, or gratifying our own pride by the mortification of another.

17. The best friend.

(2170.) When I see leaves drop from their trees in the beginning of autumn, just such, think I, is the friendship of the world; just such are the comforts and joys of this life. While the sap of maintenance lasts, my friends will swarm in abundance, my joys and comforts will abide with me; but when the sap ceases, the spring which supplies them fails; in the winter of my need they leave me naked. And those few leaves which I see falling, remind me of the coming winds, and rains, when those trees shall be wholly stripped of their leaves; and of that season, that evil day, when all that administers to the gaiety and comfort of life shall fall from under me. Happy he who has that "Friend which," saith the Scriptures, "sticketh closer than a brother," and that peace, and those pleasures, which are at God's right hand, and which shall never fade away.

—Salter, 1840.

18. Is not limited to this life.

(2171.) The friendship of high and sanctified spirits loses nothing by death but its alloy; failings disappear, and the virtues of those whose "faces we shall behold no more" appear greater and more sacred when beheld through the shades of the sepulchre.
—Robert Hall, 1764-1831.

(2172.) I am convinced that the extension and perfection of friendship will constitute great part of the future happiness of the blest. Many have lived in various and distant ages and countries, perfectly adapted (I mean not merely in their being generally estimable, but in the agreement of their tastes, and suitableness of their dispositions) for friendship with each other, but who, of course, could never meet in this world. . . . I should be sorry to think such a wish absurd and presumptuous, or unlikely to be gratified.
—Whately, 1781-1863.

FUTURE REWARDS AND PUNISHMENTS.

1. REASONABLENESS OF BELIEF IN THEIR REALITY.

(2173.) As sure as there is an earth for thee to tread upon, and as sure as there is a sun whose light thou seest; so sure is there a heavenly everlasting glory for every converted, persevering soul. There can be no better ground of assurance than the Word of God. I know that man, whilst he is in this flesh, is strange to things beyond his sense, and hath a natural desire to have his senses themselves to be the inlets of his knowledge; and therefore he is apt to think that either he is uncertain of all that he seeth not (unless he hath seen the like that may help him to understand it), or else that his knowledge of it is as no knowledge; but this is a weakness unworthy of a man. What if you had never seen London, or any such city, and should hear the glory of it described by others; would you think it uncertain that there is such a place, because you have not seen it? Nay, further, you have not seen your souls, do you think it therefore uncertain whether you have a soul or no? A man that is born blind did never see the sun, and yet he will not doubt whether there be a sun, when all the world about him telleth him so: and shall not the Word of God be taken as soon as the word of a man? You never saw God Himself, and yet it is the grossest error in the world to think that there is no God when we see every day the works that He hath made; and which we know could none of them make themselves: you see that which assureth you of the things that are unseen. You see the Word of God; you see His works and daily providences; you see a Divine testimony, the sufficient ground of your belief. Noah did not see the flood when he laboured so many years in making the ark. But though the unbelieving world might deride him in the beginning, at the last the flood came and did convince them.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2174.) We have abundantly more assurance of the recompense of another world than we have of many things of this world, which yet have a greater influence upon our actions, and govern the lives of the most prudent and considerate men. Men generally hazard their lives and estates upon terms of greater uncertainty than the assurance which we have of another world. Men venture to take physic upon probable grounds of the integrity and skill of their physician, and yet the want of either of these may hazard their lives: and men take physic upon greater odds; for it certainly causeth pain and sickness, and doth but uncertainly procure and recover health; the patient is sure to be made sick, but not certain to be made well; and yet the danger of being worse, if not of dying, on the one hand, and the hope of success and recovery on the other, make this hazard and trouble reasonable. Men venture their whole estates to places which they never saw, and that there are such places, they have only the concurrent testimony and agreement of men; nay, perhaps have only spoken with them that have spoken with those that have been there. No merchant ever insisted upon the evidence of a miracle to be wrought, to satisfy him that there were such places as the East and West Indies, before he would venture to trade thither: and yet this assurance God hath been pleased to give the world of a state beyond the grave, and of a blessed immortality in another life.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(2175.) Let it be granted, that the assurance which we have of future rewards falls short of the evidence of sense. . . . [Yet] we have as much as is abundantly sufficient to justify every man's discretion, who, for the great and eternal things of another world, hazards or parts with the poor and transitory things of this life. The greatest affairs of this world, and the most important concerns of this life, are all conducted only by moral demonstrations. Men every day venture their lives and estates only upon moral assurance. For instance, men who were never at the East or West Indies, or in Turkey or Spain, yet do venture their whole estate in traffic thither, though they have no mathematical demonstration but only moral assurance that there are such places. Nay, which is more, men every day eat and drink, though I think no man can demonstrate out of Euclid or Apollonius, that his baker, brewer, or cook, has not conveyed poison into his meat or drink. And that man that would be so wise and cautious, as not to eat or drink until he could demonstrate this to himself, I know no other remedy for him but that in great gravity and wisdom he must die for fear of death. And for any man to urge that, though men in temporal affairs proceed upon moral assurances, yet there is greater assurance required to make men seek heaven and avoid hell, seems to me to be highly unreasonable. For such an assurance of things as will make men circumspect and careful to avoid a lesser danger, ought in all reason to awaken men much more to the avoiding of a greater; such an assurance as will sharpen men's desire and quicken their endeavour for the obtaining of a lesser good, ought in all reason to animate men more powerfully, and to inspire them with a greater vigour and industry in the pursuit of that which is infinitely greater. For why the same assurance should not operate as well in a great danger as in a less, in a great good as in a small and inconsiderable one, I can see no reason, unless men will say, that the greatness of an evil or danger is an encouragement to men to run upon it, and that the greatness of any good and happiness ought in reason to dishearten men from the pursuit of it.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

II. ARE NECESSARY TO RESTRAIN MEN FROM CRIME.

(2176.) If man have no life to live but this, and no further end of his actions than a beast, nor any further account to give, then he is indeed but one of the higher sorts of beasts, differing but gradually from a dog, as a dog doth from a swine. And if this be indeed thy judgment of thyself, I demand, whether or no thou be content to be used as a beast? wilt thou not take it ill to be called or judged a beast by another? Or wouldst thou have others judge better of thee than thyself? wouldst thou have no man regard thy prosperity or life any more than a beast is to be regarded? a beast hath no property, no, not of that which nature hath given him. You accuse not yourselves of doing him any wrong, when you deprive the sheep of his fleece, or when you make a constant drudge of your horse or ox. And do you think it lawful before God for any one that can but master you to do the like by you? To strip you naked, and to make pack-horses of you, and use you as their slaves? we take it to be no sin to take away the lives of beasts, if it be but for our own commodity. We kill oxen, and calves, and sheep, and swine, and fowl, and fishes for our daily food. And is it lawful before God for others to do so by you? Should nothing restrain them but want of power to overcome you? If you say that you are beasts, as beasts you should be used.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

III. ARE NECESSARY TO VINDICATE THE JUSTICE OF GOD.

(2177.) There is no such execution in this life of the laws of God, as are sufficient to the ends of government. The wicked prosper, and destroy the just: the best do most deny their flesh, and are oppressed by others. You see this in yourselves, and make it an argument for your infidelity. But stay a little till the assizes come. It follows not that there is no government or justice, because the thief or murderer is not hanged before the assizes, or as soon as he hath done the act.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

IV. WHY THEY ARE HIDDEN FROM US.

(2178.) If any shall here say, "But why would not God let us have a sight of heaven or hell when He could not but know that it would more generally and certainly prevail for the conversion and salvation of the world. Doth He envy us the most effectual means?"

I answer, "Who art thou, O man, that disputest against God? Shall the thing formed say unto Him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus?"

Must God come down to the bar of man to render an account of the reason of His works! Why do you not also ask Him a reason of the nature, situation, magnitude, order, influences, &c., of all the stars, and superior orbs, and call Him to an account for all His works? When yet there are so many things in your own bodies of which you little understand the reason, is it not intolerable impudence for such worms as we are, so low, so dark, to question the eternal God, concerning the reason of His laws and dispensations? Do we not shamefully forget our ignorance and our distance?

But if you must have a reason, let this suffice you. It is fit that the government of God be suited to the nature of the reasonable subject. And reason is made to apprehend more than we see, and by reaching beyond sense, to carry us to seek things higher and better than sense can reach. If you would have a man understand no more than he sees, you would almost equalise a wise man and a fool, and make a man too like a beast. Even in worldly matters, you will venture upon the greatest cost and pains for the things that you see not, nor ever saw. He that hath a journey to go to a place that he never saw will not think that a sufficient reason to stay at home. The merchant will sail a thousand miles to a land and for a commodity that he never saw. Must the husbandman see the harvest before he plough his land, and sow his seed? Must the sick man feel that he hath health before he use the means to get it? Must the soldier see that he hath the victory before he fight? You would take such conceits in worldly matters to be the symptoms of distraction; and will you cherish them where they are most pernicious? Hath God made man for any end, or for none? If none, he is made in vain: if for any, no reason can expect that he should see his end before he use the means, and see his home before he begin to travel towards it. When children first go to school, they do not see or enjoy the learning and wisdom which by time and labour they must attain. You will provide for the children which you are like to have before you see them. To look that sight, which is our fruition itself, should go before a holy life, is to expect the end before we use the necessary means. You see here, in the government of the world, that it is things unseen that are the instruments of rule, and motives of obedience. Shall no man be restrained from felony or murder, but he that seeth the assizes or the gallows? It is enough that he foreseeth them, as being made known by the laws. It would be no discrimination of the good and bad, the wise and foolish, if the reward and punishment must be seen. What thief so mad as to steal at the gallows, or before the judge? The basest habits would be restrained from acting, if the reward and punishment were in sight. The most beastly drunkard would not be drunk; the filthy fornicator would forbear his lust; the malicious enemies of godliness would forbear their calumnies and persecutions, if heaven and hell were open to their sight. No man will play the adulterer in the face of the assembly: the chaste and unchaste seem there alike: and so they would do if they saw the face of the most dreadful God. No thanks to any of you all to be godly if heaven were to be presently seen; or to forbear your sin if you saw hell fire! God will have a meet way of trial. You shall believe His promises if ever you will have the benefit; and believe

His threatenings if ever you will escape the threatened evil.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2179.) It further reconcileth me to this disposition and will of the blessed God, and this necessary natural distance and darkness of our mind, when I consider that if God, and heaven, and hell, were as near and open to our apprehensions as the things are which we see and feel, this life would not be what God intended it to be, a life of trial and preparation to another—a work, a race, a pilgrimage, a warfare; what trial would there be of any man's faith, or love, or obedience, or constancy, or self-denial? If we saw God stand by, or apprehended Him as if we saw Him (in degree), it would be no more praiseworthy or rewardable for a man to abhor all temptations to worldliness, ambition, gluttony, drunkenness, lust, cruelty, &c., than it is for a man to be kept from sleeping that is pierced with thorns, or for a man to forbear to drink a cup of melted gold which he knoweth will burn out his bowels, or to forbear to burn his flesh in fire. It were no great commendation to his chastity, that would forbear his filthiness if he saw or had the fullest apprehensions of God; when he will forbear it in the presence of a mortal man. It were no great commendation to the intemperate and voluptuous to have no mind of sensual delights if they had but such a knowledge of God as were equal to sight. It were no thanks to the persecutor to forbear his cruelty against the servants of the Lord if he "saw Christ coming with His glorious angels, to take vengeance on them that know not God and obey not the Gospel, and to be admired in His saints, and glorified in them that now believe." I deny not but this happily necessitated holiness is best in itself, and therefore will be our state in heaven. But what is there of trial in it; or how can it be suitable to the state of man, that must have good and evil set before him, and life and death left to his choice; and who must conquer if he will be crowned and approve his fidelity to his Creator against competitors, and must live a rewardable life before he have the reward?

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

V. THE PUNISHMENT OF THE IMPENITENT IS ETERNAL.

1. This declaration is not inconsistent with what we know of God.

(2180.) If Scripture be certainly true, then the most terrible passages in it are certainly true; nothing is more hardly believed by men than that which will be most tormenting to their minds when it is believed, that none shall be saved but the regenerate and holy; and those that live not after the flesh, but the Spirit, and love God in Christ above all the world, even their own lives; and that, besides these few, all the rest shall be tormented in hell for ever. This is the doctrine that flesh and blood will hardly down with. They say or think they will never believe that God will be so unmerciful; as if God must needs be less merciful than man, because He is more just and holy, and will not be so indulgent to their flesh and sin as they are themselves, and would have Him to be. And I have known even godly men, through the remnant of their corruption and darkness in the things of God, and the violence of temptation, most troubled with their unbelief in this particular. But God cannot lie: the Scripture being true, and the Christian religion certainly true, every part of it must needs be true. But because sensual nature looks for sensible demonstration or proof, let me ask the unbelievers this one question—"Do you believe that which you see and feel, and all the world feels as well as you?" You know that all mankind liveth here a life of trouble and misery; we come into the world in a very poor condition, and we pass through it in daily labour and sorrow, and we pass out of it through the dreadful pangs of death. What incessant labour have the most of them, how much want and misery, how much care and grief! Do you not see and feel how sicknesses do torment us? When one pain is over, another is at hand. Have you not seen some under such terrible fits of the gout, or stone, or other diseases, that they thought no torment could be greater; some with their legs rotting, and must be cut off; some with loathsome cancers and leprosies on them many years together; some that have lost their eyesight, have lost almost all the comfort of life; some that never could see; some that never could hear or speak? I have known some in such pain that they have cried out they did not believe there was greater in hell; some are mad, and some idiots: are not all these in a very miserable case? Now, I would ask you further if God may, without any unmercifulness, do all this to men, and that as a chastisement in the way to bring them to repentance; if He may, without unmercifulness, make a David cry out in misery, and wash his couch with his tears; and make a Job to lie scraping his sores on a dunghill; why should you think He cannot, without unmercifulness, torment incurable sinners in hell? Further, I would ask you this question: Suppose you had lived in Adam's paradise, or some condition of pleasure and rest, where you never had tasted of sickness, or labour, or want, or feared death, if God's Word had there told you, but that man shall endure so much misery as I have here mentioned and men daily suffer, and should die at last for his sin, would you have said, "I will never believe God would be so unmerciful?" You that say so now, would likely have said so then in this case; for feeling the pleasure yourselves, you would on the same ground have said, "God is unmerciful if He should make man so miserable;" and yet you see and feel that God doth it, and we know that He is not unmerciful.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2181.) "The character of God is Love; which is expressly against the horrible idea of the endless misery of any of His rational creatures." So, sir, you are pleased to assert. Another might from the same premises infer that the punishment of any of His rational creatures in hell, for ages of ages, where there shall be weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth (and this notwithstanding the death of His Son, and the omnipotence of His grace, which surely was able to have saved them from it), is horrible and incredible? Is it inconsistent with the benevolence of a supreme magistrate that he dooms certain characters to death? Rather, is it not an exercise of his benevolence? Should a malefactor persuade himself and his companions in guilt that His Majesty cannot possibly consent to their execution, without ceasing to be that lovely and good character for which he has been famed, would not his reasoning be as false in itself as it was injurious to the king? Nay, would it not be inimical to his own interest and that of his fellow-criminals; as, by raising a delusive hope, they are prevented from making a proper and timely application to the throne for mercy?

—Andrew Fuller, 1754-1815.

(2182.) They take for granted a certain notion of the mercy and goodness of God, with which everlasting punishment is inconsistent. Now the question is, whence this notion is derived by them, that they should be so confident of its truth as for its sake to efface the plain meaning of Scripture. The mercy and goodness of God need not to be lauded here, after what hath been written in the third part of this discourse. But though exceeding great, and greatly to be adored, and sufficient for the salvation of all the earth, these attributes do consist with others of a firmer texture and a sterner mood. Here are we, the sons of men, suffering daily pain, misery, and death, although we were not instrumental to the fall. God looks upon our case, and doth not hinder it. He hath sent a remedy, but by far the greater portion of men have never heard of it. Contemplate the condition of whole continents of the earth sweltering in sultry toil, or raging in fierce contests of mutual misery and destruction, oppressed by the wilfulness of single men, at whose pleasure they are bought and sold, imprisoned and put to death without knowledge of better things to come, or cheerful hope of any redress of wrong. All for what? for the sin of our first great parents, over whom we had no control; let them contemplate this, and see what stern attributes dwell by the side of Divine mercy and goodness. I confess, when I contemplate the administration of this woful world since the fall, so far as it is recorded in the annals of nations, I feel a shrinking terror of the sternness of Him in whose hands the government rests. The world hath been a very furnace of hot and murderous passions, a seething vessel of blood, which hath never rested, but smoked to heaven in vain. Even still, after the great propitiation and atonement for the world's sins it never resteth. Every day men are immolated upon a bloody altar, and their unshrived spirits pass in most desperate moods into eternity. Wickedness rageth, princes combine against the Lord and His Anointed, they filch the sacred authority of God, they plant their scornful foot upon the neck of noble nations, and they defy the tears and groans of millions to melt their stony hearts. Oh, my God! when will this have an end? when wilt Thou dash them in pieces like the potsherd, and vex them in Thy hot displeasure? Thus, when I look upon and remember from what small beginnings it arose, I, for one, cannot doubt of the Almighty's force of character to carry anything into effect. If God can exist with such a blighted region and tormented people under His government, why may He not also exist in the knowledge and permission of hell?

—Irving.

(2183.) Those who oppose the doctrine of future punishment, future chains and darkness, are accustomed to say they cannot believe that God will take pleasure in for ever punishing the sinner. They claim that He will provide some expedient, either annihilation at death, universal salvation, or restoration. But does He take pleasure in witnessing the terrible woe and pain which sin entails upon its victims in this world? Does He take pleasure in seeing the inebriate and the sensualist irredeemably enslaved to their appetites and passions? And yet they are enslaved. In consequence of these things, men suffer. The world is full of misery. Why does He not prevent it? Are antecedent probabilities valid in opposition to facts? All believe that it will not be any personal gratification for God to withhold forgiveness from the finally impenitent merely for the sake of withholding it. That would not be Godlike. But may not some other motives influence Him? We know, from the very best authority, that sin is to be an eternal fact in the universe of God. As such, must it not have its own awful and isolated development, its own awful and isolated history? The majesty of God's natural laws requires that violations of them shall be followed by the infliction of penalties—An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth. Are these moral and spiritual laws less important? Would it be safe to admit certain characters into a place of which one of the primal ideas is security? Does not the peace of heaven demand that those who are selfish, and have not the spirit of Christ, which alone destroys selfishness; that those who are impenitent, unmerciful, and unforgiving beyond recovery; that those who choose darkness rather than light, because they have continued to love evil deeds, until they have learned to love nothing better;—does not safety require that such men be allowed to chain themselves outside the gates of the city? Lax administration towards such a class will work the ruin of any government. Heaven is no exception. Do not God's providence and revelation justify the conclusion that He is too wise and decisive to follow the pusillanimous course of a people who fail in a first conception of what treason means? Will He not make it odious throughout His domains? Will He not put such a stamp upon sin and treason that they will be known anywhere? To do it, is it not His duty? Will the righteous verdict of the universe excuse Him for not vindicating His broken laws by the enslavement of wilful and hardened traitors? Are not the traitors of His government those who deliberately and wilfully reject and resist Him? Sin is treason. It is of no use to say such traitors do not exist; they do exist. Mix well with the world, and you will see them. God's object in the punishment, the self-imposed punishment, of the sinner is not personal gratification or vindictiveness, but is resorted to as an extreme measure. It is a plan by which to prevent another catastrophe in His kingdom. One such is enough, full enough. The heart sickens at the thought of another. Loyalty throughout His vast empire, henceforth, is His grand design. The safety of an ever-progressive and ever-increasing kingdom is the problem. Extreme measures which now exist, but which were not commenced before Satan fell, and before sin entered the universe, can effect this. Shall God employ them, or not? They are in process of execution already: shall He arrest their normal action? Shall the event of death reverse all law, and make treason glorious? Shall an impenitent Satan be reinstated in Paradise? Shall the lights of heaven be reentrusted to his bloody and deadly hand? Universal and eternal interests hang trembling upon the answer "Yes," and "Farewell, heaven!" must be spoken in the same breath. Many earthly governments have stood for centuries, which would have had an early extinction but for their salutary and vigorous enactments against treason. Ostracism or loyalty, chains and granite walls or obedience, are the right and left ventricles of a nation's heart. The future, if our conclusions be correct, lies between one hell and one heaven, or two hells and no heaven.

(2184.) Sometimes, in dark caves, men have gone to the edge of unspeaking precipices, and wondering what was the depth, have cast down fragments of rock, and listened for the report of their fall, that they might judge how deep that blackness was, and listening—still listening—no sound returns; no sudden splash, no clinking stroke as of rock against rock—nothing but silence, utter silence! And so I stand upon the precipice of life, I sound the depths of the other world with curious inquiries. But from it comes no echo and no answer to my questions. No analogies can grapple and bring up from the depths of the darkness of the lost world any distinct probable truths. No philosophy has line and plummet long enough to sound the depths. There remains for us only the few authoritative and solemn words of God. These declare that the bliss of the righteous is everlasting; and with equal directness and simplicity they declare that the doom of the wicked is everlasting.

And therefore it is that I make haste, with an inconceivable ardour, to persuade you to be reconciled to your God. I hold up before you that God who loves the sinner and abhors the sin; who loves goodness with infinite fervour, and breathes it upon those who put their trust in Him; who makes all the elements His ministering servants; who sends years, and weeks, and days, and hours, all radiant with benefaction, and if we would but hear their voice, all pleading the goodness of God as an argument of repentance and of obedience. And remember that this is the God who yet declares that He will at last by no means clear the guilty! Make your peace with Him now, or abandon all hopes of peace.

2. Guilt is not to be measured by the time occupied in transgression.

—Chrysostom, 347-407.

(2186.) It is objected that there is no proportion between time and eternity, and, consequently, that to punish man eternally for doing wrong in his short lifetime is inequitable. While it is not denied that punishment is merited, it is contended that there should be some proportion between the crime and the penalty.

In answer to this objection, let us examine the law of proportion in the light of social laws. Does the idea of proportion amount roughly to this, that a day's crime should be met by a day's punishment ; that a man who does wrong to-day should be punished to-morrow, and restored to confidence the day after? The objector will probably say, "No, not exactly that; but say that a day's crime should be met by a month's punishment, or a year's; only let there be some proportion between the crime and the penalty." The answer does not relieve the difficulty. What is the moral proportion between one day and a month, or one day and a year? Does nothing depend on the nature of the crime? For example: a man commits a petty larceny; would the objector say that a month's imprisonment would be enough? Another man, say, commits murder; would the objector say that a year's punishment would suffice? But why should the one criminal be punished a month and the other a year? It is urged that the nature of the crime determines that. Let this be granted; then it will appear that the proportion is really not one of time but of turpitude. In reality society proceeds upon the principle that the extent of time occupied in perpetration of a criminal act is not to be taken into account in considering the punishment which is to be awarded. Nor ought it to be accounted of. Less time may be occupied in taking away a life than in committing a burglary; but, on the principle of strict proportion (which sophistically proceeds on the idea of mere duration), the burglar should undergo a longer punishment than the murderer. But society will not allow this; its moral instincts overrule its sentimentalities, and demand that the gravity of the crime should determine the gravity of the punishment.

An illustration may be useful here. Thirty years ago, let it be supposed, a criminal forged the reader's name to a cheque for a thousand guineas. He did it in a few moments; a stroke or two of the skilled pen, and the deed was done. The criminal never confessed the act; never uttered a penitential word; he suffered imprisonment for ten years; and now for twenty years he has been at large. Has the reader forgiven him? Has he restored him to confidence? Has he invited the offender into his family circle? Has he replaced him at the commercial desk? The reader says, "No." But what becomes of the argument of proportion? Let it be remembered that the criminal was imprisoned ten years for a crime committed in less than ten minutes. Was not the punishment sufficient? Think of ten minutes being multiplied into ten years, and then say whether more can be reasonably demanded. But it may be urged that the criminal is impenitent; he never owns his sin, never asks forgiveness, and treats the injured man as if he himself had been injured. The injured man is so far philanthropic as to say that he will meet the criminal on the first sign of contrition—he only waits an acknowledgment of the guilt and promise of better behaviour. Nothing can be more humane,—nothing more reasonable; and the point to be specially remarked is that this is the very principle upon which the divine government in relation to sin proceeds: "If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins." Man's own heart being witness, he proceeds upon the very principle of adjudication which he condemns in the government of God.

The sum of the answer is this: if a criminal continue to be impenitent respecting any crime, he is as guilty of that crime on the last day of his life as he was in the very hour of its committal, though he may have survived that hour fifty years. Time has no mitigating influence upon guilt. The question between the criminal and society is not one of time, but of penitence, and, so long as he is impenitent, society must, by a compulsion deeper than all formal law, mark and avoid him. Society does this. If particular members of society do not do so, they are immoral—connivance with unrepented guilt being an affront to the spirit of virtue. Society punishes (more or less lightly, more or less directly) all impenitent offenders against its laws, and punishes them throughout their whole lifetime, which is as much of eternity as its retributive influence can encompass. In very grave cases, indeed, society will not allow the penal shadow to pass from the reputation even after death; so truly is this the case that there are names which cannot now be pronounced, though they represent long extinct lives, without bringing a frown upon the countenances of all who hear them. Is this eternal punishment, or is it not?

The question of proportion may be looked at in another light. A citizen who has maintained a good reputation for half a century as a pure, upright, noble man; who has figured on subscription lists as a generous benefactor of the poor; whose name obtained the highest credit on the Exchange,—has been proved guilty of a crime: the crime was being perpetrated in imagined secrecy; the criminal had no idea that any eye was upon him; the fact, however, becomes known; and the question is, How does society treat the tower which was fifty years in building? Society razes the very foundations, and forgets half a century of unchallenged life in one day's discovered villany. But where is the law of proportion? Why not deduct one day from the fifty years' reputation, or regard the crime but as a spot on the disc of a brilliant life? The law of proportion founded on mere duration would, if strictly interpreted, require this deduction; but society happily forgets its formal logic when under the influence of high moral inspiration, and in its own arbitraments reproduces the government of God.

The argument of proportion as to time is obviously fallacious. No crime is self-contained. All actions are influential. What is done in an hour may affect society through many generations. Long after the pebble is at the bottom of the lake, the circles multiply and expand on the surface. The lifting of a hand sends a vibration to the stars.

—Parker.

3. Those who are consigned to it have already proved themselves incorrigible.

rule of justice only, for the result would have had in it kindness too, if we had suffered this also. For when any one insults him that has done him no wrong, according to the rule of justice he suffers punishment: but when it is his benefactor, who, bound by no previous favour, has bestowed innumerable kindnesses, who alone is the Author of his being, who is God, who breathed his soul into him, who gave ten thousand gifts of grace, whose will is to take him up into heaven;—when, I say, such an one, after so great blessings, is met by insult, daily insult, in the conduct of the other party; how can that other one be thought worthy of pardon? Dost thou not see how He punished Adam for one single sin?

"Yes," you will say; "but He had given him Paradise, and caused him to enjoy much favour." Nay, surely it is not all as one, for a man to sin in the enjoyment of security and ease, and in a state of great affliction. In fact, this is the dreadful circumstance, that thy sins are the sins of one not in any Paradise, but amid the innumerable evils of this life; that thou art not sobered even by affliction, as though one in prison should still practise his crime. However, unto thee He has promised things yet greater than Paradise. But neither has He given them now, lest He should unnerve thee in the season of conflicts; nor has He been silent about them, lest He should quite cast thee down with thy labours. As for Adam, he committed but one sin, and brought on himself certain death; whereas we commit ten thousand transgressions daily. Now if he by that one act brought upon himself so great an evil, and introduced death, what shall not we suffer who continually live in sins, and instead of Paradise have the expectation of heaven?

—Chrysostom, 347-407.

4. They are punished for ever, because they would sin for ever.

(2188.) Two men playing at tables by an inch of candle in the night time, and being very earnest in their game, the candle goeth out, and they perforce give over, who, no doubt, if the light had lasted, would have played all night very willingly. This inch of candle is the time of life allotted to a wicked man, who is resolved to spend it all in sinful pleasures and pastimes; and if it would last perpetually, he would never leave his play: and, therefore, since he would sin eternally (though by reason the light of his life goeth out, he cannot), he deserveth eternal punishment.

—Inchiusus.

(2189.) How is eternity of punishment inconsistent with the goodness of God. Nay, how can God be good without it? If wickedness always remain in the nature of man, is it not fit the rod should always remain on the back of man? Is it a want of goodness that keeps an incorrigible offender in chains, in a bridewell? While sin remains, it is fit it should be punished.

—Charnock, 1620-1680.

5. A universal amnesty is morally inadmissible.

(2190.) A third objection urges that God should issue a universal amnesty,—open every prison door in the universe,—say to devils, "You are forgiven," and to lost men, "Be free." This would be considered magnanimous as to be worthy of God. The objection is not without plausibility. Two things, however, appear to be forgotten. (1) That an amnesty could not, in itself, work any moral change. Look at the case from a national point of view. Suppose that the monarch were to proclaim a universal amnesty: would the thief, the murderer, the incendiary, or any other criminal, be thereby constituted a virtuous member of society? Such an amnesty, instead of being a blessing, would be a curse; liberty would degenerate into licentiousness. If the insane idea of a universal amnesty were seriously proposed, all virtuous men would protest against throwing back the flood-gates and liberating torrents of crime. What, then, would God's amnesty do? Would a demon be less a demon on one side of a prison door than on another? Does the door make the demon? The second thing that is forgotten by the objector is (2) That forgiveness requires the consent of two parties. The term "forgiveness" is often used with a most inadequate conception of its meaning. An enemy cannot by any act of so-called forgiveness be turned into a friend.

—Parker.

6. A second probation is inconceivable.

(2191.) Is it suggested that a second probation might meet the case? A second probation is an impossibility; but even assuming the possibility, where would be the equity? Give men to know that there would be a second probation, and how many of them would care for the first? And if they neglect the first, they are so much weaker in moral nerve to encounter the discipline of the second. And if there should be two probations why not three?

"But say I could repent, and could obtain
By act of grace my former state; how soon
Would height recall high thoughts, how soon unsay
What feigned submission swore! ease would recant
Vows made in pain, as violent and void."

How do men regard this probationary idea as it comes up in the concerns of daily life? There is one seed-time in the year; an indolent farmer neglects it, and then sets up the theory that to have only an annual seed-time is ridiculous! When poverty comes as "an armed man," does society pity or reproach him? It may be suggested that possibly the sufferings might have a good effect upon the lost; it might cause them to reflect; it might bring them to repentance. It is forgotten, however, that everything has been done for them which even God could do: they have resisted the whole system of redeeming love; thrust away the bleeding and dying Christ; and, if mere suffering will save any man, God has made a stupendous mistake in sending His Son to save sinners. Hell would then be more successful than the Son of God.

—Parker.

7. The fact is not affected by our belief or disbelief.

affected by the changes of human belief; and fearful events roll on just as though men expected them.

Nine-tenths of all the dead expected not to die at the time when in fact they have died, and more than half now listen to no admonition that death will ever come. They who have died had an expectation that they would live many years. But death came. He was not stayed by their belief or unbelief: he came steadily on. Each day he took a stride towards them—and step by step he advanced, so that they could not retreat or evade him till he was near enough to strike; and they fell. And so, though the living will not hear, death comes to them. And so the doom of the sinner rolls on. Each day, each hour, each moment it draws near. Whether he believes it or not makes no difference in the fact: it comes. It will not recede. In spite of all attempts to reason, or to forget it, the time comes; and at the appointed time the sinner dies. Cavil and ridicule do not affect this. There is no power in a joke to put away convulsions, and fevers, and groans. The laugh and the song close no grave, and put back none of the sorrows of the second death. The dwellers in Pompeii could not put back the fires of the volcano by derision, nor would the mockery of the inhabitants of Sodom have stayed the sheets of flame that came from heaven. The scoffing sinner dies; and is lost just like others; the young man that has learned to cavil and deride religion dies just like others. No cavil has yet changed a fact; none has ever stayed the arrow of death.

—Barnes.

GIFTS.

1. Their variety.

(2193.) There is not greater variety of colours, and qualities in plants and flowers, with which the earth like a carpet of needle-work is variegated for the delight and service of man, than there is of gifts in the minds of men, natural and spiritual, to render them useful to one another, both in civil societies and Christian fellowship. The Christian, as well as man, is intended to be a sociable creature; and for the better managing this spiritual commonwealth among Christians, God doth wisely and graciously provide and impart gifts, suitable to the place every one stands in to his brethren; as the vessels are larger or less in the body natural, according to their place therein.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

—Scriven, 1629-1693.

(2195.) Amongst the trees of the wood there is a great variety: the sturdy oak; the flexile willow; the solid maple; the graceful ash; the terraced cedar, with cones up sing through each grassy-looking lawn of tender leafery; the larch, in lieu of bells hanging its scarlet blossoms from every pointed arch of its green pagoda; the stiff stout holly, disdainful of the breeze; the fidgety aspen, all in a flutter at the faintest sigh; the spacious chestnut, enclasping the globe in its bountiful branches; the strict solemn cypress, with every appressed twiglet pointing straight up to heaven.

As with the form, so with the bark or the timber; the ebony sinking like stone, the cork riding on the crest of the billow, the elder so soft and spongy, the box in his firm structure retentive of the finest engraving; the homely deal, the thyme veneer emulating the spots of the panther or the plumes of the peacock—beautiful some, but useful all, and not to be interchanged with advantage. An ash-bow would be no better than a yew-tree lance. You do not choose the fir for the prince's table, and even England's oak would make a sorry mast for "some great admiral."

Through all God's kingdoms we trace the like variety, and still we find it when we rise to the minds of men. There is endless diversity in their nature, and for every form and style abundant use; and it is best when they are not transposed. Melancthon would have made a poor substitute for Luther, but the absence of Melancthon would have left a poor Reformation. Great as was the invention of the Sunday-school, it was not revealed to Bishop Butler, but was reserved for Robert Raikes; and yet if the former had not written the "Analogy," it may be doubted if the latter could have supplied the desideratum. And although Jeremy Taylor and John Bunyan had each a fine fancy, the world is now agreed that if they had changed places they could have made it no better; we are quite content with the Pilgrim of the one and the Golden Grove of the other.

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

(2196.) The plough is fatal to the picturesque. A country under husbandry, with its farms and formal divisions, each field throughout its whole extent of the same crop and colour, with all God's beautiful flowers cut down and cast out under the name of weeds, is as inferior in point of beauty as it is superior in point of profit to moor or mountain. How tame your levelled fields of wheat or barley compared with the rudest hill-side, where green bracken, and the plumes of the fern, and the bells of the foxglove, and brown heath with its purple blossoms, and the hoar, grey, rugged stones that lie scattered in wild confusion, unite to form a mantle, in richness and variety of hues, such as loom never wove and queen never wore. This variety should minister to more than taste. A pious mind, extracting food for devotion from the flowers which supply honey to the bee, finds profit where others find only pleasure, and, rising from nature up to nature's God, exclaims with David, "O Lord, how manifold are Thy works! in wisdom hast Thou made them all!"

Without this variety, how tame our gardens with every flower in form and colour the counterpart of another; and how monotonous the music of early morn did every lark in the sky, linnet in the bush, rook and ringdove in the woods, all utter the same notes! But variety characterises every department of nature. Each lamb of the flock has a bleat known to its own mother; each rose on the bush has its own shape and shade of colour; and there is not a lark that hangs carolling in the clouds but has a voice recognised by the brood above whose grassy nest she sings her morning hymn, calling the drowsy world to rise for worship and for work. Nor is this variety anywhere more remarkable than in mankind. It is calculated that there are ten hundred millions of our race scattered over the five continents and countless islands of the globe. Now, while in their grand characteristics, in their features, organs, voices, limbs, and general form these all resemble each other, yet there are not two faces, for instance, out of these ten hundred millions, which are exactly alike. Nor does a rich, boundless, divine variety characterise and adorn only this world of ours in the living creatures of its lands and seas, the shells which strew its shores, the flowers and fruits of its fertile plains, its shaggy mountains, up to their snowy crests. It shines above us—in stars fixed or moving, stars single, stars in pairs, stars in clusters, some sparkling with borrowed, others with native light; in the sun that runs his daily round, and comets, that with fiery locks streaming out behind them rush away into darkness, nor return for a hundred, perhaps for a thousand years. And high above that starry firmament, amid the splendour of the upper sanctuary, in angels and archangels, in cherubim and seraphim, in saints on higher thrones and crowns of brighter glory, in the various orders of unfallen and the various honours of ransomed spirits, we see a manifold and magnificent diversity in the works of God.

From this we might conclude that the kingdom of grace would present something of the same variety as that which distinguishes all His other works; and that as neither all angels nor all insects are formed alike, no more would all Christians be so. And thus it is; for variety is one of the many points at which the kingdoms of grace and nature touch. Christians have individual peculiarities which, as much as their faces, distinguish them from each other; and this is rather a beauty than a blemish—a charm rather than a fault. Some have one grace and some another, in such prominence, that John's love, and Peter's ardour, and Paul's zeal, and Job's patience, and Moses' meekness, and Jeremiah's tenderness, and Abraham's faith, have become proverbial. Nor is this variety, as among the flowers of moor and meadow, an element merely of beauty. It is a power; an element of the highest utility in the Church. Hence the mistake of those who would have all Christians modelled on their own pattern, as, for example, of some modest, retiring, gentle spirits, who cannot appreciate the worth and usefulness of those whom God has cast in a rough mould and made of stern stuff.

In the early ages of the Church, when she is endowed with supernatural powers, and some have the gift of wisdom, others of knowledge, others of faith, others of healing, others of miracles, others of prophecy, others of tongues, others of interpretation, Paul, by a beautiful analogy, recommends mutual respect—illustrating the advantages of variety, and showing how people with very different gifts may nevertheless be true members of Christ's true Church. "If the foot," he says, "shall say, Because I am not the hand, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body? And if the ear shall say, Because I am not the eye, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body? If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? If the whole were hearing, where were the smelling? But now God hath set the members every one of them in the body, as it hath pleased Him. And if they were all one member, where were the body? But now they are many members, yet but one body. And the eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee; nor again, the head to the feet, I have no need of you." We live in an age of ordinary gifts; but it is as true of these ordinary as of those extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, that there is as much utility as beauty in the diverse temperaments and endowments of Christian men. What is diverse is not of necessity adverse. God has different kinds of work to do; and since He chooses to employ men, He has need of different kinds of instruments.

—Guthrie.

(2197.) Men have different spheres. It is for some to evolve great moral truths, as the heavens evolve stars, to guide the sailor on the sea and the traveller on the desert; and it is for some, like the sailor and the traveller, simply to be guided.

—Becher.

(2198.) Such people forget that there are diversities of gifts. He who taught the lark to trill, taught the eagle to scream; He who moulded the dewdrop and caused it to hang in silence on the fringe of the flower, poured out the boundless sea and caused it to roar night and day as if uttering the prayer of all earthly trouble. We should allow more for all this marvellous diversity. The foot and hand, the eye and ear, are members of the same body, and there should be no schism.

—Joseph Parker.

2. We are neither to envy nor to despise those whose endowments are different from our own.

will be so. Use and ornament, the corner-stone and the cope-stone, shall both be felt to have their due place. To see how this may be, is to perceive that an end can be put to all jealousies and heart-burnings, and may help us even now to take our position calmly and unenviously, working in our department, assured that our labour shall be found to contribute to the full proportion of the whole

—Ker.

(2200.) All men cannot work in the same way. "There are diversities of operation." Upon the face of a watch you may see an illustration of my meaning. On that small space you have three workers: there is the second-pointer, performing rapid evolutions; there is the minute-pointer, going at a greatly reduced speed; and there is the hour-pointer, tardier still. Now, any one unacquainted with the mechanism of a watch would conclude that the busy little second-pointer was doing all the work; it is clicking away at sixty times the speed of the minute-pointer; and as for the hour-hand, that seems to be doing no work at all. You can see in a moment that the first is busy, and in a short time you will see the second stir; but you must wait still longer to assure yourself of the motion of the third. So is it in the Church. There are active, fussy men, who appear to be doing the work of the whole community, and others who are slower. But can we do without the minute and hour-pointer? The noisy second-hand might go round its little circle for ever, without telling the world the true time. We should be thankful for all kinds of workers. The silent, steady hour hand need not envy its noisy little colleague. Every man must fill the measure of his capacity. Your business is to do your allotted work so as to meet the approbation of the Master.

—Joseph Parker.

3. Every man should devote himself to the task for which he is peculiarly qualified.

dent fund, in the committee or council of the Church, "rule with diligence." Or, go forth and visit. The tired watcher in the sickroom release for a few hours of needful slumber. Take to the bed-ridden child some plaything, to the destitute family some comfort. And whether you offer the brief prayer or read the words of Jesus to the invalid, "show mercy with cheerfulness;" try to do it as if you came and went in Christ's own company, and then, long after you have left, the consolation will remain.

It is thus that by each following out his own line of things the world's best work has been done, and in the free development and loving consecration of gifts, the Church has exhibited a diversity both useful and beautiful. It was thus that wherever John Macdonald went in perambulating the Highlands, a wave of spiritual influence went with him; and it was thus that, like a Baptist and a beloved disciple combined, George Whitefield startled and melted all England. It is thus that in our own day one Christian lady has sought out the prisoned, and another has softened and civilised the neglected navy, and a third has mended "ragged homes," and a fourth has invented the Bible and Domestic Mission, and a fifth has rallied to the task of nursing so arduous yet so angel-like the refined and well trained amongst her countrywomen. And it is thus that in an employment however commonplace, and in a corner however inconspicuous, if you take up the task which your hand finds to do, and throw into it the might which God gives, the result will be genuine, solid, enduring. Let each do his own work in his own way, and as all good work is God's, you will soon see a more beautiful Church and a better world.

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

4. Entail responsibility.

(2202.) The husbandman looks for more fruit from some of his fruit-trees than from others; those upon which he bestows most time, cost, and labour, from these he expects most fruit; and is displeased if his expectation be not answered accordingly.

This shadows out unto us that God expects greater returns of duty from some persons than from some others, and neglect thereof provokes God against them.

In the ceremonial law God required more sacrifices from the rich than from the poor: such as had great store of oxen, sheep, and other things to be offered in sacrifice, should not have been accepted had they offered "a pair of turtle doves, or two young pigeons," which yet were accepted from the poorer sort of persons. So also under the gospel, "to whom much is given, of them doth He require the more." God had done great things for Eli, and David, and expected (accordingly) greater returns of duty and obedience all their lives after; but they failing in some great particulars, God is sore displeased with them, and reckons up the great benefits and particular engagements they had received, and tells them he expected other returns from them. So also Hezekiah received much, and God looked for answerable returns; but he rendered not according to the benefits received, and God was displeased with him upon that account.

God planted a vineyard, and bestowed much care and pains about it, and looked for an answerable return of good fruits, but because it brought forth wild grapes instead of good and pleasant grapes, He laid it waste. Some have received more, and

He under greater engagements from God than others, therefore God looks to receive more. This shows us the great danger such persons lie under who have received much from God, and return but little; having received many talents, and not making an answerable return by improving of them to the honour of God and advantage of His people; nay, who perhaps use all against God and His people. God gives to some many gifts of nature and common graces, much knowledge, learning, wisdom, great riches, honours, offices, places, much time, liberty, great and choice means of grace, special providences, and dispensations, and many other talents which others have not: of these God requires more than of those who have fewer and less of these things, and the not making suitable returns provokes God against them.

If God spared not His choice servants, Eli, David, Hezekiah, &c., if judgment begin at the house of God, how shall the ungodly and sinner escape? Let every one of us consider what we have received, that so we may make unto God some answerable returns: God looked for more (and received more) from him that had the five talents, than from him that had received but two.

No one (not the lowest, or meanest) is freed from making returns of duty to God: though God requires much from those who have received much, yet the mean person, who has but a little, must return of that little. "Let him work with his hands, that he may have something to give to him that needeth;" and it will be "accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not." So, also, of the use and improvements of all other talents, gifts, graces, liberty, power, and the rest.

—Austen.

5. To whom they are a blessing.

(2203.) As the high hills after much tillage are often barren, whereas the low valleys, by the streams of waters passing through them, are very fruitful; even so the gifts of God joined with a swelling heart are fruitless, but joined with love and the grace of humility they edify.

—Cowdrey, 1609.

6. For what purpose they are to be used.

(2204.) Good parts employed ill are weapons that, being meant for our own defence, we madly turn their edges and wound ourselves: they might make me fair in show, but in substance more polluted: they would be but a saddle of gold to the back of a galled horse; adorn me they might, better me they could not.

—Felltham, 1668.

(2205.) Every man should use his intellect, not as those who study in their libraries, when all the world is asleep, use their lamps, for their own seeing only; but as lighthouses use their lanterns, that those who are far off upon the deep may see the shining, and learn their way. God appoints our graces to be nurses to other men's weaknesses.

—Butcher.

(2206.) Is there not danger that powers, capable of conferring, and therefore intended to confer, great benefits on our brethren and the Church of Christ, may be left to slumber amidst the quiet enjoyment of literary leisure: and that a life, envied by others, and not without its gratifications, may be as profitless, and not much less selfish than that of the covetous or of the voluptuary? Here, indeed, in the pursuits of learning and science, intellect trains its faculties and finds its weapons. But he would be an ill workman who was ever sharpening the tools he never used. nor would he be worthy of a warrior's name, who sat at home, while the enemy was in the field, polishing over again his untried armour, and pleased with the graceful drooping of his plume. And when God has given powers of genius to discover, or of reasoning to defend, or of imagination to illustrate the truth, where there are faculties and personal endowments, no less than station and opportunities to influence, to persuade, to originate or advance plans of good, and to carry on God's work of regenerating and blessing this fallen world; and all are allowed to terminate in the tranquil enjoyment of aimless, and perhaps, desultory study, or are concentrated with misplaced industry on some trifling and fruitless object: it can hardly be without misgiving and uneasy fear that the approach can be regarded of that awful day, when the hidden talent shall condemn its owner, and when not to have done good will rank the careless, indolent, and self-indulgent, on the left hand of the Judge, together with the workers of iniquity.

—Jackson.

(2207.) In a little village at the foot of Mount Carmel lived a wise man, to whom the Spirit of God had given the power to comfort and to heal. He went into every dwelling where a sick man was lying, and healed him, or he comforted and strengthened the dying with gentle words, and soothed the complaints of those that wept, for he knew the hidden power of salutary herbs, as he knew the hearts of men, though he had hardly attained to manhood. Therefore he was loved by all men; each one besought him to come to his dwelling, and his fame was spread far and wide.

But behold, there came from the land of Mizraim a pestilence into the village of Mount Carmel and the adjacent country, and many people fell sick and died, for it was a grievous pestilence. But whosoever any one fell sick of the evil disease, they sent for the wise man, that he might come to heal and to console by day and by night.

Then his strength failed him; and his soul was troubled, because the pestilence was often mightier than the strength of his art and of the medicinal herbs, and he began to fear for his own life. For he wanted humility, the crown of wisdom, so that he trusted in himself and in his knowledge, but not in the Lord.

Then the Spirit led him forth to Mount Carmel, and he doubted in himself if he should remain in the mountain and not return, or whether he should gather salutary herbs and plants for the comfort and refreshment of the sick. So he went, and said in his heart: "Nature has been my guide from the days of my youth. Therefore now she shall teach me what to do." He was standing before a flower, more beautiful in its bloom than Solomon in all his glory. Then he said: "This flower, with all her beauty and fresh young charms, blooms only for herself; she opens her blossom to the rays of the sun and the breeze, which comes from the west over the sea. What should man do more, but live for himself, without caring for others? I will remain on Mount Carmel and bloom among the flowers, till, when my race is run, I fade at last like a flower, imperceptibly and gently.

Now a butterfly fluttered over the flower. He beheld it, and said: "No, thou dost teach me another thing. I will return to mankind, to the great and rich cities; I will go into the palaces, to earn the sweet fruit of joy and pleasure from my knowledge. As the butterfly hovers over the graceful flower, thus my life shall spread itself over my arts."

Saying this, he bent over the flower. Behold, there was a dead bee in the calyx. Too heavily laden with the delicate dust, she had breathed forth her little soul, in the midst of her labours.

He beheld, and gazed silently on the lifeless form of the insect, while the deep crimson of shame mantled his cheek. "Spirit of the Lord," exclaimed he at last, "I acknowledge Thee in Nature; pardon my anger and my folly! From henceforth I will follow Thee, and return, a faithful disciple, to Thee and my calling."

Then he collected the rarest plants and herbs of the mountain, and went humbly and with cheerful countenance back to the village, to the dwellings of the sufferers.

—F. A. Krummacker.

7. How they are to be valued.

(2208.) The apostle considered that gift most desirable by which men might most edify one another. And hence that noble declaration of one of the most gifted of mankind: "I had rather speak five words with my understanding, that I might teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue."

Our estimate is almost the reverse of this: we value a gift in proportion to its rarity, its distinctive character, separating its possessor from the rest of his fellowmen; whereas, in truth, those gifts which leave us in lonely majesty apart from our species, useless to them, benefiting ourselves alone, are not the most godlike, but the least so; because they are dis severed from that beneficent charity which is the very being of God. Your lofty uncommunicable thoughts, your ecstasies, and aspirations, and contemplative raptures—in virtue of which you have estimated yourself as the porcelain of the earth, of another nature altogether, than the clay of common spirits—tried by the test of Charity; what is there grand in these if they cannot be applied as blessings to those that are beneath you? One of our countrymen had achieved for himself extraordinary scientific renown; he pierced the mysteries of nature, he analysed her processes, he gave new elements to the world. The same man applied his rare intellect to the construction of a simple and very common instrument—that well-known lamp which has been the guardian of the miner's life from the explosion of fire. His discoveries are his nobility in this world, his trifling invention gives him rank in the world to come. By the former he shines as one of the brightest luminaries in the firmament of science, by the latter, evincing a spirit animated and directed by Christian love, he takes his place as one of the Church of God.

And such is ever the true order of rank which graces occupy in reference to gifts. The most trifling act which is marked by usefulness to others is nobler in God's sight than the most brilliant accomplishment of genius. To teach a few Sunday-school children, week after week, commonplace simple truths—persevering in spite of dulness and mean capacities—is a more glorious occupation than the highest meditations or creations of genius which edify or instruct only our own solitary soul.

—F. W. Robertson, 1816-1853.

8. Are not to be gloried in.

(2209.) How nimbly does that little lark mount up, singing towards heaven in a right line! whereas the hawk, which is stronger of body and swifter of wing, towers up by many gradual compasses to his highest pitch. That bulk of body and length of wing hinder a direct ascent, and require the help both of air and scope to advance his flight; while the small bird cuts the air without resistance, and needs no outward furtherance of her motion.

It is no otherwise with the souls of men in flying up to their heaven. Some are hindered by those powers which would seem helps to their soaring up thither: great wit, deep judgment, quick apprehension, send about men, with no small labour, for the recovery of their own incumbrance; while the good affections of plain and simple souls raise them up immediately to the fruition of God. Why should we be proud of that which may slacken our way to glory? Why should we be disheartened with the small measure of that, the very want whereof may (as the heart may be affected) facilitate our way to happiness?

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(2210.) When Solomon observes that there is "no remembrance of the wise more than of the fool for ever," it is evidently not of the wise man's mere name he designs to speak. The name may be remembered while the man and his works are, to all practical purposes, forgotten. The world goes on just as if he had never been. The space he filled, when alive, was so large, his influence made itself felt in so many ways—his skilful and weighty hand touched and regulated so many of the springs that animate and govern human affairs, that it seemed as if his death must bring society to a stand. And yet the grave has scarcely closed over his mortal remains, when the place that knew him knows him no more. As the setting of the mid-night moon brings stars into view, whose feebler rays were quenched before, even so does it come to pass that names which the wise man's, while it shone, threw into the shade, now take their place in the social firmament; and, though the light be less, the world moves on under it, as if none better or brighter had been ever known. "Let not, therefore, the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might, let not the rich man glory in his riches: but let him that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth Me, that I am the Lord which exercise lovingkindness, judgment, and righteousness in the earth: for in these things I delight, saith the Lord."

—Buchanan.

9. Are not the highest good.

(2211.) Gifts do not commend us nor our services to God.

When you have good meat in a dish, possibly you will lay flowers upon it, cut oranges and lemons and lay upon the side of the dish; but a wise man knows that the meat is never the better for these flowers, or for the sugar that lies on the side of the platter; a wise man knows that if those were wanting, the meat were never the worse.

Beloved! God our Father is of infinite wisdom: parts and gifts are flowers indeed, and they help to cook out a duty, and to make it more acceptable to men, but the Lord, who is Wisdom, knows that the duty is never the better for them; and He knows that when these flowers are wanting, the duty is never the worse.

—Brügel, 1600-1670.

10. Are not an unmixed good.

(2212.) Joseph's coat made him finer than his brethren, but it caused all his trouble; so great gifts lift a saint up a little higher in the eyes of men, but they occasion many trials, from which thou who art low art exempt.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

11. Are not identical with grace.

(2213.) It is not every prayer evidenceth God's Spirit in us. Such as have no grace may excel in gifts, and affect the hearts of others in prayer, when their own hearts are not affected; as the lute makes a sweet sound in the ears of others, but itself is not sensible.

—Watson, 1696.

(2214.) Sin, in the reign and power of it, may cohabit with the most excellent natural gifts under the same roof, I mean in the same heart. A man may have the tongue of an angel, and the heart of a devil. The learned Pharisees were but painted sepulchres. Gifts are but as a fair glove drawn over a foul hand.

—Flavel, 1627-1691.

(2215.) As among the weeds of unmanured earth some are painted with alluring colours, but they are only weeds still; so among the fruits of un-sanctified minds one may carry a more specious appearance than others; but they are all, spiritually considered, no other still than sins and vices, the growth of "the carnal mind, which is enmity against God."

—Salter, 1840.

12. Apart from grace will but insure our condemnation.

(2216.) Though a man have never such parts and gifts, yet if he have not grace withal, he may go to hell and perish to all eternity; for by his gifts he is not united to Jesus Christ, nor made the child of God, nor estated into the covenant of grace (Matt. vii. 21-23). You see how it is with children playing in the day,—when night comes, one child goes to his father, and the other to his father; it may be all the day they are so like that you cannot say, whose child is this, or that: but when night comes, the father then comes to his child, and says, "Come, my child, come in doors;" and if the other offers to go in there, "No, child, you must go home to your father." So, while we are living, grace and gifts are mingled together; some men have gifts, and some men have graces, and they look very like: ah, but when night comes, and when death comes, then says God to those that have grace, "Come, my children, enter in;" but if those that have gifts only come, He sends them away. And if a man do go to hell and perish, the more gifts he has the deeper will he sink into hell. As it is with a man that is in the water, sinking in the water, the more he is laden with gold the more he sinks, and as he is sinking, if he have any time to cry out, he says, "Oh take away these bags of gold, these bags of gold will sink me, they will undo me:" so I say, these golden parts and golden gifts will undo men; when men come to hell, and shall perish indeed, the more golden gifts and parts they have had, the deeper they shall sink in hell.

—Ambrase, 1592-1644.

13. Are less influential than grace.

(2217.) Of course, the operation of God on human souls must be proportioned to their capacity; it is not every nature that can be divinely gifted: a piece of hollow stick may be put into the ground, and left to all the gracious influences of sun and shower, of dew, and the spring and autumn seasons, but it will never be a tree: and the nettle and the briar, however they may be trained, can never be jasmine or oak. There are souls too narrow in their spring and their foundation to have much opened in them, still less to open the natures or minds of others. God's mightiest work must be done by largest souls; and when there is a soul in which already has been awakened all that native genius can awaken by delicate sympathies, and a power to unwind the flexible harmonies of our beings; when you find the lofty judgment, and the stately march of thought, and the overflowing language, and the happy imagery, and then superadd to all these, and fill all these with the force and power of divine genius, how mighty then becomes the character! Before, the power was existent but undeveloped, but piety—holiness—develops power. The truth is, the quality of holy and unholy genius is different. The masters of criticism might institute a comparison between the genius of Homer and David; but the nature of the inspiration introduces an essential difference into all our estimates of the men. The genius kindled from the altar of nature is one, and the genius kindled from the altar of God is another. I must and do maintain this, the writings of all heathendom essentially differ from the writings of our Holy Scriptures in the quality of the thoughts and the emotions communicated; and, at all times, the smaller and more limited genius, inflamed by holiness, is able to open things to us far more wonderful than the unhallowed flight of the most lofty spirit. Let any man, as an illustration of this, contrast the writings of Watts and Byron. Byron was a man the native majesty of whose genius leaves Watts far behind; but never will Byron's power equal that of the sweet singer of Stoke Newington.

—R. Paxton Hood.

14. The greatest gifts do not render us indispensable to the Church or the world.

(2218.) It is a humbling lesson to human vanity, and tends to check the growth of self-importance, to consider how well the world will go on when we are laid in the dust and no longer partake in the direction of its affairs. Leaves fall in autumn; trees are felled in the spring; but the next vernal season renews the foliage; another age replaces the veteran oak removed by the axe or the tempest, and the forest still presents its broad expanse and deep shade to the eye of the traveller. So it is with the Church of God; its members and its ministers die, but others are baptized for the dead, and fill up their vacant seats in the spiritual house.

magnificence," said John Howe, "that when He hath prepared and polished a mighty instrument, so as to be capable of some great service, He can lay it aside without loss, and do as well without it." He that could do without apostles and prophets, after He had removed them by death, can dispense with us. We are none of us axles of His chariot wheels. This should check the inflation of some men's minds, and repress that overweening conceit by which they destroy in part their own usefulness. It would surprise and mortify many, could they come out of their graves ten years after they had entered them, and still retain the ideas they once entertained of their own importance, to see how well the world goes on without them. If the death of ordinary individuals be but as the casting of a pebble from the seashore into the ocean, which is neither missed from the one nor sensibly gained by the other, the death of the more extraordinary ones is but as the foundering of a piece of rock into the abyss beneath : it makes at the time a rumbling noise and a great splash ; but the wave which it raises soon subsides into a ripple, the ripple itself soon sinks to a placid level, the tide flows, ships pass, commerce goes on, and shore and ocean appear just as they did before the disruption.

—Jama.

GOD.

I. REASON FOR BELIEF IN HIS EXISTENCE.

(2220.) The devout man does not only believe, but feels there is a Deity. He has actual sensations of Him ; his experience concurs with his reason ; he sees Him more and more in all his intercourses with Him, and even in this life almost loses his faith in conviction.

—Addison, 1672-1719.

(2221.) But what has been often urged as a consideration of much more weight, is not only the opinion of the better sort, but the general consent of mankind to this great truth ; which I think could not possibly have come to pass, but from one of the three following reasons : either that the idea of a God is innate and co-existent with the mind itself ; or that this truth is so very obvious that it is discovered by the first exertion of reason in persons of the most ordinary capacities ; or, lastly, that it has been delivered down to us through all ages by a tradition from the first man. The atheists are equally confounded to whichever of these three causes we assign it.

—Budgell, 1685-1736.

II. THERE IS ONE GOD.

(2222.) There is but one Omnipotent power. If there be two Omnipotents, then we must always suppose a contest between these two : that which one would do, the other power being equal, would oppose, and so all things would be brought into confusion. If a ship should have two pilots of equal power, one would be ever crossing the other : when one would sail, the other would cast anchor : here were a confusion, and the ship must needs perish. The order and harmony in the world, the constant and uniform government of all things, is a clear argument that there is but one Omnipotent, one God that rules all. "I am the first, and I am the last, and beside Me there is no God."

—Watson, 1696.

III. GOD IS A SPIRIT.

(2223.) There is no other passage in Scripture besides this (John iv. 24) where it is expressly declared that God is a Spirit ; yet throughout the whole of Scripture we are led to infer that He is so, and our duty to Him is everywhere founded on the belief and knowledge of this attribute of His nature. When we affirm God to be a Spirit, we not only distinguish Him from all bodily substance, but, in the same manner as the soul greatly excels the body in the superior powers of life, understanding, knowledge, activity, so we must conceive of God as of a Being excelling in an infinitely higher proportion, not only the souls of men, but also all other intellectual natures or spirits whatsoever.

—Samuel Clarke, 1675-1729.

IV. THE GREAT FIRST CAUSE.

—Downame, 1644.

V. HIS GREATNESS AND GLORY.

—N. Rogers, 1594-1660.

(2226.) The creature is nothing in comparison with God ; all the glory, perfection, and excellency of the whole world do not amount to the value of a unit in regard of God's attributes ; join ever so many of them together, they cannot make one in number ; they are nothing in His regard, and less than nothing. All created beings must utterly vanish out of sight when we think of God. As the sun does not annihilate the stars, and make them nothing, yet it annihilates their appearances to our sight ; some are of the first magnitude, some of the second, some of the third, but in the daytime all are alike, all are darkened by the sun's glory : so it is here, there are degrees of perfection and excellency, if we compare one creature with another, but let once the glorious brightness of God shine upon the soul, and in that light all their differences are unobserved. Angels, men, worms, they are all nothing, less than nothing, to be set up against God. This magnificent title, "I am," darkens all, as if nothing else were.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(2227.) A being is absolutely perfect when it is incapable of the least accession or diminution. Now such a being is God, and none but God. As the sun gets nothing by the shining of the moon and the stars, neither loseth anything by their eclipses or withdrawals ; so the self-sufficient God gains nothing by all the suits and services, prayers and praises of His creatures ; neither loseth anything by their neglect of their duties. He is above the influence of all our performances.

—Swinnoch, 1673.

(2228.) It was a noble conception of the great artist of antiquity, who, to express the grandeur of the father of the gods, placed his statue, composed of ivory and gold, and crowned with olive, in the midst of the most sumptuous temple of Greece, but enthroned and sitting ; and of such dimensions that the roof of that majestic edifice was but a little elevated above the summit of the image, and conveyed the striking intimation that his noblest structure was after all too limited to contain the uplifted form of the divinity. To the vulgar eye, the magnitude of this stupendous image appeared as a defect, and the proportions of the general fabric seemed to have been forgotten. But, on a closer inspection, this very circumstance contributed, more than all besides, to its impression,—engrossing, absorbing, and overwhelming the spectator ; not more with the richness of its materials and the perfection of its symmetry than by the gigantic scale of its greatness,—casting a new and unexpected glory upon the dwelling which it far outshone. But what is the dwelling we can fabricate for the invisible and infinite God ? Where is the house we build Him, or what is the place of His rest ? How the very insignificance of every earthly sanctuary, contrasted with His infinitude, adds to the force of these emotions ! How His immeasurable grandeur swells upon our thought, when we remember, that, though here His foot may tread, His power upholds the stars, and His glory outshines the firmament ; while the amplitude of all creation lies—like a pebble from the shore—within the hollow of His hand !

—M'All.

VI. INCOMPREHENSIBLE, YET NOT UNKNOWN.

(2229.) It is easy indeed, while the comparison is made only between men, for every man to imagine himself to be possessed of something which others ought not to contemn ; but when we ascend to the contemplation of God, that confidence is immediately lost. And the case of our soul with respect to God is similar to that of our body with respect to the visible heaven ; for the eye, as long as it is employed in beholding adjacent objects, receives proofs of its own perspicacity ; but if it be directed towards the sun, dazzled and confounded with his overpowering brightness, it feels no less debility in beholding him, than strength in the view of inferior objects. —Calvin, 1509-1564.

(2230.) We know God but as men born blind know the fire : they know that there is such a thing as fire, for they feel it warm them, but what it is they know not. So, that there is a God we know, but what He is we know little, and indeed we can never search Him out to perfection ; a finite creature can never fully comprehend that which is infinite.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(2231.) God is to us, and to every creature, incomprehensible. If thou couldst fathom or measure Him, and know His greatness by a comprehensive knowledge, He were not God. A creature can comprehend nothing but a creature. You may know God, but not comprehend Him ; as your foot treadeth on the earth, but doth not cover all the earth. The sea is not the sea, if you can hold it in a spoon. Thou canst not comprehend the sun which thou seest, and by which thou seest all things else, nor the sea, nor the earth, no, nor a worm, nor a pile of grass : thy understanding knoweth not all that God hath put into any the least of these ; thou art a stranger to thyself, and to somewhat in every part of thyself, both body and soul. And thinkest thou that perfectly comprehendest nothing, to comprehend God ? Stop then thy over-bold inquiries, and remember that thou art a shallow, finite worm, and God is infinite. First reach to comprehend the heaven and earth and whole creation, before thou think of comprehending Him, to whom the world is nothing, or vanity.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2232.) If I never saw that creature which contains not something unsearchable ; nor the worm so small, which affordeth not matter for questions to puzzle the greatest philosopher I ever met with ; no wonder, then, if mine eyes fail, when I would look at God, my tongue fail me in speaking of Him, and my heart in conceiving. As long as the Athenian superscription doth so too well suit with my sacrifices, "To the unknown God," and while I cannot contain the smallest rivulet, it is little I can contain of this immense ocean. We shall never be capable of clearly knowing, till we are capable of fully enjoying ; nay, nor till we do actually enjoy Him. What strange conceivings hath a man, born blind, of the sun and its light ; or a man born deaf, of the nature of sounds and music ; so do we yet want that sense by which God must be clearly known. I stand and look upon a heap of ants, and see them all, with one view, very busy to little purpose. They know not me, my being, nature, or thoughts, though I am their fellow-creature ; how little, then, must we know of the great Creator, though He with one view continually beholds us all. Yet a knowledge we have, though imperfect, and such as must be done away. A glimpse the saints behold, though but in a glass, which make us capable of some poor, general, dark apprehensions of what we shall behold in glory.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2233.) It is indeed our unhappiness in this state of weakness and mortality, that the most advanced in knowledge and improved in piety have yet but very lame and imperfect conceptions of the great God. And the reason of it is manifest ; because we are forced to understand that which is infinite, after a finite manner. For philosophy teaches, that "intelligere est pati, et pati est recipere." And one thing receives another, not according to the full latitude of the object, but according to the scanty model of its own capacity. If we let down a vessel into the sea, we shall bring up, not what the sea can afford, but what the vessel can hold : and just so it is in our own understanding of God.

—South, 1633-1616.

(2234.) The glorified saints and holy angels, who behold as much of His glory as creatures can bear, do not know Him as He is. They are filled with His power and love. He comprehends them, but they cannot Him. A vessel cast into the sea, can but receive according to its capacity. Thus are they filled with His fulness till they can hold no more; but His glory still remains infinite and boundless. The glorious seraphim, therefore, are represented as hiding their faces with their wings, unable to bear the splendour of His presence.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(2235.) One day, in conversation with the Jungo-kritu, head pundit of the College of Fort William, on the subject of God, this man, who is truly learned in his own shastras, gave me from one of their books this parable:—"In a certain country there existed a village of blind men. These men had heard that there was an amazing animal called the elephant, but they knew not how to form an idea of his shape. One day an elephant happened to pass through the place: the villagers crowded to the spot where this animal was standing. One of them got hold of his trunk, another seized his ear, another his tail, another one of his legs, &c. After thus trying to gratify their curiosity they returned into the village, and sitting down together they began to give their ideas on what the elephant was like: the man who had seized his trunk said he thought the elephant was like the body of the plantain tree; the man who had felt his ear said he thought he was like the fan with which the Hindoos clean the rice; the man who had felt his tail said he thought he must be like a snake; and the man who had seized his leg, thought he must be like a pillar. An old blind man of some judgment was present, who was greatly perplexed how to reconcile these jarring notions, respecting the form of the elephant; but he at length said, 'You have all been to examine this animal, it is true, and what you report cannot be false: I suppose, therefore, that that which was like the plantain tree must be his trunk; that which was like a fan must be his ear; that which was like a snake must be his tail, and that which was like a pillar must be his body.' In this way, the old man united all their notions, and made out something of the form of the elephant. Respecting God," added the pundit, "we are all blind; none of us has seen Him; those who wrote the shastras, like the old blind man, have collected all the reasonings and conjectures of mankind together, and have endeavoured to form some idea of the nature of the Divine Being."

The pundit's parable may be appropriately applied to the science of theology. Some Christians see one truth and some another, and each one is quite sure that he has beheld the whole. Where is the master-mind who shall gather up the truth out of each creed, and see the theology of the Bible in its completeness?—a sublimer sight than the believers in the isms have yet been able to imagine.

—Spurgeon.

(2236.) In this world our knowledge is comparatively dim and unsatisfactory, but nevertheless is introductory to grander and more complete vision.

This is eminently true in regard to our view of God. We hear so much about God that we conclude that we understand Him. He is represented as having the tenderness of a father, the firmness of a judge, the pomp of a king, and the love of a mother. We hear about Him, talk about Him, write about Him. We hush His name in infancy, and it trembles on the tongue of the dying octogenarian. We think that we know very much about Him. Take the attribute of mercy. Do we understand it? The Bible blossoms all over with that word MERCY. It speaks again and again of the tender mercies of God; of the sure mercies; of the great mercies; of the mercy that endureth for ever; of the multitude of His mercies. And yet I know that the views we have of this great Being are most indefinite, one-sided, and incomplete. When at death, the gates shall fly open, and we shall look directly upon Him, how new and surprising! We see upon canvas a picture of the morning. We study the cloud in the sky, the dew upon the grass, and the husbandman on the way to the field. Beautiful picture of the morning! But we rise at daybreak, and go up on a hill, to see for ourselves that which was represented to us. While we look, the mountains are transfigured. The burnished gates of heaven swing open and shut, to let pass a host of fiery splendours. The clusters of purple cloud hang pendant from arbours of alabaster and amethyst. The waters make a pathway of inlaid pearl for the light to walk upon; and there is morning on the sea. The crags uncover their scarred visage, and there is morning among the mountains. Now you go home, and how tame your picture of the morning seems in contrast. Greater than that shall be the contrast between this Scriptural view of God and that which we shall have when standing face to face. This is the picture of the morning: that will be the morning itself.

—Talmage.

(2237.) Now, our God is a brilliant star, too far off for measurement; but bright, we know, and perfect, we know. The fact of His existence we know; but little else do we know concerning Him. "In the ages to come" we shall see Him as He is. Now we see Him as we are.

—Becher.

(2238.) Thou hast granted us some sense of the mystery of godliness, and some sense of the majesty of God; and our thoughts have been pilgrims through the mighty realm where Thou art; and though, by searching, we cannot find Thee out to perfection, we have discerned Thee. As they that look upon the mountains cannot see all that is in them, nor the whole range thereof, so have we not found Thee out; and yet we have explored Thy nature, and learned truly that which we know. We have discerned dimly where point after point Thou dost recede toward the infinite and the eternal; and we rejoice in that which we know, and in the overhanging glory of that which we discern faintly, and in the faith of that which is unknown, and which will yet to us transcend in beauty all that now we can frame or fashion by our own imagination.

(2239.) Our knowledge of God in the present state of things, with all that has been done to winnow the wheat from the chaff, is exceedingly incomplete and unsatisfying. Our knowledge of the divine nature is unlike the knowledge of the qualities of matter which may be discerned through the use of our senses. God cannot be learned by any process of observation; nor can His kingdom be studied by scientific methods. As is declared, "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation." A knowledge of the divine nature is not a thing to be demonstrated by scientific tests. It depends upon growth in us. We cannot understand in God anything of which we have not something in ourselves that stands for a suggestion, an analogue, and of which we have not had a parallel experience. How far can we understand God? As far as we are developed in spiritual directions. How is it possible for us to come to any considerable understanding of God, who is, after all, to us but a Being somewhat greater than good beings whom we have known upon earth? How much can we convey of our nature and of our modes of government to the intelligent creatures that are below us?—for there are creatures below us who understand many things. How much could we make the horse, the dog, or the elephant understand, either of our dispositions, or of the motives from which we work, or of the structure and nature of our minds, or of the processes of society, or of the civil government which we are carrying on? You could not make them understand these things, because they have not the development, the faculty that makes the meaning plain to them. The beings below us cannot understand us because they are not sufficiently unfolded.

And is it not so as between us and a superior Intelligence? There is not that in us which can understand God. Parts of His ways, and these the lower parts, we understand; but the distance between us and the Eternal Father is greater than the distance between us and the more intelligent animals below us. —Becher.

(2240.) When we shall see Him as He is, not the first rude daubs of the incipient artist will seem so rude when the master-artist has found his skill, as our earliest conceptions of God will seem when, "in the ages to come," we shall see Him as He is, no longer as through a glass darkly, no longer as the vision of our own imagination, no longer as the imperfect work of our reason, but in all the amplitude and fulness of the real Being, and when we are so developed that we are able to behold and still to live.

We see on every side how many analogies of this there are. We see how impossible it is for beings to conceive of things that are far along beyond them in the way of development. Who, for instance, that was created with mature power, but had never lived to gather experience, could to-day form the slightest forecast of next October? Who could tell the colour of the autumn from the first growths and germs of the spring? Imagine an Esquimaux striving to form some idea of the tropics from the missionary's description. What has he to form an idea but from the moss and stunted shrubs that scarcely grow higher than his feet, and the flowers that blossom in the midst of northern glaciers? Would he form a conception of the brilliant fruits of the tropics? He must grub the ground for berries, which are all the fruit that the frigid zone knows. And from the creeping vine of the wintergreen-berries, from the huckle-berries, and such like things, he is to form his ideal of those magnificent parasitic plants which fill the tropical forests. These little berries are his oranges, and bananas, and pine-apples. He attempts, shivering in the midsummer, under the iceberg, to form a conception of the everlasting pomp and glory of the equatorial region. And when he has formed a conception of it, he cheers himself, and sighs, and wishes he could see it. Oh! it is so beautiful in his imagination! But what does he know of it? What is an Esquimaux's ideal of equatorial glory? The reality transcends unspeakably any conception which he can form.

And that which is to be revealed to you, "in the ages to come," when you shall have left these mortal bodies, when you shall have experienced the sensations of the new life, when you shall have unfolded and come into the realm where things are no longer symbols but realities; when the physical shall have ceased, and the spiritual shall have been ushered in—that will surpass any ideal that your highest imagination has ever pictured. —Becher.

VII. REVELATIONS OF GOD.

(2242.) O Lord, Thou showest thyself everywhere, and everywhere inattentive men neglect to perceive Thy presence. All Nature speaks of Thee, and resounds with Thy holy name; but she speaks to men that are deaf, and who owe their deafness to the noise and distraction that they raise about themselves. Thou art near, Thou art even within them; but they wander out of themselves, and are fugitives from their own breasts. —Finslon, 1651-1715.

(2243.) That immense vagueness which some men call God! that terrible Power; that Fate; that unseen Being who looks down upon the world apparently with supreme indifference—(for, though ten thousand groans go up toward God, no sigh comes back through the air to us to tell us that there is sympathy there; though sorrows sweep over the world as equinoctial storms by day and by night, for all that we can see by mere sense or natural reason, God is as calm and cold as the upper ether)—is He a reality? Is there a God? If so, is He more than an engineer of this vast and complicated machine? What token have we? What can we gather from nature to teach us of God? I do not believe that nature, if you leave out the experience of the human family (and that part usually is left out when men study Divine nature to find Divinity), can teach you that God is good. I think that the argument stands fair hitherto, that either there is a divided empire, or there is a capricious Governor, sometimes good and sometimes bad. Outside of revelation, outside of the clear light which we derive from the Lord Jesus Christ, God is afar off. He is brought near in Christ Jesus. He came to teach us what God's dispositions are. He came to teach us that God is a Father, and that His purposes run through wide circles, and extend so far that we can no more judge of the limits of them than we could judge from the corn-kernel of what the whole harvest would be if we had never seen one. The beginnings are apparent, but the ultimate ends are obscure.

—Becher.

VIII. HOW HE IS TO BE KNOWN.

Can be known only by the pure in heart.

(2244.) The Divine nature can only be made known to us through that part of our nature which is like His. You cannot imitate silence by making a noise. You cannot make a man have sweet tastes by giving him sour or bitter. You cannot take an opaque stone, and with it illustrate the transparency of glass or a diamond. You cannot by darkness imitate light. You must have the quality itself that you wish to make known. If that which in God is so precious were a material thing, then it might be made known to us through material organisations; but as God is infinite in love, and beauty, and wisdom, and glory, and excellence, He is to be known to us in these elements by the actual possession of the qualities themselves, as windows through which the light of heaven shines. The windows in us are to be like the heavenly windows; and the knowledges that come to us are to be brought out from the very chords which are in our bosom, and which vibrate in us.

—Becher.

IX. OUR FATHER.

(2245.) Every one takes care of his own; the silly hen, how doth she bustle and bestir herself to gather her brood under her wing when the kite appears! No care like that which Nature teacheth. How much more will God, who is the Father of such dispositions in His creature, stir up His whole strength to defend His children? "He said, They are my people, so He became their Saviour," as if God had said, Shall I sit still with my hand in my bosom, while my own people are thus misused before my face? I cannot bear it. The mother as she sits in her house, hears one shriek, and knows the voice, cries out, Oh, 'tis my child! Away she throws all, and runs to him. Thus God takes the alarm of His children's cry, "I heard Ephraim bemoaning himself," saith the Lord; his cry pierced His ear, and His ear affected His bowels, and His bowels called up His power to the rescue of him.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2246.) The relation which the Most High sustains to His intelligent and accountable creatures is too comprehensive and too intimate to be perfectly imaged by any earthly tie; but in the relation which runs through this parable [i.e. of The Prodigal Son, St. Luke xv. 11-32], it finds its nearest equivalent. And what amongst ourselves is fatherhood? It is that relation which identifies greatness with littleness, which makes it quite natural that the arm which wields the battle-sword should gently rock the sleeping babe, which secures from contempt the master of sentences, the sage, the orator, though he babble idle rhymes in his infant's ear. It is that relation which lives in the loved one's joy or honour, and which is wounded in his grief or his disgrace; which feels no pride like a son's promotion, and which, gazing at the blood-stained garment, cries, "It is my son's coat, an evil beast has devoured him; I will go down to him in the grave sorrowing;" but which would rather that the evil beast had devoured him, than that he should live to blight his principles or forfeit a virtuous fame. It is that relation amongst men which toils and denies itself, and does not grudge the long journeys and the sleepless nights which enable the father to lay up for the children; and both in heaven and earth, it is that relation which delights in being trusted and which desires to be loved in return; which cannot be asked too many favours, or be entrusted with too many confidences, which seeks one gift only, "My Son, give me thine heart," and hears no language more pleasing than "My Father, Thou art the guide of my youth. Father, forgive my trespasses, and give me this day my daily bread."

—Hamilton.

(2247.) A king is sitting with his council deliberating on high affairs of state involving the destiny of nations, when suddenly he hears the sorrowful cry of his little child who has fallen down, or been frightened by a wasp; he rises and runs to his relief, assuages his sorrows and relieves his fears. Is there anything unkingly here? Is it not most natural? Does it not even elevate the monarch in your esteem? Why then do we think it dishonourable to the King of kings, our heavenly Father, to consider the small matters of His children? It is infinitely condescending, but is it not also superlatively natural that being a Father He should act as such?

—Spurgeon.

(2248.) The idea that God, who governs the heavens and the whole universe, should not only stoop to think of each man, but should be interested in every phase of the experience of each man, so that we may literally say that the Divine sympathy attends every step of every individual human life—this idea, when you look at it in the light of gubernatorial love, or the love of an officer of government, does seem extravagant. It seems impossible. Nor does it become likely, and address itself to our feelings as a thing real and true, till we look at the affection that we behold in the social relations of life—for instance, the paternal and the maternal—and see what the effect of loving is. Then, how trifles cease to be trifles! how little things, and disagreeable things, become neither little nor disagreeable! They are changed. If you were to take the love that a woman shows outwardly for her friends, and the things that she admires and relishes in life, you would not judge, by her ordinary carriage and the tastes which she usually displays, that little and almost silly things could ever please her. But see her at home with her little child of one year old or less. Take notice how that stately, self-poised, cultured, fastidious woman, who, in general society, would disdain the trifles of life, and still more its prattling trifles, abandons herself to the little ways of the child. See how its little quirks and pranks, that to everybody else would be ridiculous, please her and engross her. And since it is very much so with fathers too, every one perceives plainly that it is in the power of love to entirely transform things, so that they shall seem different and be different. And that which is true of love is true of every other faculty or feeling.

Through this analogy I can understand how God may have an interest even in the lowest and the least. He charges His angels with folly; but He loves them. And if men are a great deal more foolish than angels, still it is in the power of Divine love to take an interest in them too; not judiciously, not officially, not on account of God's majesty, but on account of God's love. "As a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him."

—Becher.

(2249.) There are some who reject Christianity because it seems to them incredible that God would have taken so much trouble, as the New Testament represents Him to have done, for the salvation of creatures so infinitely beneath Him as we are. But they forget that the New Testament teaches also that God is our Father. If that be granted, if it be conceded that God does really sustain to us the parental relation, then I declare that it is not surprising that God should have made such sacrifices to save us, unless the feeling of compassion be fainter and feebler in God than it is in us. Even a man will not permit a child to perish without some effort to save it—any child; it need not be his own. Now, one fact is worth a dozen arguments; and I will therefore ask you to listen to a humble man as he relates an incident in his otherwise uneventful life. For a little while imagine yourselves to be seated around the table of an American boarding-house, where the inmates are spending an hour or two one evening in relating the more remarkable events that have occurred to them; imagine that you are listening to one of the guests there, instead of to me.

"My name is Anthony Hunt. I am a drover, and I live miles and miles away, upon the Western prairie. There wasn't a house within sight when we moved there, my wife and I; and now we have not many neighbours, though those we have are good ones.

"One day, about ten years ago, I went away from home to sell some fifty head of cattle—fine creatures as ever I saw. I was to buy some groceries and dry goods before I came back, and, above all, a doll for our youngest, Dolly; she never had a shop doll of her own, only the rag babies her mother had made her. Dolly could talk of nothing else, and went down to the very gate to call after me to 'buy a big one.' Nobody but a parent can understand how my mind was on that toy, and how, when the cattle were sold, the first thing I hurried off to buy was Dolly's doll. I found a large one, with eyes that would open and shut when you pulled a wire, and had it wrapped up in paper, and tucked it under my arm, while I had the parcels of calico and delaine, and tea and sugar put up. It might have been more prudent to stay until the morning, but I felt anxious to get back, and eager to hear Dolly's prattle about the doll she was so anxiously expecting.

"I mounted on a steady-going old horse of mine, and pretty well loaded. Night set in before I was a mile from town, and settled down dark as pitch while I was in the middle of the wildest bit of road I know of. I could have felt my way through, I remembered it so well, and it was almost that when the storm that had been brewing broke, and pelted the rain in torrents, five miles, or may be six, from home, too. I rode on as fast as I could; but suddenly I heard a little cry, like a child's voice. I stopped short and listened. I heard it again. I called, and it answered me. I couldn't see a thing. All was dark as pitch. I got down, and felt about in the grass; called again, and again I was answered. Then I began to wonder. I'm not timid; but I was known to be a drover, and to have money about me. I thought it might be a trap to catch me, and there to rob and murder me.

"I am not superstitious—not very—but how could a real child be out on the prairie in such a night, at such an hour? It might be more than human. The bit of a coward that hides itself in most men showed itself to me then, and I was half inclined to run away; but once more I heard that piteous cry, and said I, 'If any man's child is hereabouts, Anthony Hunt is not the man to let it lie here to die.'

"I searched again. At last I betought me of a hollow under the hill, and groped that way. Sure enough, I found a little dripping thing, that moaned and sobbed as I took it in my arms. I called my horse, and the beast came to me, and I mounted, and tucked the little soaked thing under my coat as well as I could, promising to take it home to mammy. It seemed tired to death, and pretty soon cried itself to sleep against my bosom.

"It had slept there over an hour, when I saw my own windows. There were lights in them, and I supposed my wife had lit them for my sake; but when I got into the door yard, I saw something was the matter, and stood still with dead fear of heart five minutes before I could lift the latch. At last I did it, and saw the room full of neighbours, and my wife amid them weeping. When she saw me she hid her face.

"'Oh, don't tell him,' she said. 'It will kill him.'

"'What is it, neighbours?' I cried.

"And one said, 'Nothing now, I hope. What's that in your arms?'

"'A poor lost child,' said I. 'I found it on the road. Take it, will you? I've turned faint.' And I lifted the sleeping thing, and saw the face of my own child, my little Dolly.

"It was my darling, and no other, that I had picked up upon the drenched road.

"My little child had wandered out to meet 'Daddy' and doll while her mother was at work, and for her they were lamenting as for one dead. I thanked God on my knees before them all. It is not much of a story, neighbours; but I think of it often in the nights, and wonder how I could bear to live now, if I had not stopped when I heard the cry for help upon the road—the little baby-cry, hardly louder than a squirrel's chirp."

Is God less pitiful than man? Did you notice the last sentence in this man's story? "It is not much of a story, neighbours; but I think of it often in the nights, and wonder how I could bear to live now, if I had not stopped when I heard that cry for help upon the road—the little baby-cry, hardly louder than a squirrel's chirp." To me that sentence alone renders credible the story of redemption. Had God not listened to the cry for help, the piteous wail of misery, that ascended to Him from His lost children, and sent His Son to seek and save them, it seems to me that afterwards remorse must have risen within Him so strong as to cause Him to envy those of His children who can die; for, be it remembered, He knew, not simply that certain children were perishing, but that they were His children.

—R. A. Bertram.

X. HIS ATTRIBUTES.

(2250.) All God's attributes are identical, and are the same with His essence. Though He hath several attributes whereby He is made known to us, yet He hath but one essence. A cedar-tree may have several branches, yet it is but one cedar. So there are several attributes of God whereby we conceive of Him but one entire essence.

—Watson, 1696.

of light, and contributing to form this blaze of splendour; so it is in regard to the Divine nature: the whole is resplendent with inconceivable grandeur, and yet each perfection possesses a distinct glory, and contributes its rays to reveal the character of Him who "is Light, and in whom is no darkness at all." Or like the prismatic colours, each distinct, and in the perfection of beauty; and yet all blending in one beam of light. —Ewing.

(2252.) There is all possible perfection in God. In Him absolutely is fulness. All life is in God, life in all its varieties. Jehovah is the living God. All wisdom is in God: He is "the only wise God." All purity is in God: "God is light." All righteousness is in God: "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord God Almighty." All love is in God: "God is love." These several attributes are not only individually complete, but perfect in their harmony. They combine as the prismatic colours in light, and unite as the several gases which constitute the atmosphere, and they blend as the hues of the rainbow. —S. Martin.

XL ETERNAL.

(2253.) God is behind all time. "In the beginning," when was that? By what innumerable stages, through what immense eras, the imagination must travel in order to reach it! Not the least of the many benefits which modern science has conferred upon us, is the enlargement of our conceptions concerning time. How vast a period is a thousand years! How far off it seems since Alfred the Great ascended the English throne, yet it is not quite a thousand years ago. Last week I saw in the Exeter Museum a mummy that is supposed to have been embalmed in the days of Hezekiah. What marvellous revolutions have taken place since that mummy was a living man! How old we should have thought him had he lived till now! Yet he would have been quite a juvenile beside Adam, had he not drawn upon himself the curse of death. How far off seems the time when our first parents dwelt in paradise! And yet what an insignificant period is that compared with the ages which have elapsed since the granite which forms the first courses of our new chapel was a molten fluid! What a mystery is time, stretching ever backward, past the hour when at the laying of the earth's foundations "the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy!" past the hour when those "morning stars" and "sons of God" were called into being! But when in thought we have reached this dateless period, when we have gone beyond it, and find ourselves in a vast void where no star shines and no seraph sings, even then we find ourselves in the presence of God. We can think of all things and persons besides Him coming into existence, but the thought of the birth of God is one which the mind refuses to entertain. He is the great I AM, to whom one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day. He is "the high and lofty one that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy." Let us bow in reverence before Him. "Lord, Thou hast been our dwelling-place in all generations. Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever Thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting Thou art God." —R. A. Bertram.

XII. UNCHANGEABLE.

(2254.) "Trust ye in the Lord for ever, for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength." We may depend upon Him, for His arm is never dried up, nor does His strength fail. There is no wrinkle upon the brow of Eternity. God is where He was at first; He continues for ever a God of infinite power, able to save those that trust in Him.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(2255.) What encouragement could there be to lift up our eyes to God if He were of one mind this day and of another mind to-morrow? Who would put up a petition to an earthly prince if he were so mutable as to grant a petition one day and deny it another, and change his own act? But if a prince promise this or that thing upon such or such a condition, and you know his promise to be as unchangeable as the laws of the Medes and Persians, would any man reason thus? because it is unchangeable we will not seek to him, we will not perform the condition upon which the fruit of the proclamation is to be enjoyed. Who would not count such an inference ridiculous? What blessings hath not God promised upon the condition of seeking Him?

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(2256.) Famine, pestilence, revolution, war, are judgments of the Ruler of the World. What sort of a Ruler, we ask, is He? The answer to that question will determine the true sense of the term, a judgment of God. The heathen saw Him as a passionate, capricious, changeable Being, who could be angered and appeased by men. The Jewish prophets saw Him as a God whose ways were equal, who was unchangeable, whose decrees were perpetual, who was not to be bought off by sacrifices but pleased by righteous dealing, and who would remove the punishment when the causes which brought it on were taken away; in their own words, when men repented God would repent. That does not mean that He changed His laws to relieve them of their suffering, but that they changed their relationship to His laws, so that, to them thus changed, God seemed to change. A boat rows against the stream; the current punishes it. So is a nation violating a law of God; it is subject to a judgment. The boat turns and goes with the stream; the current assists it. So is a nation which has repented and put itself into harmony with God's law; it is subject to a blessing. But the current is the same; it has not changed, only the boat has changed its relationship to the current. Neither does God change—we change; and the same law which executed itself in punishment now expresses itself in reward.

—Brooks.

XIII. HIS OMNIPRESENCE.

(2257.) Would men speak so vainly if they considered God overheard them? Latimer took heed to every word in his examination when he heard the pen go behind the hangings: so, what care would persons have of their words if they remembered God heard and the pen is going in heaven?

—Watson, 1696.

(2258.) As birds, wheresoever they fly, always meet with the air; so we, wheresoever we go, or wherever we are, always find God present.

—Sales.

(2259.) Suppose that, in travelling through a wilderness, a spacious garden should burst upon your view, in the midst of which is a splendid palace. Upon entering it, you perceive in every apartment proofs of the agency of some living person, though you see none. Complicated machinery is moving and various occupations are carried on, but still the agent who produces these effects is invisible. Would you be the less convinced that they were produced by some intelligent agent? Now, you have the same proof of the existence of God in His works that you would have in the case I have supposed of the existence and presence of some invisible agent; and it is just as unreasonable to doubt of His existence, as it would be to doubt whether the palace had been built by any person, or was only the work of chance. Suppose you were informed by a writing on the wall that the palace was inhabited or haunted by spirits who were constantly watching your conduct, and who had power to punish you if it displeased them; and that you were also informed at the same time of the course of conduct which it would be necessary to pursue in order to obtain their approbation. How careful would you be to observe the rules, and how fearful of displeasing those powerful spirits! And if you were further informed that these were the spirits of your deceased parents, and that they were able to hear if you addressed them, how delightful it would be to go and tell them of your wants and sorrows, and feel sure that they listened to you with sympathy and compassion! I tell you, this world is haunted, if I may so express it,—haunted by the eternal Spirit. He has given you rules by which to regulate your conduct, and is able to punish every deviation from them. And can you recollect that such a Being is constantly noticing your conduct, and still persist in disobeying His commands? God is also your heavenly Father; and why can you not go to Him as such, with the same confidence which you would exercise towards an earthly parent? —Salter.

(2260.) It is impossible to conceive of any thought more appalling than this would be, did this unseen and ever-present Being regard us with unfriendly feelings. A prisoner in France during the great Revolution tells us of the torture occasioned by the simple fact, that through a hole in the door of his cell he saw the eye of the sentinel constantly watching him: wherever he moved, that eye followed him; whatever he did, that eye observed him; it was fixed on him when he went to sleep, when he awoke it was still there. By no means could he escape its glance even for a moment. It glared on him incessantly until the sight of it became almost intolerable. And it is difficult to conceive of all the agony which would accrue to us from the consciousness that an enemy, unseen by us, attended all our steps; that his eye was upon us by night and by day; that in solitude or in the crowd—in our places of business—at home or in the street, he never left us. His invisibility would render us unable to defend ourselves from his assaults, were we otherwise capable of doing so; and leaving us ignorant of his intentions and movements, would keep us in a state of torturing suspense, ever fearing, and not knowing how soon, he might gratify his enmity by involving us in ruin. And did we know, moreover, that, owing to his great power, we were completely at his mercy, and that his will would suffice to inflict upon us the most excruciating tortures —oh! then the thought would be so fraught with horror as to occasion a very hell on earth—a hell from which even the bottomless abyss, or the blackness of darkness, would prove a welcome refuge; nor would it be surprising if some, by a suicidal act, attempted to obtain relief from the intolerable thought.

And what cause for gratitude have we that a thought which might be so fraught with horror, may prove to all of us the source of unfailing consolation! The character of God is such that the man is sadly wrong who derives no comfort from the consciousness of His presence. —Landels.

(2261.) What can be so awful as to know that there is never any moment at which what we do is not entirely naked and exposed to the sight of God, just as surely as though we were in the noon-day light, before an assembled universe? Those who, upon occasions of ceremony, are in the presence of an earthly monarch, have an incessant feeling of constraint, an oppressive sense that certain forms of respectful etiquette must every moment be kept up. How infinitely would the feeling of constraint, the sense of subjection to another's will, be increased, if we could realise in a similar degree the tremendous presence of the King of Kings, who is, in truth, never absent from us for a single instant, who not only sees everything which we do, but even reads the most secret thoughts and desires of our hearts! The marvel is, that we can live on in the enjoyment of the pleasures of life, and in the pursuit of our lusts and appetites, just as though no God existed. This, melancholy as are some of its results, I take to be one of the most remarkable of the many proofs which are to be found of the wisdom and mercy of our Creator. We are able to appreciate the continual presence of God as a pure act of abstract reason, just as we are able to know that space must be infinite, and that there must be a never-ending eternity; but we cannot realise any of these truths as hard, tangible facts, in the same way that we realise, by their contact with our senses, the existence of the material objects of the world around us—the trees and rivers we admire, the food we eat, the friends we love. That we cannot in this substantial, matter-of-fact way, feel the continual presence of God, is, I say, a merciful and loving provision of our Maker. For it is clear that if we could do so, our whole moral nature would be, as it were, turned upside down. To begin with, we should cease to be free moral agents. As it is impossible that a man, trembling on the edge of a precipice or threatened with instant death by shipwreck, could indulge in any besetting sin, so it would be equally impossible that he could do so when oppressed with the conscious presence of that awful Being who can at a breath consign him to any fate. But all pleasure would cease too. The foundation of all our enjoyment consists in the absence of restraint, and the consciousness of power and freedom to do and think according to the desire of the passing moment. A man may have his pride gratified by being admitted to a ceremonial interview with his sovereign upon some state occasion; but it is with a sense of relief that he escapes from the kingly presence, and gets back to the free atmosphere of everyday existence. There could be no enjoyment of life were we under the restraint which would be necessarily incidental to our being imbued with a continual consciousness of the presence of the Almighty Maker of all things. God is therefore like an august and wise monarch, who does not often burden His subjects by calling them into His presence, or, if He does so, dispenses with His sceptre and his robes, and meets them genially with condescending friendship. By the wise and holy man the presence of his Almighty King is always felt and known, even when it is not actually perceived. He ever remembers that the Monarch is in His palace to rule and govern and direct, even when there is no outward pageant, no noisy manifestation of external power. Thus the presence of God becomes a settled and abiding thing, but rather as a sweet and soothing influence than a hard, tangible fact. On the other hand, the ungodly man can for a time, so to speak, cast out God's presence. He strives to forget it altogether, and for the most part he is successful. He goes on in his own sinful, selfish way, living outside God's presence, until the day arrives when that presence can no longer be evaded, and it comes with all the terrors of eternal judgment. God has left abundant witness to His existence in the infinite wisdom and goodness which we see manifested everywhere throughout the world. But in this life His presence coerces no man. We can live with or without God, as we choose.

—Hooper.

(2262.) God is behind all space. What a solemn mystery there is in this idea of space! Modern science has added to the benefits which it has conferred upon us, this also, that it has enlarged our conceptions of space. How much more worthily we are enabled to think of the universe and empire of God than those could have done, who regarded the firmament as a solid shell of the earth, stargemmed, fixed a few miles above it, and revolving around it for the purpose of alternating day and night! One of the most conspicuous respects in which astronomy has proved herself the handmaid of devotion, has been by revealing to us in part the scale on which the universe is built. What heights and depths of space the telescopes of Rosse and Herschel have enabled us to penetrate! What awe seizes upon the soul, as viewed through their powerful lenses the faint nebulae resolve themselves into clusters of shining worlds, and through the spaces between these worlds, across immeasurable and inconceivable distances, other nebulae burst upon the astonished vision! as all these countless suns and systems are detected to be revolving around the brightest of the Pleiades! Is that to us faint star the centre of the universe? Is it there that God sits enthroned? Is that the one stable and unmoving orb? Or is that moving too, carrying the innumerable suns and worlds that are linked on to it around some vaster centre? Where is the centre of the universe? Where is its circumference? How far must we travel before we reach a margin beyond which space does not extend? Is there such a margin? But though we had reached the last world that revolves around the great unknown centre, we should not have come upon a tenantless void: we should still be in the presence of God, in the hollow of whose hand all worlds and suns and systems lie. "Whither, O Lord, shall I go from Thy Spirit? or whither shall I flee from Thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, Thou art there: If I make my bed in hell, behold, Thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall Thy hand lead me, and Thy right hand shall hold me."

—R. A. Bertram.

XIV. HIS OMNISCIENCE.

—Hammond, 1605-1666.

(2264.) God looks to the bottom and spring of actions; not only the matter but the principle. A man that stands by a river in a low place, can only see that part of the river that passes by; but he that is aloof in the air, in a higher place, may see the whole course, where it rises and how it runs. So God at one view sees the beginning, rise, and ending of actions; whatever we think, speak, or do, He sees it altogether. He knows our thoughts before we can think them,—"Thou knowest my down-sitting and my up-rising; Thou understandest my thoughts afar off." Before we can conclude anything, a gardener knows what roots are in the ground long before they appear, and what fruits they will produce.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(2265.) Fore-knowledge is not the cause of the things that are foreknown; but because the thing is future and shall be, that is the reason why it is fore-known; for it doth not, because it was known, come to pass, but because it was to come to pass, therefore it was foreknown; and bare knowledge is no more the cause of any event, which because it is known must infallibly be, than my seeing a man run in the cause of his running, which, because I do see, is infallibly so. —Tillotson, 1630-1694.

—South, 1633-1716.

(2267.) God's omniscience should indeed make us ashamed to commit sin: but it should embolden us to confess it. We can tell our secrets to a friend that does not know them; how much more should we do it to Him that knows them already! God's knowledge outruns our confessions, and anticipates what we have to say. As our Saviour speaks concerning prayer, "Your heavenly Father knows what you have need of before you ask;" so I may say of confession, your heavenly Father knows what secret sins you have committed before you confess. But still He commands this duty of us; and that not to know our sins, but to see our ingenuity. Adam, when he hid himself, to the impiety of his sin added the absurdity of a concealment. Our declaring of our sins to God, who knows them without being beholden to our relation; it is like opening a window to receive the light, which would shine in through it howsoever. Every man has a casement in his bosom, through which God looks in upon him every day. When a master sees his servant commit a fault in secret, and thereupon urges him to a confession, he does it not so much to know the fault as to try the man. Now there is no duty by which we give God the glory of His omniscience so much as by a free confession of our secret iniquities. Joshua says to Achan, "My son, give, I pray thee, glory to the Lord God of Israel, and make confession unto Him."

—South, 1633-1716.

XV. HIS WISDOM.

(2268.) As a beam of light passing through a clink in a wall, of what figure soever, always forms a circle on the place where it is reflected, and by that describes the image of its original, the sun, thus God in every one of His works represents Himself. But the union of all the parts by such strong and sweet bands, is a more pregnant proof of His omnipotent mind. Is it a testimony of great military skill in a general to range an army, composed of divers nations that have great antipathies between them, in that order as renders it victorious in battle? And is it not a testimony of infinite providence to dispose all the hosts of heaven and earth so as they join successfully for the preservation of nature? . . . Sophocles was accused by his ungrateful sons, that his understanding being declined with his age, he was unfit to manage the affairs of his family; he made no other defence before the judges, but recited part of a tragedy newly composed by him, and left it to their decision, whether there was a failure in his intellectual faculties: upon which he was not only absolved but crowned with praises.

—Bates, 1625-1699.

XVI. HIS POWER.

(2269.) The proud king of Babylon commanded the numerous nations under his empire to prostrate themselves, like brutes, in the lowest admiration of the image he set up; and when the three Hebrew young men refused to give divine honour to it, he threatened, "If ye worship not, ye shall be cast the same hour into the midst of a burning fiery furnace; and who is that God that shall deliver you out of my hands?" This is the language of a man (poor dust!) that can heat a furnace with fire, and has a squadron of soldiers ready upon the least intimation of his pleasure to throw into it any that disobeyed, as if no power either in heaven or earth could rescue them from him. It was impious folly in him that thus spake: but God can give order to death to seize on the stoutest rebel, and cast him into an eternal furnace, and say in truth, Who shall deliver out of my hands? His power reaches beyond the grave. Tiberius intending to put to death by slow and exquisite torments one who killed himself, cried out in a rage, "Carnilius has made an escape from me!" But no sinner can by dying escape God's justice; for death itself takes the condemned, and delivers them to endless torments.

—Bates, 1625-1699.

(2270.) Power is that glorious attribute of God Almighty which furnishes the rest of His perfections. 'Tis His omnipotence that makes His wisdom and goodness effectual, and succeed to the length of His will. Thus, His decrees are immutable, and His counsels stand; this secures His prerogative, and guards the sovereignty of His being; 'twas His power which made His ideas fruitful, and struck the world out of His thought. 'Twas this which answered the model of the creation, gave birth to time and nature, and brought them forth at His first call: thus, He spake the word, and they were made; He commanded, and they were created. 'Tis the divine power which is the basis of all things; which continues the vigour of the second causes, and keeps the sun and moon in repair. This holds everything constant to appointment, and true to the first plan: thus the revolutions of the seasons, the support of animals, the perpetuity of species, is carried on and maintained. Without this, things would soon riot, and ramble out of distinction; the succours of life would be cut off, and nature drop into decay. Omniscience and goodness without a correspondent power would be strangely short of satisfaction: to know everything without being able to supply defects and remedy disorders, must prove an unpleasant speculation; to see so many noble schemes languish in the mind and prove abortive, to see the most consummate wisdom, the most generous temper, fettered and disarmed, must be a grievance: but when omnipotence comes into the notion, the grandeur is perfect and the pleasure entire.

—Jeremy Collier, 1650-1726.

(2271.) Now, though in a just idea of the Deity perhaps none of His attributes are predominant, yet, to our imagination, His power is by far the most striking. Some reflection, some comparing, is necessary to satisfy us of His wisdom, His justice, and His goodness. To be struck with His power, it is only necessary that we should open our eyes. But whilst we contemplate so vast an object, under the arm, as it were, of almighty power, and invested upon every side with omnipresence, we shrink into the minuteness of our own nature, and are, in a manner, annihilated before Him. And although a consideration of His other attributes may relieve, in some measure, our apprehensions, yet no conviction of the justice with which it is exercised, nor the mercy with which it is tempered, can wholly remove the terror that naturally arises from a force which nothing can withstand. If we rejoice, we rejoice with trembling; and even whilst we are receiving benefits, we cannot but shudder at a power which can confer benefits of such mighty importance.

—Burke, 1712-1797.

(2272.) What an immense workman is God in miniature as well as in the great! With the one hand, perhaps, He is making a ring of one hundred thousand miles in diameter, to revolve round a planet like Saturn, and with the other is forming a tooth in the ray of the feather of a humming-bird, or a point in the claw of the foot of a microscopic insect. When He works in miniature, everything is gilded, polished, and perfect; but whatever is made by human art, as a needle, &c., when viewed by a microscope, appears rough, and coarse, and bungling.

—E. Law, 1703-1845.

(2273.) The upholding of the world is a continual causing of it; and differeth from creation, as the continued shining of a candle doth from the first lighting of it. If therefore the creation do wonderfully declare the power and wisdom and goodness of God, so also doth the conservation. And note that God's ordinary works are as great demonstrations of Him in all His perfections as His extraordinary. Is it not as great a declaration of the power of God, that He causes the sun to shine, and to keep its wondrous course from age to age, as if He did such a thing but for a day or hour? and as if He caused it to stand still a day? And is it not as great a demonstration of His knowledge also, and of His goodness? Surely we should take it for as great an act of love, to have plenty, and health, and joy continued to us as long as we desired it, as for an hour. Let not then that duration and ordinairness of God's manifestations to us, which is their aggravation, be looked upon as if it were their extenuation; but let us admire God in the sun and stars, in sea and land, as if this were the first time that ever we have seen them.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2274.) Another ground on which men come to despise God's word, and to disregard or reject Christianity, is confounding with and in the exercise of this reason, God's physical and moral omnipotence. It appears at first, perhaps, that there is no difference; but there is really a great one. They are notwithstanding often confounded. If God be omnipotent, why did not He prevent man falling? If God be omnipotent and wish everybody to be saved, why does not He save everybody at once? If God have all power, why does He allow any to perish? The right answer to all this is, God's omnipotence governs the solar system, but He does not keep planets in their orbits by the Ten Commandments. The two things have no connection with each other. So God's moral omnipotence governs the intellect of man, but He does not govern it by the law of gravitation. The law of gravitation is that by which He governs the orbs and the planets; moral law, moral government, moral truth, is that by which He governs His responsible and intelligent children. If you confound the two, you land in mischief and confusion; if you distinguish, you will see that if man is to be what he is—an intelligent, responsible being—he is not to be conducted from earth to heaven as a locomotive engine is driven from London to Edinburgh, placed upon its groove, and propelled mechanically along; he is to be moved by motives, by hopes, by fears, by reasoning, by fact; and if he resist all, it is not want of light, but something that has gone wrong within him, and that must be put right before he can be governed or righted himself.

—Cumming.

XVII. HIS HOLINESS.

(2275.) God had revealed His holiness to Israel; and He wished them to consider it the "beauty" of His nature. If we take a portrait of a man, we try to represent his face, not his hand, nor his back, nor his foot; we try to delineate his beauty, to refresh our minds with that which is most memorable and distinguishing in his exterior semblance; so, while the hand and finger of God denote His power and skill, and His throne is used for majesty and dominion, He considers His holiness as the true lustre of His character, as that by which He will be best known. We read of "the beauty of His holiness," that He is "glorious in holiness;" and that this beauty of the Lord is to be found in His holy temple.

—Reynolds.

XVIII. HIS RELATION TO SIN.

1. He is not the author of sin.

(2276.) There is a vast difference between the sun being the cause of the lightness and warmth of the atmosphere, and the brightness of gold and diamonds, by its presence and positive influence; and its being the occasion of darkness and frost, in the night, by its motion, whereby it descends below the horizon. The motion of the sun is the occasion of the latter kind of events; but it is not the proper cause, efficient, or producer of them, though they are necessarily consequent on that motion, under such circumstances: no more is any action of the Divine Being the cause of the evil's wills. If the sun were the proper cause of cold and darkness, it would be the fountain of these things, as it is the fountain of light and heat: and then something might be argued from the nature of cold and darkness, to a likeness of nature in the sun; and it might be justly inferred, that the sun itself is dark and cold, and that his beams are black and frosty. But from its being the cause no otherwise than by its departure, no such thing can be inferred, but the contrary; it may justly be argued, that the sun is a bright and hot body, if cold and darkness are found to be the consequence of its withdrawal; and the more constantly and necessarily these effects are connected with and confined to its absence, the more strongly does it argue the sun to be the fountain of light and heat. So, inasmuch as sin is not the fruit of any positive agency or influence of the Most High, but, on the contrary, arises from the withholding of His action and energy, and, under certain circumstances, necessarily follows on the want of His influence; this is no argument that He is sinful, or His operation evil; but, on the contrary, that He and His agency are altogether good and holy, and that He is the fountain of all holiness. It would be strange arguing, indeed, because men never commit sin, but only when God leaves them to themselves, and necessarily sin when He does so, that therefore their sin is not from themselves, but from God; and so, that God must be a sinful being: as strange as it would be to argue, because it is always dark when the sun is gone, and never dark when the sun is present, and therefore all darkness is from the sun, and that his disk and beams must needs be black.

—Jonathan Edwards, 1637-1716.

(2277.) God is no more the Author of sin than the sun is the cause of ice; but it is in the nature of water to congeal into ice when the sun's influence is suspended to a certain degree. So there is sin enough in the hearts of men to make the earth the very image of hell, and to prove that men are no better than incarnate devils, were He to suspend His influence and restraint. Sometimes, and in some instances, He is pleased to suspend it considerably; and, so far as He does, human nature quickly appears in its true colours.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

2. He tempts no man to sin.

(2278.) A man has a servant who is a thief, and yet the servant would be esteemed for an honest man; so, to try him, his master leaveth his purse full of money before him; if his servant steal it, is he not a thief, and does he not declare himself to be such a one? Yes, undoubtedly. And now, who made him a thief, the master or the money which was left where he might come by it? Surely neither of them, for the money is the good creature of God; and when the master put it before his servant, he did not compel him to take it and steal it. If this servant had been an honest man, he would not have touched it, or if he had taken it, he would have brought it back to his master and not have kept it; but seeing that the servant was already a thief, and had his heart given to theft, when he had the occasion to put into execution the wicked affection of his heart, he did it. And whereas he did it no sooner, that was because that he had not the occasion and means; for if occasion had been sooner offered to him, and if he had found whereto to reach out his hand, he would not have kept it in; and when he began to put forth his hand, he not only then began to be a thief, but he began to declare himself what he was. As we have the example in Judas, who was a thief a long time, but he never showed it until he had an opportunity: even so, although God hath given the occasion to man to prove and try him, and to cause him to make known that which is in his heart, it followeth not therefore that God hath done the sin or is the Author of it, or that we must impute the fault to Him and not to the man who hath committed it.

—Cawdray, 1609.

3. In what sense He hardens the heart.

(2279.) The obstinacy of Pharaoh was properly his own. It is true, we are assured that God hardened his heart; but we are not thereby warranted to suppose that God is the author of the sin, which He hates and forbids. It is written again, that "God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth He any man," and the scripture is to be interpreted consistently with itself. It would be absurd to ascribe darkness or ice to the agency of the sun, though both inevitably follow if the light and heat of the sun be withdrawn to a certain degree. A degree of heat is necessary to keep water in that state of fluidity which we commonly suppose essential to its nature; but it is rather essential to the nature of water to harden into ice, if it be deprived of the heat which is necessary to preserve it in a fluid state; and the hardest metals will melt and flow like water, if heat be proportionably increased. Thus it is with the heart of fallen man. In whatever degree it is soft and impressive, capable of feeling and tenderness, we must attribute it to the secret influence of the Father and Fountain of light; and if He is pleased to withdraw His influence, nothing more is needful to its complete induration.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

4. His permission of sin.

(2280.) The wisdom of God is seen in this, that the sins of men shall carry on God's work; yet that He should have no hand in their sin. The Lord permits sin, but doth not approve it. He hath a hand in the action in which sin is, but not in the sin of the action. As in the crucifying of Christ, so far as it was a natural action, God did concur; if He had not given the Jews life and breath, they could not have done it: but as it was a sinful action, so God abhorred it. A musician plays upon a viol out of tune: the musician is the cause of the sound, but the jarring and discord is from the viol itself. So men's natural motion is from God, but their sinful motion is from themselves. A man that rides on a lame horse, his riding is the cause why the horse goes, but the lameness is from the horse itself. Herein is God's wisdom, the sins of men shall carry on His work, yet He hath no hand in them.

—Watson, 1696.

5. His hatred of sin.

(2281.) It is not every unclean thing that offends the sight: while the slightest stain upon some things will excite in us deep dislike; the feeling depends entirely upon the nature of the thing, and the purpose to which it is applied. We pass by an unclean stone unnoticed; it is unconscious of its state, and meant to be trampled under foot. But rising a step higher in the scale of creation, to an unclean plant, we become conscious of a slight emotion of dislike; because we see that which might have pleased the eye, and have beautified a spot in the creation, disfigured and useless. An unclean animal creates our dislike still more, for, instead of proving useful in any way, it is merely a moving pollution. But an unclean human being excites our loathing more than all; it presents our nature in a light so disgusting that it lessens our pity for him if he be miserable, and excites in us ideas of disease, contamination, and pain. But an unclean spirit—it is loathsome above all things, it is the soul and essence of pollution, it is the most unclean object in the universe, it is the spectacle which excites the deep dislike of God Himself. His dislike of it is the more intense, because originally it was pure, and capable of making perpetual advances towards divine perfection; whereas now it presents itself to His eye, robbed of all its purity, and defiled in all its powers, a fountain of pollution.

—Salter.

(2282.) God Himself, we have always understood, hates sin with a most authentic, celestial, and eternal hatred. A hatred, a hostility, inexorable, unappeasable, which blasts the scoundrel, and all scoundrels ultimately, into black annihilation and disappearance from the sum of things. The path of it is the path of a flaming sword: he that has eyes may see it, walking inexorable, divinely beautiful and divinely terrible, through the chaotic gulf of human history, and everywhere burning, as with unquenchable fire, the false and the deadworthy from the true and lifeworthy; making all human history, and the biography of every man, a God's Cosmos in place of a Devil's Chaos. So it is in the end; even so, to every man who is a man, and not a mutinous beast, and has eyes to see.

—Thomas Carlyle.

6. He willeth not the death of the sinner.

(2283.) A mariner in a storm would very fain save his goods, but, to save the ship, he heaves them overboard. A tender-hearted mother corrects her child, whereas the stripes are deeper in her heart than in its flesh. As it was said by a judge about to give sentence of death upon an offender, "I do that good which I would not:" thus God, more loving than the careful mariner, more tender than the indulgent mother, and more merciful than the pitiful judge, is willingly unwilling that any sinner should die. He punisheth no man as he is a man, but as he is a sinful man. He loves him, yet turns him over to justice. It is God's work to punish, but it is withal His "strange work," His strange and foreign act, not "His good will and pleasure," His nature and property being to have mercy on all men.

—Spencer, 1658.

(2284.) Imagine a poor mother obliged to let fall the blade of the guillotine upon the neck of her child; such is the good God when He condemns a sinner.

—Vianney.

7. His compassion for sinners.

(2285.) A man is asked, "Are you a father?" "Yes," he replies. "Have you a son?" "Yes." "Do you love him?" "Better than my life." "Does he ever do wrong?" "Yes." "When he does wrong, how do you feel?" "I feel indignant, because I love him so; for wrong in one that I love is like a sore in my heart." Now, from such an experience as this, do you not begin to have an interpretation of what God's feeling is towards sin? Do you not have it in your own experience? Can you understand how God hates, not the sinner, but the sin that is a spot upon His beloved child, from the hatred that you feel toward the vices and wickedness that disfigure your child, because you so love that child?

"Well," you say, "if God is so holy, and just, and true, does He not destroy sinners?" When your child has been gambling, and you first find it out, do you draw a line, and say to him, "If ever you transcend that line again, I will exclude you from my house?" Some persons take this course, and every one blames them. They are not true parents. The fatherhood and motherhood is not deep in such hearts as theirs. What does a parent do for a child that goes wrong? Is there anything that you have in your house that you would not give to redeem a wandering son? Is there any property that you would not willingly part with to get him out of trouble, and to hide his disgrace? If to live on a crust, if to drink only water from the spring, and eat only roots from the ground, would reform the child of your heart, would you not give all your means, and think that you had bought him back cheaply? Nay, more than that, if for his sake it was necessary that you should bear with him; that you would lie awake nights till your whole heart was like a furnace of fire; that you should be mortified in your pride, disappointed in your expectation, or wounded in your affections, would you not willingly submit to the necessity? If, in carrying his burden or bearing his sorrow, there was a glimmer of hope that in ten or fifteen years you could save your child, would you not cheerfully suffer on in his behalf?

Now, when it is said that God carries our sorrows and bears our sins, is there no light thrown upon the statement by the experience of the parent in bringing up his child? And when it is said that God hates sin, is there no light thrown upon the statement by the feelings of the parent toward the sin in the child? And is it because the parent does not care for the sin that he bears with it? Is there any one that realises how hateful sin is so much as the parent who is bearing it for the sake of the child?

And when your child comes back to you and says, "Father, I am reformed, but I may not be able to walk entirely right; I understand what you have done for me; I feel it; and I am taking another course of life, but I may stumble on the way;" oh, with what inexpressible tenderness do you receive him! Why, the child does not know how to be glad. It takes a father or a mother to be glad.

When I stood in Antwerp, and heard the chime of some fifty or sixty bells, I could not bear to go anywhere, lest I should get out of the sound of those exquisite peals that rolled every hour, and half-hour, and quarter-hour, filling the air with a weird and yet wonderful sweetness; and I thought to myself, "There, just such are all the feelings of a father's heart, when it is lifted up with hope, and all things ring at every hour, and half-hour, and quarter-hour, and minute, of the return of some wandering child." And does the experience of that father whose child has begun to come back from a career of wrong-doing give you no conception of God's feelings when the sinner begins to return to a life of virtue? How sweet it is! how deep it is! how real it is! Do not stop at any legal question. Do not wait till you can reconcile law and grace. Take the idea of your earthly father and apply that to God, and it will give you the best view of the gladness of God at the sinner's reformation which it is possible for the human mind to conceive of.

And when the child who has wandered from the true path returns, and though he strives earnestly to live aright, after the first or second day falls, so that the father sees that there is a relapse, or falls, so that he bears the marks of condemnation, does the father say, "If that is your reformation, I am weary of you; you made me many fair promises, but you have broken them, and I will have nothing more to do with you?" On the contrary, he says, "My son, I feared that if you mingled with your old associates you would fall. Now help yourself by me. I will go with you and sustain you. I will forget this fall. It came near taking away all that you had gained; but do not be discouraged. You must lean more on me. You must not trust yourself till you are strong enough to stand alone." The father thinks almost more of the child than the child does of himself. From this familiar experience of parental life, do you not get a conception of the Divine patience with men in their helplessness, and of the training and educating force of the love of God in Christ Jesus?

—Beecher.

(2286.) Any ethical system which teaches that God is so pure that there is a vast void between Him and the needy, sinful soul, and which has a tendency to make men fear to go to Him on account of His great purity, is a false system. God's purity is one of His most glorious attributes, but it is used to slander and misinterpret His nature. A right view of God is one which presents Him as a Being who, just in the proportion that we are impure, draws us to Him that we may be purified.

When a man is hungry, he looks for him who has the loaf. When a man is sick, he looks for him who has the medicine. When a man is perishing in the stream, and has struggled to the shore, and cannot get out, he cries to him who has strength. The soul that is sinful goes to Him who has purity to be cleansed. And a view that presents any other God but One who says, "Behold, in Me is your salvation," is a false view.

Any view which presents God as a Being whose justice shall make sinners, who wish to return to Him, unable to do so, is a false view. Public sentiment and public law are like ramparts around a city. As long as a man is inside of the ramparts, they defend him, but the moment he is outside of them, they treat him as an enemy, and he cannot get back, but is exposed to the sweep of artillery. As long as a man stands inside of the ramparts of public sentiment and law, he gets along well enough, but the moment he chances to get outside of them, all men declare him to be an outcast. You might as well attempt to climb up the steep sides of Mount Sinai, as up the human heart when it has set itself to punish those who have done wrong. Public sentiment and law may save a man before he has done wrong, but they damn him after he has done wrong. But not so with God. The way to Him is down hill. Up hill is down hill if it be toward God! If we are in danger, in Him is safety. If we have done wrong, in Him is the remedy. He is the sun that shows us, when we are in darkness, where to go; He is the bright and morning star that makes our dawn and twilight come to us; He is our way; He is our staff; He is our shepherd; He is our sceptred king, to defend us from our adversaries; He is All, in all, to all!

—Beecher.

XIX. HIS WILL MUST BE THE RULE OF OUR LIFE.

(2287.) If a man lay a crooked stick upon an even level ground, the stick and ground ill suit together, but the fault is in the stick; and in such a case, a man must not strive to bring the even ground to the crooked stick, but bow the crooked stick even with the ground. So is it between God's will and ours, there is a discrepancy and jarring betwixt them; but where is the fault? or rather, where is it not? not in the will of God, but in our crooked and corrupt affections; in which case we must not like Balaam seek to bring God's will to ours, but be contented to rectify and order the crookedness of our wills, by the rectitude and sanctity of the will of God, which must be the ruler and moderator of our wills; for which cause we are to cry out with David, "Teach me, O Lord, to do Thy will;" and with the whole Church of God, in that pattern of wholesome words, "Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven;" never forgetting that too of Christ Jesus Himself in the midst of His agony and bloody sweat, "Father, not my will, but Thine be done" (Luke xxiii. 42).

—Augustine, 354-430.

XX. HIS ANGER.

1. Is a divine perfection.

(2288.) Lord Shaftesbury attempts to satirise the Scripture representations of the Divine character. "One would think," he says, "it were easy to understand that provocation and offence, anger, revenge, jealousy in point of honour or power, love of fame, glory, and the like, belong only to limited beings, and are necessarily excluded from a Being which is perfect and universal." That many things are attributed to the Divine Being in a figurative style, speaking merely after the manner of men, and that they are so understood by Christians, Lord Shaftesbury must have well known. We do not think it lawful, however, so to explain away these expressions as to consider the Great Supreme as incapable of being offended with sin and sinners, as destitute of pleasure or displeasure, or as unconcerned about His own glory, the exercise of which involves the general good of the universe. A being of this description would be neither loved nor feared, but would become the object of universal contempt.

It is no part of the imperfection of our nature that we are susceptible of provocation and offence, of anger, of jealousy, and of a just regard to our own honour. Lord Shaftesbury himself would have ridiculed the man, and still more the magistrate, that should have been incapable of these properties on certain occasions. They are planted in our nature by the Divine Being, and are adapted to answer valuable purposes. If they be perverted and abused to sordid ends, which is too frequently the case, this does not alter their nature, nor lessen their utility. What would Lord Shaftesbury have thought of a magistrate who should have witnessed a train of assassinations and murders without being in the least offended at them, or angry with the perpetrators, or inclined to take vengeance on them for the public good? What would he think of a British House of Commons which should exercise no jealousy over the encroachments of a minister; or of a king of Great Britain who should suffer with perfect indifference his just authority to be contemned.

—Andrew Fuller, 1754-1815.

(2289.) One day Sadi was reading the Holy Scriptures, but suddenly he closed the book, and looked stern and serious.

Allmed perceived it, and asked the youth: "What ails thee, Sadi? why dost thy countenance change?"

Sadi answered, "The Scripture speaks here of the wrath of God, and in other places He is called Love. This seems hard and contradictory."

Then his master said calmly, "Shall not the Scriptures speak humanly to human beings? Thou takest no offence when mortal members are attributed to the Most High."

"No," said the youth, "that is innocent figurative language; but anger" —

Then Allmed interrupted him, saying, "I will relate to thee a tale. There lived two rich merchants in Alexandria who had two sons of equal age. They sent them to Ephesus on affairs of their trade. Both youths had been well taught in the faith of their fathers."

"When they had lived for some time at Ephesus, they were dazzled by the splendour and the pleasures of the town, and were seduced to deny the faith of their fathers, and to bow down in idolatrous worship in the temple of Diana."

"A friend in Ephesus communicated this to Kleon, one of the fathers in Alexandria. When Kleon had read the letter, he was grieved in his heart, and very wroth with the young man. Then he went to the other and told him of their apostasy and his grief."

"But the other laughed, and said, 'If my son carry on his trade the better for it, I shall easily console myself.'

"Then Kleon turned away from him, and his anger increased."

Now Allmed said to the youth, "Which of these two fathers seemeth to thee the wiser and better?"

Sadi answered and said, "He who was angry."

"And who," asked his tutor, "was the most loving father?"

The youth answered again, "He who was angry."

"But was not Kleon angry with his child?" asked Allmed.

And Sadi answered, "Not with his child, but with his apostasy and transgression."

"What seemeth to thee to be the origin of such anger at transgression?" asked the master.

And the youth answered, "The holy love of truth."

"Behold, my son," said the old man, "if thou only art able to explain the divine by the divine, thou wilt no longer take offence at the human word."

When Sadi had sat for some time in thought, he looked at his tutor; and Allmed said to him, "Thou seemest not yet satisfied,—a question is on thy lips."

Then the youth answered and said, "Yes, my father, it seemeth to me very daring to speak in such a way of the Highest and Purest."

"Indeed," said the old man, "it is a human expression, and I commend the fear of thy heart. But, behold, my Sadi, when the faithless son, after acknowledging his fall, may have thought in an hour of repentance of the time of his innocence and his pious father, how thinkest thou would then the heart of his father have appeared to him, even if he were not wroth?"

"Ah," said the youth, "I understand thee, my father. His father must have appeared angry to him—and the Holy Scriptures speak to a fallen race."
—F. A. Krummacher.

(2290.) At this first step we might reason on the testimony if we pleased, instead of accepting it, and raise the objection that to imagine passion in God, especially so turbid a passion as anger, conflicts with our notions of His character, and degrades Him in our apprehensions. Beware! remember that in forming an estimate of the character and proceedings of God, we are but little children forming an estimate of the character and proceedings of a man of matured experience. Were it not more reasonable, as well as more reverent, to accept what He says, and to leave Him afterwards to clear up any mystery which may envelop His nature? I can indeed conceive in Him nothing turbid, impetuous, or impulsive, such as sullies the clearness of the human will. But this I can conceive, that there is in Him some high perfection (more incomprehensible to my finite capacity than the speculations of an astronomer to a peasant child), of which anger is the most adequate exponent to my mind, and which I must be content to think of and speak of as anger, or else to remain in total ignorance of it. And this also I can—not only conceive, but most readily assent to, that in an absolutely perfect nature there should be an utter abhorrence of, and antipathy to, moral evil, most justly represented to simple minds by the terms "anger," "curse." We have never seen a perfect character; no perfect character, save one, ever moved upon the earth: but the righteous man, who is striving after and approximating to perfection, has often crossed our path; and surely we have marked in him, that the more righteous he is, the more doth he abhor (in the language of Holy Scripture) everything that is evil. What is the effect upon one who breathes habitually the atmosphere of communion with God, of catching in the current tidings of the day the intelligence of some awful outburst of depravity? When such an one passes on an errand of mercy through the crowded alleys of a great city, and the shouts of malignant execration and profaneness ring in his ear, or scenes of impurity are paraded before his eye, with what feeling does he encounter these symptoms of human degradation? Are they not like a foul odour to his nostrils, or a jarring note to his ear, or an abortion to his sight? Does he not turn away with loathing, and recoil from such scenes and such sounds with an antipathy strong in proportion to his goodness? And is it, then, so hard to conceive that in perfect goodness there may be a recoil from moral evil, something similar in kind to this, though infinitely stronger in degree? And is not such a recoil righteous, and a token of righteousness?

—Gowburn.

2. Its terribleness.

(2291.) The greatness of divine wrath appears in this, that though we may attempt it in our thoughts, yet we cannot bring it within the comprehensions of our knowledge.

And the reason is, because things, which are the proper objects of feeling, are never perfectly known, but by being felt. We may speak indeed high words of wrath and vengeance, but pain is not felt in a discourse. We may as well taste a sound, and see a voice, as gather an intellectual idea of misery; which is conveyed, not by apprehension, but by smart; not by notion, but by experience.

Survey the expressions of Scripture, and see it there clothed and set forth in "fire and brimstone," in "the worm that never dies," in "utter darkness," in "weeping and wailing, and gnashing of teeth." But what are all these but shadows! mere similitudes, and not things! concessions, rather than instructions to our understanding! poor figurative essays, where, contrary to the nature of rhetoric, the figure is still beneath the truth.

Fire no more represents God's wrath, than the picture of fire itself represents its heat; and for the proof of this, let the notional believer be an unanswerable argument, who reads, sees, and hears all these expressions, and yet is not at all moved by them; which sufficiently shows that there is no hell in the description of hell.

But now, there is no man who has actually passed under a full trial of God's wrath; none alive who ever encountered the utmost of God's anger; and if any man should hereafter try it, he would perish in the trial, so that he could not report his experience. This is a furnace that consumes while it tries; as no man can experimentally inform us what death is, because he is destroyed in the experiment.

—South, 1633-1716.

3. Its manifestations.

(2292.) It inflicts immediate blows and rebukes upon the conscience. There are several passages in which God converses with the soul immediately by Himself; and these are always the most quick and efficacious, whether in respect of comfort or of terror.

That which comes immediately from God, has most of God in it. As the sun, when he darts his beams in a direct perpendicular line, does it most forcibly, because most immediately.

Now there are often terrors upon the mind, which flow thus immediately from God, and therefore are not weakened or refracted by passing through the instrumental conveyance of a second cause; for that which passes through a thing, is ever contracted according to the narrowness of its passage. God's wrath, inflicted by the creature, is like poison administered in water, where it finds an allay in the very conveyance.

But the terrors here spoken of, not being inflicted by the intermediate help of anything, but being darted forthwith from God Himself, are by this incomparably more strong and piercing.

When God wounds a man by the loss of an estate, of his health, of a relation, the smart is but commensurate to the thing which is lost, poor and finite. But when He Himself employs His whole omnipotence, and is Himself both the archer and the arrow, there is as much difference between this and the former, as when a house lets fall a cobweb, and when it falls itself upon a man.

God strikes in that manner that He swears; never so effectually as when only "by Himself." A man striking with a twig does not reach so dreadful a blow, as when he does it with his fist; and so makes himself not only the striker but the weapon also.

These immediate blows of God upon the soul, seem to be those things that in the Psalms (xxxviii. 2) are called "God's arrows:" they are strange, sudden, invincible amazements upon the spirit, leaving such a damp upon it, as defies the faint and weak cordials of all creature-enjoyments. The wounds which God Himself makes, none but God Himself can cure. —South, 1637-1716.

(2293.) God's anger exerts itself by embittering of afflictions. Every affliction is of itself a grievance, and a breach made upon our happiness; but there is sometimes a secret energy, that so edges and quickens its afflictive operation, that a blow levelled at the body shall enter into the very soul. As a bare arrow tears and rends the flesh before it; but if dipped in poison, as by its edge it pierces, so by its adherent venom it festers.

We do not know what strength the weakest creature has to do mischief, when the Divine wrath shall join with it; and how easily a small calamity will sink the soul, when this shall hang weights upon it.

What is the reason that David is sometimes so courageous, that, "though he walks through the shadow of death, yet he will fear no evil"? And at another time, "God no sooner hides His face, but he is troubled," as Psalm xxx. 7. What is the cause that a man sometimes breaks through a greater calamity, and at another time the same person fails and desponds under a loss of the same nature? I say, whence can this be, but that God infuses some more grains of His wrath into one than into the other?

Men may undergo many plagues from God, and yet by the enchantment of pleasures, the magic of worldly diversions, they may, like Pharaoh, harden their hearts, and escape the present sting of them. But when God shall arm a plague with sensible, lively mixtures of His wrath, believe it, this will not be enchanted away; but the sinner, like those magicians (whether he will or no), must be forced to confess, "that it is the finger of God," and consequently must bend and lie down under it.

God may cast a man into prison, nail him to the bed of sickness, yet still He may continue master of his comforts; because the sun may shine while the shower falls. The soul may see the light of God's countenance, while it feels the weight of His hand.

But for God to do all these things in anger, and to mark the prints of His displeasure and His indignation upon every blow; this alters the whole dispensation, and turns it from a general passage of Providence into a particular design of revenge.

It is like a deep water, scalding hot, which as it crowns, so at the same time it redoubles its fatal effluence, also burns to death. An unwholesome air will of itself make a man sick and indisposed; but when it is infected, and its native malignity heightened with a superadded contagion, then presently it kills.

And such a difference is there between afflictions in themselves, and afflictions as they are fired, poisoned, and enlivened with God's wrath.

—South, 1633-1716.

(2294.) It shows and exerts itself by cursing of enjoyments. We may, like Solomon, have all that wit can invent, or heart desire, and yet at last, with the same Solomon, sum up all our accounts in "vanity and vexation of spirit."

There is a "pestilence that walks in darkness," a secret, invisible blow, that smites the first-born of all our comforts, and straight we find them dead, and cold, and sapless; not answering the quickness of desire, or the grasp of expectation. God can send a worm to bite the gourd, while it flourishes over our heads; and while He "gives riches," deny a "heart to enjoy them."

For whence is it else, that there are some who flourish with honours, flow with riches, swim with the greatest affluence of plenty, and all other the materials of delight; and yet they are as discontented, as dissatisfied as the poorest of men?

Care rises up and lies down with them, sits upon their pillow, waits at their elbow, runs by their coaches; and the grim spirits of fear and jealousy haunt their stately houses and habitations.

I say, whence is this, but from a secret displeasure of God, which takes out the vitals, the heart, and the spirit of the enjoyment, and leaves them only the caput mortuum of the possession.

—South, 1633-1716.

XXI. HIS LONGSUFFERING.

1. Its cause.

(2295.) There is nothing more wonderful than God's forbearance with sinners. Their foul deeds are all done in His sight; their vile utterances are all spoken in His hearing; their sins are utterly offensive to Him; they fill Him with disgust, and loathing, and anger; and yet, though He has all power, and could crush them in a moment, He spares them! Nay, He does them good; He causes new mercies to descend upon them every day; and when at last He does proceed to punish them for their transgressions, He does so with reluctance and regret; it is with tears that He pronounces the sentence of their doom.

What is the cause of this wonderful forbearance and of this strange compassion? The cause is twofold.

(1.) There is first God's reluctance to inflict pain. He is described to us as the "blessed," or more correctly, as the "happy God." It is His delight to diffuse happiness around Him. In His presence there is fulness of joy, and at His right hand there are pleasures for evermore. The sun does not so overflow with light as He does with benevolence. His loving-kindness reaches farther than the sun's rays. His tender mercies are over all His works. The gladness that thrills in the song of the lark, and that exults in the song of the seraph, is alike inspired by Him; and so quick are His sensibilities, and so wide the range of His sympathy, that He rejoices in the joy of His creatures, from the highest to the lowest. Imagine then, if you can, with what reluctance He lifts that hand, which continually He opens to fill them with good, to smite them and cause them pain. "He doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men."

(2.) Then, next, there is their relationship to Him. Sinners though they are, they are His children. Search out the wickedest and vilest man in all this country, a wretch who is disgusting in his degradation, and what will you have found? You will have found one of God's children, whom He loves with infinite tenderness, for whom He has profound compassion, and whom He is loth to exclude from His mercies. He is a prodigal, he has tried His patience grievously, and often provoked Him to anger, but yet he is His child. There is no greater grief, no more terrible calamity, no more unendurable shame, than a wicked, profligate child. But that son must have sinned against his father's love long and desperately, whom, if he have sinned also against the laws of his country, if he has been guilty of theft or forgery, his father will take with his own hands and deliver up to justice. What father is there of you, who if his prodigal son came fleeing to his door for refuge from the pursuit of the officers of the law, would not rather shelter than surrender him? But if there is such almost inexhaustible love and compassion in the heart of a human father for his child, what feeling for His children must there be in the heart of God, whose tenderness and pity the most self-sacrificing human affection reflects and represents more faintly than does the most distant planet the radiant glory of the sun!

This is the explanation of His wonderful forbearance with sinful men and guilty nations. "It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed, because His compassions fail not."

—R. A. Bertram.

2. Its terrors.

(2296.) As water is deepest where it is the stillest, so where God is most silent in threatening and patient in sparing, there He is most inflamed with anger and purpose of revenge; and, therefore, the fewer the judgments be that are poured forth upon the wicked in this life, the more are reserved in store for them in the life to come.

—Cawdray, 1609.

(2297.) May sinners conclude that there is perfect peace between God and them, because the terrible effects of His fury do not actually roar against them? Are they therefore finally discharged, because they are not presently called to an account? No, certainly, for every sin stands registered in the black book of heaven, and that with all its circumstances and particularities; and consequently has the same sting, and guilt, and destructive quality, as if it were actually tearing and lashing the sinner with the greatest horror and anguish of mind imaginable. And no man knows how soon God may let loose the tormenting power of sin upon his conscience; how soon He may set fire to all that fuel that lies dormant and treasured up in his sinful breast. This he may be sure of, that, whensoever God does so, it will shake all the powers of his soul, scatter his easy thoughts, and lay all the briskness and jollity of his secure mind in the dust. A murdering piece may lie still, though it be charged, and men may walk by it and over it safe, and without any fear, though all this while it has death in the belly of it; but when the least spark comes to fire and call forth its killing powers, every one will fly from its fatal mouth, and confess that it carries death with it. Just so it is with the divine wrath; nobody knows the force of it, till it be kindled.

But now God has, by a perpetual decree, awarded the sad sentence of "tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil." So that, if He gives not the sinner his portion of sorrow here, it is to be feared He has it in full reserve for him hereafter. Upon which account, the present quiet of his condition is so far from ministering any just cause of satisfaction to him, that he has reason to beg upon his knees, that God would alter the method of His proceeding, and rather compound and strike him with some present horror for sin, than sink him under the unsupportable weight of an eternal damnation. When a man must either have his flesh cut and burnt, or die with a gangrene, would he not passionately desire the surgeon to cut, and burn, and lance him, and account him his friend for all these healing severities? This is the sinner's case; and therefore when, upon his commission of any great sin, God seems to be silent, and to connive, let him not be confident, but fear. For one may sometimes keep silence, and smile too, even out of very anger and indignation. If the present bill of his accounts be but small, it is a shrewd argument that there is a large reckoning behind.

—South, 1633-1716.

(2298.) Since we know God to be grievously displeased with sin, there is something awful in His keeping silence, while it is committed under His eye. If a child comes home conscious of having offended a parent, and the parent says nothing all that night, but merely looks very grave, the child is more frightened than he would be by a sharp rebuke, or severe punishment; for if such rebuke or punishment were inflicted, he would, at least, know the worst; but when the parent is silent, he knows not what may be hanging over him. So, when we remember how many things plainly offensive to God are going on all around us, it is a terrible thought that He is still silent. We fear that He is but getting ready to take vengeance on those who defy Him. And so that passage, which we have quoted from the Psalms, carries on the train of thought in what follows: "God is a righteous judge, strong and patient; and God is provoked every day. If a man will not turn, He will whet His sword: He hath bent His bow, and made it ready."

In countries where earthquakes happen, a dead silence always goes before the earthquake. Nature seems hushed into an awful stillness, as if she were holding her breath at the thought of the coming disaster. The air hangs heavily; not a breath fans the leaves; the birds make no music; there is no hum of insects; there is no ripple of streams; and this while whole houses, and even cities sometimes, are hanging on the brink of ruin. So it is with God's silence,—it will be followed, when it seems deepest, by the earthquake of His judgments. And so the holy Apostle writes to the Thessalonians: "When they shall say, Peace and safety" (from the fact of God's being so still, and so dumb), "then sudden destruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child, and they shall not escape."

—Goulburn.

and in His long-suffering He waits, as in the time of Noah, in order that those who have provoked Him to anger may have full opportunity to turn to Him and live. "The Lord is not slack concerning His promise, as some men count slackness, but is long-suffering to us-ward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance. But the day of the Lord will come :—" "Behold the day cometh that shall burn as an oven ; and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble ; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch."

We may see a rough image of this suspension of the Divine vengeance against sin, and of the real terrors of that suspension, which only a timely repentance can avert, in the mountain torrent swollen by the melting of the winter's snow. At first a sudden fuller flow announces to the inhabitants of the valley that the thaw has commenced. But the increasing of the waters suddenly ceases, not to the contentment, but to the alarm, of the inhabitants of the valley below. It inspires their fear and arouses their energies. Instantly they rally out with axe and hook and cord. Mark how eagerly they climb the rugged slippery hill. They know that the present quietude of the torrent tells of future disaster. It is a plain indication to them that some tree has floated down the current, and by the whirling of the waters in the narrow channel has been forced athwart the stream ; that there is being rapidly constructed a natural dam, behind which the flood will gather, and seethe, and swell, and rage, with ever-increasing fury, until it carries all before it, and bursts with devastating volume and force on the farms and fields below ; and the purpose of those men who are hastening upwards is to let out the flood before it has assumed these dangerous proportions. In like manner the guilty and impenitent have as little reason to be at ease "because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily." On the contrary, that very fact should arouse them to an instantaneous repentance ; for while in mercy the long-suffering of God as a mighty dam obstructs the forth-flowing of His righteous vengeance, when in judgment it is at length removed, the terrors of the wrath of their outraged God will be in exact proportion to the space in which it was treasured up.

Or still more forcibly you may see emblemized the gathering of God's vengeance on account of sin in the gathering of the vapour on a summer day. Go, stand upon the cliff, and with keenest eye survey the ocean's expanse, and you cannot detect the vapour ascending. But yet you know it is rising, rising ever, rising without intermission, rising always in greater volume ; and you know that between you and the sun is floating an atmosphere of vapour, now perceptibly dulling the light, but which it needs only a change of wind to condense into cloud. You know that in you soft, calm, lustrous, stainless dome of blue are already stored all the elements of tempests, and thunderings, and flaming fires. The exhortation of our text is addressed to those between whom and the source of all true light and prosperity a vapour of unrequited wrong floats ; and the penalty denounced is, that if they do not heed this warning, this vapour will be condensed into cloud, and those who despised the merciful continuance of the light be brought into darkness and disaster.

—R. A. Bertram.

2. The danger of abusing it.

—Cawdrey, 1609.

(2301.) Dost thou not see in the Scriptures many examples of God's severity upon the abuse of His patience? What became of Sodom and Gomorrah when God waited in the days of Lot? Are they not suffering the vengeance of eternal fire? (Jude 7). What became of the Jews, upon whom Christ waited, calling upon them and crying to them to return and reform? Is not wrath come upon them to the utmost? Are not these like the mast of a ship sunk in the sands, standing up to warn thee to avoid their course, lest thou sink eternally?

—Swinnock, 1673.

XXII. HIS GOODNESS.

1. It is spontaneous.

(2302.) As the fountain finds its expression in overflowing, as a river in rushing to the infinite main, as trees in bursting into life and blossom in the spring-tide, so God feels it His joy to give liberally, and to give above all we ask, or think, or desire, for Christ's sake.

—Cumming.

(2303.) The Divine nature is so constructed that it loves to do good ; that it loves to recuperate men ; that it loves to restore that which sin has blurred or blasted. God loves to bless men out of the supremacy of a love which carries in it infinite benefaction wherever there is mental blight, throughout the heaven and the realms of the universe. The nature of God is fruitful in generosity. He is so good that He loves to do good, and loves to make men good, and loves to make them happy by making them good. He loves to be patient with them, and to wait for them, and to pour benevolence upon them, because that is His nature.

Why does a musician sing? To please himself. It is the very nature of his organisation to sing. His mind loves music. Why does a painter love to paint? Because painting is congenial to his very organic nature. Why does the orator feel the joy of speech? Because his whole nature is attuned and attempered to that operation. Why is it, when you go into many and many a house, that you see all the children gathered in one room? Are they gathered around about the young? No. Are they gathered together with those that are full of frolic? No. They are gathered around the aged. It is the grandmother who sits in her chair, with her nice frilled cap, white as snow, on her head, and her spectacles lifted upon her brow. The little children play about her chair. They can hardly be coaxed away from her. Why are they all drawn to her? Because she makes them happy. Why does she make them happy? Because her thoughts are all serene. She does not do it on purpose. It is her pleasure to do it. She just pours out of herself the music of harmony, and it fills the child with joy. It is her nature to do it.

Why does Sir Curmudgeon, who lives in his castle, when his door has been opened by the hand of want coming in from the storm, say, "Get out—get out—you vagabond! I do not want to hear. Never come here again"? He does it because it is his nature to do it. He does it because he feels like it. When another man sees want, why do his eyes flow down with tears? Why does he instantly feel, "I adopt this want; I will bear this burden?" Why do men watch all day and all night at the door of want, and give, and give, and continue to give? Why are they happy in giving? Is it because of any agreement or bargain that they have entered into? No, they are acting out their nature. That is the way their soul runs.

Why does God love? Because it is His nature to love. Why is He patient? Because it is His nature. Why is He forgiving? Because that is His nature. Why does He promise everything to you without condition? Because He is just so generous. Why does He love you, though you are unworthy of love? Because that is just the way that the mind of God acts. And that this might be made manifest, He made the most magnificent display of it in this world in the Son of God, who came to live, to love, to suffer, and to die for men. But that was only a faint representation. I do not hesitate to say of the royalty of that which is so vast and glorious in the spheres above, that it cannot be made known in time and in our horizon here.

—Becher.

2. His tender mercies are over all His works.

(2304.) Observe three things in God's giving:

(1.) He is not weary of giving; the springs of mercy are ever running. God did not only dispense blessings in former ages, but He still gives gifts to us; as the sun not only enriches the world with its morning light, but keeps light for the meridian. The honeycomb of God's bounty is still dropping.

(2.) God delights in giving. "He delighteth in mercy." As the mother delights to give the child the breast, God loves we should have the breast of mercy in our mouth.

(3.) God gives to His very enemies. Who will send in provisions to his enemy? Men use to spread nets for their enemies, God spreads a table. The dew drops on the thistle as well as the rose; the dew of God's bounty drops upon the worst.

—Watson, 1696.

(2305.) As the sun gives life and joy to all the world, and if there were millions of more kinds of beings and of individuals in it, His light and heat are sufficient for them all; so the divine goodness can supply us with all good things, and ten thousand worlds more.

—Bates, 1625-1699.

(2306.) Paternity and democracy, I think, are the same things. The father looks upon his children, and they are all his children. One may be a little older than another, one may be a little stronger than another, one may be a little handsomer than another; but paternity implies that every one according to its nature and capacity receives attention. If one child has more intellect than another, the parent gives more intellectual stimulus to that child; if another has more tendency in the direction of inventive power, the parent gives more cultivation to that tendency; if another is artistically organised, the parent educates it accordingly. Each one is treated with reference to its own want. And yet, comprehensively, the father looks upon all his children alike as his own dear children. I do not call this the democracy of love: it is necessity.

Now, look at the sun—the only thing of such power that makes no discriminations and distinctions. I have growing in my garden the portulacca in beds, for the sake of its glowing colour. You know that it is first cousin to purslane—a weed that everybody who undertakes to keep a garden hates. I have hoed it, and pulled it up, and denounced it, and spurned it, and given it to the fire and to the pigs with maledictions. But I cannot find out that the sun exercises any discrimination between the purslane growing in my garden and the portulacca. I call one flower and the other weed; but God's sun calls them both flowers. There is the Jamestown weed, beautiful in blossom and odious in odour. But I cannot see that God's sun makes any distinction between this and the choicest plants. I cannot see that the sun is botanical at all. I cannot teach it anything. If I say to the sun, "This is not the old-fashioned single zinnia, with a great coarse globe: this is my double zinnia," the sun says, "Single zinnia, and double zinnia, take as much as you want." On my place I have fox-grapes, that, running over the wall, and falling down in every direction, are among the most beautiful things that grow; and I have a little vineyard of Delaware grapes with which I have taken great pains—pinching, pruning, and cultivating them. I want the sun to take notice of my cultivated grapes, but I cannot get him to pay any more attention to them than he does to those fox-grapes. Some things bring more money in the market than others; but I cannot see but that the sun treats them all just alike. My mullein-stalks are as well taken care of as my wheat. The sun that pours its rays through the trees, and bathes and nourishes the mighty oak, takes just as much pains with witch-grass, or with the detestable Canada thistles—which, old sinners as they are, stand up among the grass as thick as you sinners stand up among the righteous—as with these. And I take notice that, all through the world, the sun does not bestow its regards exclusively upon houses that are built three stories or five stories high. The Esquimaux hut is shined on as much as the king's palace. The sun makes no distinction between a dwelling ornamented with carved work and covered with costly material and a dwelling made of rough slabs and covered with straw. It does not look upon highness any more than upon lowliness; upon breadth any more than upon narrowness; upon culture any more than upon the unrefined conditions of nature. It goes diffusing itself through the air; and everything, whether it be eagle or vulture, whether it be gorgeous butterfly or buzzing beetle, whether it be that which is escaping from peril to life or that which is seeking life, is shined upon. The sun bears itself without partiality in infinite abundance and continuity. It is a life-giving stimulus to all things. And it is the emblem of God, of whom it is said, "He maketh His sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust."

—Becher.

3. The multitude of His mercies.

banks. To this, and that other one has the past brought afflictions? Still, may I not ask, how few our miseries to the number of our mercies; how far have our blessings exceeded our afflictions; our nights of sleep, those of wakefulness; our hours of health, those of sickness; our many gains, the few losses we have suffered? For every blow, how many blessings! and even when He smote with one hand, did not a gracious God hold up with the other? Who has not to sing of mercy as well as judgment; ay, much more of mercies than of judgments? Let us not write the memory of these on water, and of those on the rock. —Guthrie.

The Scriptures employ other, and indeed many images of God's affluent bounty. God Himself says, "I will be as the dew unto Israel"—but there are cloudy skies and breezy nights when no dew falls, emblem of divine bounty, to hang gems on every bush, and snow the fields with "orient pearls." Again it is said: "He shall come down like rain upon the mown grass, and showers that water the earth," but there are days and weeks without a drop of rain. Again it is said, "I will pour water upon him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground"—but it is only on rare occasions that the river, swollen by many a tributary, comes down red and roaring, and overflowing all its banks, turns every wooded knoll into an island, and green valleys into inland seas. But, is there ever a month, a week, a day, an hour, a moment, a single moment, when from Thy blessed and bountiful hand, O God! mercies are not falling in showers—thick as the rain-drops that shimmer in sunlight on the water, or as the snow-flakes that fill the wintry air!

—Guthrie.

(2309.) So many are God's kindnesses to us, that, as drops of water, they run together; and it is not until we are borne up by the multitude of them, as by streams in deep channels, that we recognise them as coming from Him. We have walked amid His mercies as in a forest where we are tangled among ten thousand growths, and touched on every hand by leaves and buds which we notice not. We cannot recall all the things He has done for us. They are so many that they must needs crowd upon each other, until they go down behind the horizon of memory like full hemi-spheres of stars that move in multitudes and sink, not separate and distinguishable, but multitudinous, each casting light into the other, and so clouding each other by common brightness. —Becher.

4. His care for the poor.

(2310.) God presents Himself to us as having a peculiar and tender care of the poor. It is not the robust but delicate child of the family, around whom a father's and mother's affections cluster thickest, are most closely twined. The boy or girl whom feebleness of body or mind makes least fit to bear the world's rough usage, and most dependent on others' kindness, is like those tendrils that, winding themselves round the tree they spangle with flowers, bind it most closely in their embraces, and bury their pliant arms deepest in its bark. And what a blessed and beautiful arrangement of Providence it is, that they who cost most care, and lie with greatest weight on parents' arms and hearts, are commonly most loved!

Helplessness, appealing to our pity, begets affection. Thus was the heart of the rough sailor touched, when, tossing with other castaways in an open boat on the open sea, he parted with a morsel of food, which, hidden with more care than misers hide their gold, he had reserved for his own last extremity. Around him lay men and women; some dead with glassy eyes; some dying, and these reduced to ghastly skeletons; but none of these moved him to peril his own life for theirs. The object of his noble and not unrewarded generosity—for, as if Heaven had sent it on purpose to reward the act, a sail speedily hove in sight—was a gentle boy that, with his face turned on hers, lay dying in a mother's arms, and between whose teeth the famished man put his own last precious morsel.

Of this feeling I met also a remarkable illustration in my old country parish. In one of its cottages dwelt a poor idiot child; horrible to all eyes but her parents'; and so helpless, that, though older than sisters just blooming into womanhood, she lay, unable either to walk or speak, a burden on her mother's lap, almost the whole day long,—a heavy handful to one who had the cares of a family, and was the wife of a hard working man,—and a most painful contrast to the very roses that flung their bright clusters over the cottage window as well as to the lark that, pleased with a grassy turf, carolled within its cage. Death, in most instances unwelcome visitor, came at length,—to her and to their relief. Relief! so I thought; and, when the father came with an invitation to the funeral, so I said. Though not roughly, but inadvertently spoken, the word jarred on a tender chord; and I was more than ever taught how helplessness begets affection in the very measure and proportion of itself, when he burst into a fit of sorrow, and, speaking of his beautiful boys and blooming girls, said, If it had been God's will, I would have parted with any of them rather than her.

Now this kindness to the helpless, of which man's home, both in the humblest and highest walks of life, presents so many lovely instances, and which, you will observe, moves the roughest crowd on the street, without taking time to inquire into its merits, to throw themselves into the quarrel of a woman or weeping child, is a flower of Eden, that clings to the ruins of our nature,—one beautiful feature of God's image which has to some extent survived the fall. "The Lord is very pitiful and of tender mercy." Well named, "Our Father who is in heaven;" He sets Himself forth in His Word as the Patron and Protector of the poor; He recommends them in many ways and by many considerations to our kindness; and teaches us that, if we would be like Himself, we must remember their miseries amid our enjoyments, and fill their empty cups with the overflowings of our own.

—Guthrie.

(2311.) God is in sympathy with you. Don't you think He knows how heavy the hod of bricks is that the workman carries up the ladder on the wall? Don't you think He hears the ring of the pickaxe of the miner down in the gold shaft? Don't you think He knows how hard the tempest strikes the sailor at masthead? Don't you think He sees the factory girl amid flying spindles, and knows how her arms ache? Don't you think He sees the sewing-woman in the fourth story, and knows how few pence she gets for making one garment? Ay, ay; I tell you that louder than the roar of the wheels and the din of the great cities, the sigh of the over-tasked working-man rises into the ear of God. Oh! ye who are weary of hand, weary of head, weary of foot, and weary of heart, "Cast thy burden on the Lord, and He will sustain thee."

—Talmage.

5. His condescension to the lowly.

(2312.) There is no subject of contemplation, indeed, more marvellous than the unceasing attention and care lavished by Deity on small as well as on great; that the vast provinces of His giant empire do not withdraw His thoughts and care from the feeble and insignificant; that He who wheels the planets in their courses, and lights up the blazing suns of the firmament, can watch also the sparrows fall, and feed the young ravens when they cry! Just as the mountain supports the tiny blade of grass and the modest floweret as well as the giant pine or cedar; just as that ocean bears up in safety the seabird seated on its crested waves as well as the leviathan vessel: so while the Great Keeper of Israel can listen to the archangel's song and the seraph's burning devotions, He can carry in His bosom the feeblest lamb of the fold, and lead gently the most sorrowing spirit. The Psalmist delights to celebrate these two thoughts in conjunction:—God in the vastness of His omnipotence, and God in the condescending tenderness of lowly love to the feeble and fallen. "Thy kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, Thy dominion endureth throughout all generations"—"The Lord upholdeth all that fall, and raiseth up all those that be bowed down:" He telleth the number of the stars: He calleth them all by their names"—"He healeth the broken in heart, and bindeth up their wounds."

—Macduff.

6. His pity for them that fear Him.

(2313.) The least degree of sincere sanctification, being an effect of regeneration, is a certain sign of adoption, and may minister a sure argument to him that has it, that he is the adopted child of God. Now, as parents love their children, not so much for their wit or comeliness, or the like qualities, as because they are theirs, so does God love His children: yea, had He not loved them before they had any good quality in them, for which He might affect them, they had never come to have any such. Parents delight as much in their young ones as in those that be at man's estate, as well in those that are not able to earn the bread that they eat, as in those that are able to do them the best service. Nor is any father so unnatural, that because his child, being weak and sickly, is therefore somewhat wayward, especially being a good-natured and otherwise dutiful child, will for that cause the less either regard or affect it. No, we are wont rather to be the more affectionate towards them when it is so with them. Yea, I say not what infirmity, but what disease, almost, is there so loathsome as will keep a mother from tendering and tending her child? In like manner it is with our heavenly Father whose love goes infinitely beyond the love of any earthly father or mother whatsoever. For as a father, says the Psalmist, is pitiful unto his children, so the Lord is pitiful to those that fear Him. And the most natural mother, the kindest and dearest parent that is, may sooner forget or not regard the fruit of their own body, than He can forget or not regard them. "And I will spare them," says He, "that fear Me, and think on My name, as a man spares his own son that serves him." He loves and delights in His little weak ones, His young babes in Christ, that can scarce almost creep, much less go well alone yet, as well as in His well-grown ones, that are able to help and to tend others. For the Lord's delight is in all those that fear Him, and that rely upon His mercy. He is content to accept at their hands what they are able. As a little done by a son gives his father much better contentment than a great deal more done by a mere stranger or servant. And there is a difference between a son and a servant; that a servant, if he cannot do his master's work, his master will not keep him, he must go, seek him some other service; whereas a son, albeit he be not able to do ought, yet he is not therefore cast off; his father keeps him not for the service he does or can do him, but he keeps him because he is his son. Yea, it is not the wants, and infirmities, and imperfections, or the remainders of sin and corruption in God's children, that can cause God to cast them off or to abhor them. "Our corruptions shall not hurt us, if they do not please us," says Augustine. Nor is it so much our corruptions as our pleasing of ourselves in them, that makes God to be displeased with us. Any beginning of sincere sanctifying grace, then, argues God's child; and a weak child of God being yet a child of God, as well as a strong, has good cause and great cause therein to rejoice.

(2314.) "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him." "Like as a father"—but how is that? You see yonder dusky tents along the stream, and knots of cattle grazing on the neighbouring hills; but the chieftain stays at home. In the cradle lies the babe whom a foster-mother is bringing up, for his own mother died on the day when he was born; and hand in hand with his widowed sire walks a little boy full of love, full of notions bright and strange, asking hard questions, telling dreams; till a sudden change comes across the scene, and in the effort to be a playmate to Rachel's little son, for a moment the patriarch forgets his cares and griefs and, as men would say, his dignity.

How is it that a father pitieth his children? An old king is seated at the city gate. Not far away a battle is going forward—a battle on which hangs the monarch's crown, perhaps his very life. And there is panic through the town, the helpless running to and fro, and the fearful looking forth of those who think they already see their houses in the flames and red slaughter rushing through the streets. But now posting towards the city are seen the little clouds, the dust of separate couriers, and all rush to hear the tidings. "All's well!" exclaims the first; "Victory!" shouts the second; but with fierce impatience, demands the monarch, "Is the young man Absalom safe?" and, transfixed by the fatal truth in his cry of anguish, the cheers of exulta-

Men suddenly subside, and as he staggers up to his solitary chamber, the joyous crowd fall silent, and even the conquerors when they at last return, like the perpetrators of a crime, slink through the gate crestfallen.

How is it that a father pitieth his children? For long there has been only one son at home, and you might suppose there never had been more than one; all is so complete and orderly, and the new-come servants and the neighbours never speak of any other. But along the highroad there is this instant travelling a gaunt and haggard figure, his filthy tattered clothing showing little trace of bygone foppery, and in his looks not much to betoken gentle breeding; so shabby and so reprobate that those who pity common beggars shake the head or slam the door on this one. But though the dogs bark at him and charity turns away from him; though the meanest hut rejects him, and though the passengers scowl at his petitions, one heart awaits him, and keeps for him the original compartment, warm, ample, and unfilled. Yonder, as he has surmounted the summit of the hill and is gazing down on the long forsaken homestead and hesitating whether he may venture nearer, which quick eye is that which has recognised him a great way off, and what eager step is this which runs so fast to meet him? and who is this that in the folds of his kingly mantle hides the ragged wanderer, and clasps him to his bosom, and weeps upon his neck the tears of enraptured affection, and cuts short his confession with a call for the best robe and a command for instant festival? Oh, what a love is this which the heavenly Father hath unto His children! —Hamilton, 1814-1867.

(2315.) Dr. Kane, finding a flower under the Humboldt glacier, was more affected by it because it grew beneath the lip and cold bosom of the ice than he would have been by the most gorgeous garden bloom. So some single struggling grace, in the heart of one far removed from Divine influences, may be dearer to God than a whole catalogue of virtues in the life of one more favoured of heaven.

—Becker.

7. Is not inconsistent with severity.

(2316.) The goodness for which Mr. Kentish pleads is mere undistinguishing beneficence of which we can form no idea without feeling at the same time a diminution of respect. If a supreme magistrate should possess such an attachment to his subjects as that, whatever were their crimes, he could in no case be induced to give any one of them up to condign punishment or to any other punishment than what should be adapted to promote his good, he would presently become an object of general contempt. Or if a father should possess such a fondness for his children that, let any one of them be guilty of what he might, suppose it were a murder, a hundred times repeated, yet he could never consent that any punishment should be inflicted upon him, excepting such as might be productive of his good, such a father would be detested by the community, and despised by his own family.

—Andrew Fuller, 1754-1815.

(2317.) Goodness and severity are elements of a perfect character even among men. Without goodness, the character is stern and inflexible; it repels instead of winning. There may be certain qualities which command our respect in a Draco, who ordains death as the penalty for every trifling violation of the law, or in a Brutus, who, with tearless eye, gives orders in the way of duty for the execution of his sons; but from characters of such untempered austerity, sympathy and affection recoil. On the other hand, without severity goodness degenerates into weakness; into that moral pliancy which, under the name of good-nature, has often made men "consent" easily to the enticement of sinners, and has given them nothing in return but the insipid reputation of having been enemies to none but themselves. In a perfect character, if such existed among men, you would see the counterbalancing powers of goodness and severity held in exact equilibrium. And such, the Word of God assures us, is the character of Him with whom we have to do—"Behold, therefore, the goodness and severity of God."

A very beautiful illustration of this twofold element of the Divine character may be drawn from nature. "God is light," says the Scripture. Philosophers have discovered that light, though apparently so simple a substance, is compounded of seven different rays. It may be said to have two main ingredients: the sombre rays (blue, indigo, violet); the bright rays (orange, red, yellow, green). Both classes of rays are essential to the delicacy and purity of the substance. Without the sombre rays, light would be a glare,—the eyeball would ache beneath it; without the bright rays, light would approximate to the nature of darkness, and lose the gay smile which lights up the face of nature, and twinkles on the sea. Similarly, the holiness, justice, and truth of God (attributes which wear an awful aspect to the sinner), are an element of His nature, as essential to its perfectness as mercy, love, and goodness. Suppose in Him, for a moment, no stern defiance against moral evil, but an allowance and admission of it, and you degrade Jehovah to the level of a pagan deity, honoured with impure rites, and forming His worshippers on the model of His own licentiousness. Suppose in Him, on the other hand, an absence of love, and you supplant the very being of God, you overcloud the light, and convert it into its antagonist darkness; for "God is love." But combine both righteousness and love, intensified to the highest conceivable degree, and you are then possessed of the Scriptural idea of the Most High. "Behold, therefore, the goodness and severity of God."

—Goulburn.

XXIII. HIS LOVE.

1. It preceded ours.

(2318.) Some years ago two gentlemen were riding together, and, as they were about to separate, one addressed the other thus: "Do you ever read your Bible?" "Yes, but I get no benefit from it, because, to tell the truth, I feel I do not love God." "Neither did I," replied the other, "but God loved me." This answer produced such an effect upon his friend, that, to use his own words, it was as if one had lifted him off the saddle into the skies. It opened up to his soul at once the great truth, that it is not how much I love God, but how much God loves me.

2. It was manifested in the gift of Christ.

(2319.) No man has ever manifested such love as this. In a few instances one man has been willing to sacrifice his life for a friend; and not a few fathers and mothers have been willing to endanger their lives for the welfare of a son or daughter. But the instance has never yet occurred where a man was willing to give his own life, or the life of a child, for an enemy. No monarch on the throne has ever thought of giving the heir to his crown to die for a traitor, or a rebellious province; and amidst the multitudes of treason which have occurred, it has never, probably, for one instant, crossed the bosom of the offended sovereign to suppose that such a thing was possible; and if it had occurred it would have been at once dismissed as not worth more than a passing thought. No magistrate has ever lived who would have been willing to sentence his own son to the gallows in place of the guilty wretch whom it was his duty to sentence to death. Not an instance has ever occurred in our own country—rich as it is in examples of benignity and kindness—in which a judge on the bench would have been willing to commute a punishment in this manner, if it had been in strict accordance with equity and law; and probably the records of all nations might be searched in vain for such an instance. We know that monarchs often feel, and that magistrates are not destitute of a tender heart, and that the man on the bench who passes the severe sentence of the law often does it in tears. The present King of France passes every night to a late hour in carefully examining the cases of those who are condemned to death, and in the silence of the night-watches ponders all the reasons why a pardon should be extended in any case, and often with a heavy heart signs the warrant for death; and Washington wept when his duty constrained him to approve the sentence which doomed the accomplished André to the gallows; but would these feelings in either instance, or in any instance, prompt to the surrender of a son—an only son—to the disgrace of the gibbet to save the spy or the traitor? We are saying nothing in disparagement of such men—for they are but men, and not God—when we say that their feelings of compassion have made no approach to such a sacrifice. Their deep emotions, their tears, their genuine sorrow, their unaffected and noble benevolence—though an honour to our nature—have not approached the question whether such a sacrifice was possible or proper; and, we may add, it is not to be approached in this world. The nearest approach of which I have ever heard to anything like this feeling, was in the pathetic wish of David that he had himself been permitted to die in the place of a rebellious and ungrateful son. "O, my son Absalom! my son, my son Absalom, would God I had died for thee. O Absalom, my son, my son!" (2 Kings xviii. 33.) Strong was that love which would lead a monarch and a father to be willing to die for such a son; but how far removed still from the love which would lead to the sacrifice of a son for the guilty and the vile!

—Barnes, 1798-1870.

(2320.) We have no higher conception of the love of a father than that he should give up his son to die. It is the last offering which he could make, and beyond this there is nothing that we can expect. When a man bids his only son to go into the tented field, and expose his life for his country, and with every prospect that he will die for its welfare, it is the highest expression of attachment for that country. Man has no possessions so valuable that he would not give them, all to save the life of his son; and when he yields up his son in any cause, he has shown for it the highest love. It is impossible to conceive of a higher expression of love, if it could be done, than for a man on the bench, whose office required of him to condemn the guilty to death, to be willing to substitute his own son on the gallows, and bid the murderer go free.

—Barnes, 1798-1870.

(2321.) Suppose a man is lying under sentence of death! Shrinking from the gallows-tree, he has sent off a petition for mercy; and waits the answer in anxious suspense. One day his ear catches rapid steps approaching his door—they stop there. The chain is dropped; the bolts are drawn; a messenger enters with his fate—on these lips, death or life. And the answer? Ah, the answer is that the sovereign pities the criminal, but cannot pardon the crime. The blood deserts his cheeks; his hopes dashed to the ground, he wrings his hands, and gives himself up for lost. And now the messenger draws near; and, laying his hand kindly on the poor felon's shoulder, tells him that there is one way by which he may yet be saved—if the king's son would change places with him, put these fetters of his on his own limbs and die in his room, that would satisfy justice, and set him free. Drowning men will catch at straws; not he at that. The king give up his son! the king's son, the prince royal, the heir of the kingdom consent to die for a poor, obscure, guilty wretch like me, if there is no hope but that, there is no hope at all! Now fancy, if you can, his astonishment, sinking to incredulity and then rising into a paroxysm of joy, when the messenger says, "I am the king's son; it is my own wish, and my father's will, that I should die for you; for that purpose am I come, have I left the palace, and sought you in this dreary prison; take you the pardon and give me the fetters. In me shall the crime be punished; in you shall the criminal be saved. Escape! Behold, I set before you an open door!"

Such love never was shown by man. No. But greater love has been shown by God. He gave up His Son to death that we might not die but live.

—Guthrie.

3. Its tenderness.

(2322.) God has a mother's favouritism. A father sometimes shows a sort of favouritism. Here is a boy—strong, well, of high forehead and quick intellect. The father says, "I will take that boy into my firm yet;" or, "I will give him the very best possible education." There are instances where, for the culture of the one boy, all the others have been robbed. A sad favouritism; but that is not the mother's favourite. I will tell you her favourite. There is a child who, at two years of age, had a fall. He has never got over it. The scarlet fever muffled his hearing. He is not what he once was. That child has caused the mother more anxious nights than all the other children. If he coughs in the night, she springs out of a sound sleep and goes to him. The last thing she does when going out of the house, is to give a charge in regard to him. The first thing on coming in is to ask in regard to him. Why, the children of the family all know that he is the favourite, and say: "Mother, you let him do just as he pleases, and you give him a great many things which you do not give us. He is your favourite." The mother smiles; she knows it is so. So he ought to be; for if there is any one in the world who needs sympathy more than another, it is an invalid child, weary on the first mile of life's journey; carrying an aching head, a weak side, an irritated lung. So the mother ought to make him a favourite. God, our Mother, has favourites. "Whom the Lord loveh He chasteneth." That is, one whom He especially loves He chasteneth. God loves us all; but is there one weak, and sick, and sore, and wounded, and suffering, and faint? That is the one who lies nearest and more perpetually on the great, loving heart of God.

4 It embraces all His children.

—Talmage.

(2323.) As the sun shining upon one place of the earth enlightens it no less than if it shined on no other, so in the very same manner is our Lord solicitous for all His dear children.

—Francis de Sales.

5 It is unchangeable.

(2324.) The sincerity of God's affection to His people appears in the unmovableness of His love. As there is no shadow of turning in the being of God, so not in the love of God to His people; there is no vertical point; His love stands still like the sun in Gibeon, it goes not down nor declines, but continues in its full strength. "With everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee, saith the Lord, thy Redeemer." Sorry man repents of his love; the hottest affection cools in his bosom; love in the creature is like fire on the hearth, now blazing, anon blinking and going out; but in God, like fire in the element, that never fails. In the creature 'tis like water in a river that falls and rises; but in God, like water in the sea, that is always full.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

6 It should lead us always to trust Him.

(2325.) One great object of revelation was to show us God as our Father. It is thus the Son reveals Him when He says that no man knoweth the Father save the Son, and he to whom the Son revealeth Him. And there are many passages of Scripture that point us to this delightful revelation—such as, "As a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him;" "I will be to him a father, and he shall be to Me a son." "The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord, and He delighteth in his way." You have, doubtless, seen a kind and tender parent taking the little child by the hand when just beginning to walk, turning the steps aside when obstacles are in the way, directing the child where to walk, and bending over the little one with fond delight. I have seen young parents laughing with joy when they have observed the first steps which the little ones take—they delighted in their way. And so God is represented as bending from above over us, and ordering the steps of a good man, watching his pathway, holding him by the hand, leading him in the way he should go, and delighting in his way. And never was a tender and loving parent so delighted in marking the footsteps of a child, as God in watching the ways of a good man—delighted at all his efforts in the paths of piety and peace.

Such declarations present the doctrine of the watch-care of God over them that fear Him; or, as it is sometimes called, the doctrine of a special providence. This doctrine teaches us that God is especially watchful over those who love Him; and that, where men fear and serve Him, He has special care toward them—watches their pathway and directs their movements.

—Simpson.

(2326.) Walking down W—Street one morning, I saw a little blind boy standing on the side-walk, with his head bent forward as if eagerly listening. Stepping up to him, I said: "Shall I help you across the street, my little friend?"

"Oh! no, thank you; I am waiting for my father."

"Can you trust your father?"

"Oh! yes; my father always takes good care of me, leads me all the time, and when he has my hand I feel perfectly safe."

"But why do you feel safe?"

Raising his sightless eyes, with a sweet smile and look of perfect trust, he replied: "Oh! because my father knows the way. He can see, but I am blind."

This little blind boy preached a sermon to me. Do we, with our hand in our Father's, feel perfectly safe? We are poor blind children, yet do we not often rebel against the way the Father would lead us, and seek to go another way which seems best to us? Because we feel the thorns sometimes, and are pierced by their sharpness, we try some other path, which seems to our blinded eyes to lead to peace and rest. But the Father can see, and shall we shrink from the path He has marked out in wisdom and love—that path which, though it be one of trial and suffering, will best fit us for heaven?

(2327.) "Well, now," said Dick Harly thoughtfully, "it's mighty odd to me, that if what you say is true, and that God loves people so much as to send His own Son to die in their stead, and to make them His children, why is it that some of them very children, yourself for instance, are struggling on with a large family, and only a pound a week to live on; why, if I had a power of money, I don't think I'd like to see my children want for anything."

"But if they want what you knew was bad for them, then," said Frank Foster, "I take it you would not give it to them."

"No," answered Dick, "I suppose I would not."

"Not even if they could not see the harm of it? If they took a fancy to have some arsenic, for instance, thinking it would be as nice as white sugar, I think the more you loved them the less you'd give it to them? Now, to show you that God sometimes takes away what we like, and gives us what we don't like, let me tell you a story of our little Mary."

"Last winter she was very bad with what the doctor called a gastric attack hanging over her for months; sometimes she'd be better, and sometimes she'd be worse; and though her appetite went to nothing, the doctor said it was better for her not to eat anything, than to eat what was bad for her; so that we were not to give her so much as a taste of anything sweet, no matter how much she might wish for it."

"Well, Christmas-eve came, and with it the Christmas cake frosted all over as if the snow had fallen on it and hardened. And when we had all sat down to tea, Jemmy said, 'Now, father, please help Mary first, and let her have the biggest bit of all because she is sick.' So I cut a fine large slice, and the poor little thing's eyes brightened as she saw me get up and take it over and sit down beside her. 'O father,' she said, 'that's a splendid piece; is it all for me?' 'Every bit of it, darling,' I answered; and then with a heavy heart, for I knew the trial it would be to her, I added, 'I think you trust my love for you, Mary?'

"Why, father, sure I know you love me; and now haven't you given me this beautiful piece of cake?"

"But would you trust me as much if I told you that although I gave you the cake, and that it was really your very own, yet that you were not to eat it until you were quite well?"

"She laughed merrily at the idea, thinking I was joking, but in a moment seeing how grave I looked, she threw her arms round my neck and hid her face on my shoulder. 'Can't you trust my love, Mary darling,' I said again, 'even if I tell you not to eat your cake now? It's all your very own, and please God you'll soon be well, and then you shall eat it; but the doctor says that if you eat it now it would make you very sick; don't you think I would rather have you eat it than eat it myself fifty times over?'

"At that she looked up, and kissed me over again: 'I know you would,' she said, 'I do trust you, father,' and she tried bravely to keep back the tears. 'Don't mind,' she said, seeing how sad I looked, and that some of the other children were crying, and all of them saying they wouldn't have any cake unless Mary had some too. 'No, no,' she added, 'indeed I don't mind now; I know father is right, he always is.'

"Mary's smile was as bright as ever again, and her voice as merry; and I am sure she trusted me so much, that after the first moment of disappointment she did not even wish to eat her bit of cake."

"And," continued Frank, "that's just it; it does come natural to a father to like to see his children happy, and to give them nice things. The hard thing was—and I believe only a father could tell how hard it was—to refuse my sick child what she wished for; and if this is true of an earthly father, oh, how much more it must be true of our Father in heaven! With one word He could make me a rich man to-morrow, and He'd like to do it too; only He sees that riches would not be good for me, just as He sees that health would not be good for another; and so He keeps riches from me and health from him. But surely if my little Mary trusted me, I may well trust Him who so loved me as to send His only and well-beloved Son to die for me."—A fragment of a conversation between two working-men.

XXIV. HIS MERCY.

1. He delights in mercy.

(2328.) Joy is the highest testimony that can be given to our complacency in anything or person; love to joy is as fuel to the fire; if love lay little fuel of desires on the heart, then the flame of joy that comes thence will not be great. Now God's joy is great in pardoning poor sinners that come in; therefore His affection is great in the offer thereof. It is made the very motive that prevails with God to pardon sinners. "Because He delighteth in mercy." Who is a God like unto Thee, that pardoneth iniquity, and passeth by the transgression of the remnant of His heritage? He retaineth not His anger for ever, for He delighteth in mercy. Ask why the fisher stands all night with his angle in the river; he will tell you, because he delights in the sport. Well, you now know the reason why God stands so long waiting on sinners, months, years, preaching to them; it is that He may be gracious in pardoning them, and in that act delight Himself. Princes very often pardon traitors to please others more than themselves, or else it would never be done; but God doth it chiefly to delight and glad His own merciful heart. Hence the business Christ came about (which was no other but to reconcile sinners to God) is called "the pleasure of the Lord" (Isa. liii. 10). —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

2. Is needed by all.

(2329.) The most holy men, although like the ark they keep both the first and second table of the law of God, and have in their hearts with the manna of His grace the rod of His fear, have always need to be covered with the mercy-seat; and their most holy and devout aspirations have always something faulty in them, as the strong scent of the galbanum was mingled with all the perfumes of the law.

—Fauschew.

(2330.) Though we have sinned less than others, we cannot be saved by merit; even as, thank God, though we have sinned more than others, we may be saved by mercy. How idle to talk of other men being greater sinners than we are—to flatter and deceive ourselves with that! He drowns as surely who has his head beneath one inch of water, as he who, with a millstone hung round his neck, has sunk a hundred fathoms down. Let the strain of the tempest come, and the ship that has one bad link in her cable, as certainly goes ashore to be dashed to pieces on the rocks, as another that has twenty bad. It is, no doubt, by repeated strokes of the woodman's axe that the oak, bending slowly to fate, bows its proud head and falls to the ground, and it is by long dropping that water hollows the hardest stone. But those who speak of great and little, of few or many sins, seem to forget that man's ruin was the work of one moment, and of one sin. The weight of only one sin sank this great world into perdition; and now all of us, all men, lie under the same sentence of condemnation. Extinguishing every hope of salvation through works, and sounding as ominous of evil in men's ears, as the cracking of ice beneath our feet, or the roar of an avalanche, or the grating of a keel on the sunken reef, or the hammer that wakens the felon from dreams of life and liberty, that sentence is this—"Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things written in the book of the law to do them."

Such is our position; and instead of shutting our eyes to it, like the foolish ostrich that hides her head in the bush when the hunters are at her heels, it is well to know, and to face it. —Guthrie.

3. Is offered to all.

(2331.) There are many who, being conscious of wickedness and not being Christians, do not see why they should ask Divine succour. There are many who are conscious of being bound by evil, and they fain would break away from it. If only they were Christians, and in the Church, God would help them; but they are sinners, and out of the Church, and they dare not go to God. Many a man would fain break away from the cup, but he knows that his own strength is insufficient; and as he is not a Christian, as he has made his investments in evil, he does not feel that he has a right to draw upon the bank of Divine mercy. He keeps no account there, and he has no reason to think that his check will be honoured there if he presents it.

Now, there is not a human being in or out of the Church who is not an object of Divine compassion and divine love. God may have the love of complacency when His Spirit shall have drawn you more and more into the lines and lineaments of His own blessed beauty; but God is love, and He will not wait for your turning before He loves you. God so loved the world that He gave His Son to die for it, and to die for it while yet it was in sin—yea, and at enmity to Him. God's love precedes all reformation. And there is no man—not a drunkard, not a gambler, not a thief, not a person that is filled full of passions and appetites—who has not a right, to-day, now, here, in his heart, to look up and say, "God help me!" Your sinfulness is not a reason why you should keep away from God. It is the very reason why you should go to Him. He is to your soul what the physician is to your body. When your body is racked with pains, or is swollen with disease, you go to the physician that he may heal you. And so, the consciousness of your sin, and of the hatredness of it, is the very reason why you should go to God.

—Becher.

4. Exceeds our sin.

(2332.) Our faults are like a grain of sand beside the great mountain of the mercies of God.

—Vianney.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(2334.) Oh, who can read a Manasseh, a Magdalen, a Saul; yea, an Adam (who undid himself, and a whole world with him), in the roll of pardoned sinners, and yet turn away from the promise, out of a fear that there is not mercy enough in it to serve his turn? These are as land-marks, that show what large boundaries mercy hath set to itself, and how far it hath gone, even to take into its pardoning arms the greatest sinners, that make not themselves incapable thereof by final impenitency. It were a healthful walk, poor doubting Christian, for thy soul, to go this circuit, and oft to see where the utmost stone is laid, and boundary set by God's pardoning mercy, further than which He will not go.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2335.) Impossible it is, that He should reject any poor penitent sinner, merely for the greatness of the sins he hath committed. It is the exaltation of His mercy (saith faith) that God hath in His eye when He promiseth pardon to poor sinners. Now, which exalts this most, to pardon little or great sinners? whose voice will be highest and shrillest in the song of praise, thinkest thou? surely his, to whom most is forgiven; and therefore God cannot but be most ready to pardon the greatest sinners when truly penitent. A physician that means to be famous, will not send away those that most need his skill and art; and only practise upon such diseases as are slight and ordinary. They are the great cures, which ring far and near: when once given over by himself and others, as a dead man, is by the skill and care of a physician rescued out of the jaws of death, that seemed to have enclosed him, and raised to health. This commends him to all that hear of it, and gains him more reputation than a whole year's practice in ordinary cures.

(2336.) Why dost thou not believe in God's mercy? Is it thy sins discourage? God's mercy can pardon great sins, nay, because they are great (Ps. xxv. 11). The sea covers great rocks as well as lesser sands.

—Watson, 1696.

(2337.) You cannot believe too much in God's mercy. You cannot expect too much at His hands. He is "able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think." No sin is so great but that, coming straight from it, a repentant sinner may hope and believe that all God's love will be lavished upon him, and the richest of God's gifts granted to his desires. Even if our transgression be aggravated by a previous life of godliness, and have given the enemies great occasion to blaspheme, as David did, yet David's penitence may in our souls lead on to David's hope, and the answer will not fail us. Let no sin, however dark, however repeated, drive us to despair of ourselves, because it hides from us our loving Saviour. Though beaten back again and again by the surge of our passions and sins, like some poor shipwrecked sailor sucked back with every retreating wave and tossed about in the angry surf, yet keep your face towards the beach where there is safety, and you will struggle through it all, and, though it were but on some floating boards and broken pieces of the ship, will come safe to land. He will uphold you with His Spirit, and take away the weight of sin that would sink you, by His forgiving mercy, and bring you out of all the weltering waste of waters to the solid shore.

—Maclaren.

5. Is accorded instantly.

(2338.) It is harder to get sin felt by the creature, than the burden, when felt, removed, by the hand of a forgiving God. Never was tender-hearted surgeon more willing to take up the vein, and bind up the wound of his fainting patient when he hath bled enough, than God is by His pardoning mercy to ease the troubled spirit of a mourning penitent.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2339.) God will pardon a repentant sinner more quickly than a mother would snatch her child out of the fire.

—Vianney.

6. How wonderfully we are urged to seek it.

(2340.) If a judge of an assize should say to a felon, or some malefactor in the gaol, "Confess but your faults and become an honest man, I will pardon you; and not only so, but you shall be made a justice of peace, or some great man, whereby you shall have power to judge and examine others!" surely, he would, upon this promise, be moved quickly to confess the felony and forego his theft. Thus it is that the Judge of all the world makes great tenders of mercy, that if a sinner will truly and from his heart confess his sins, and resolve to leave them, he shall have pardon; and not only so, but he shall be made a king and priest unto God the Father, an heir of God, and joint-heir with Christ Jesus.

7. It is inexhaustible.

(2341.) There is as great an ability in God, when we are in need of new mercies, as there was when He gave former ones; nay, as much as there was from eternity. He is not a God whose arm is shortened, that is not what He was, or shall ever cease to be what He is: "Is My hand shortened at all that I cannot redeem, or have I no power to deliver?" He is always, "I am that I am." There is no diminution of light in the sun no more that there was at the first moment of its creation, and the last man upon earth shall enjoy as much of it as we do now. No more does the Father of lights lose by imparting it to others. Thus we light many candles at a torch, yet it burns never the dimmer. Standing waters may be drawn dry, but a fountain cannot. God is a spring, this day and to-morrow, Jehovah unchangeable. The God of Isaac is not like Isaac, that had one blessing and no more; He has as much now as He had the first moment that mercy streamed from Him to His creature, and the same for as many as shall believe in Christ to the end of the world; nay, the more we receive from God in a way of faith, the more God has for us. A believer's harvest for present mercies is his seed-time for more. The more mercies he reaps, the more hopes of future mercy he has. God's mercies, when full-blown, seed again and come up thicker. Can the creature want more than the Everlasting Fountain can supply? Can the creature's indigency be greater than God's sufficiency? What an irrational way of arguing was that: "He smote the rock that the waters gushed out; can He give bread also? can He provide for His people?" as if He that filled their cup could not spread their table, as if He that had a hidden cellar for their drink had not a secret and as full a cupboard for their meat. Do we want mercies for soul and body? Look to the Rock whence former mercies were hewn! the same fulness can supply again.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(2342.) A benevolent person gave Mr. Rowland Hill a hundred pounds to dispense to a poor minister, and thinking it was too much to send him all at once, Mr. Hill forwarded five pounds in a letter, with simply these words within the envelope, "More to follow." In a few days' time, the good man received another letter by the post—and letters by the post were rarities in those days; this second messenger contained another five pounds, with the same motto, "And more to follow." A day or two after came a third and a fourth, and still the same promise, "And more to follow." Till the whole sum had been received the astonished minister was made familiar with the cheering words, "And more to follow."

Every blessing that comes from God is sent with the selfsame message, "And more to follow." "I forgive you your sins, but there's more to follow." "I justify you in the righteousness of Christ, but there's more to follow." "I adopt you into My family, but there's more to follow." "I educate you for heaven, but there's more to follow." "I give you grace upon grace, but there's more to follow." "I have helped you even to old age, but there's still more to follow." "I will uphold you in the hour of death, and as you are passing into the world of spirits My mercy shall still continue with you, and when you land in the world to come there shall still be MORE TO FOLLOW." —Spurgeon.

(2343.) It is by no means pleasant when reading an interesting article in your magazine to find yourself pulled up short with the ominous words, "to be continued." Yet they are words of good cheer if applied to other matters. What a comfort to remember that the Lord's mercy and loving-kindness is to be continued! Much as we have experienced in the long years of our pilgrimage, we have by no means outlived eternal love. Providential goodness is an endless chain, a stream which follows the pilgrim, a wheel perpetually revolving, a star for ever shining, and leading us to the place where He is who was once a babe in Bethlehem. All the volumes which record the doings of Divine grace are but part of a series to be continued. —Spurgeon.

(2344.) I know of a father who, after his son came back the fourth time, said, "No! I forgave you three times, but I will never forgive you again." And the son went off and died. But God takes back His children the thousandth time as cheerfully as the first. As easily as with my handkerchief I strike the dust off this book, God will wipe out all our sins.

Oh this mercy of God! I am told it is an ocean. Then I place on it four swift-sailing craft, with compass, and charts, and choice rigging, and skilful navigators, and I tell them to launch away, and discover for me the extent of this ocean. That craft puts out in one direction, and sails to the north; this to the south; this to the east; this to the west. They crowd on all their canvas, and sail ten thousand years, and one day come up the harbour of heaven; and I shout to them from the beach, "Have you found the shore?" and they answer, "No shore to God's mercy." Swift angels, despatched from the throne, attempt to go across it. For a million years they fly and fly; but then come back and fold their wings at the foot of the throne, and cry, "No shore! no shore to God's mercy!" —Talmage.

(2345.) And now we beseech of Thee that we may have every day some such sense of the fullness of God's mercy and of the power of God around about us, as we have of the fullness of the light of heaven before us. Our tapers we trim, and we fear lest the lamp shall go out without oil; but none of us have ever had a thought or a care lest the sun should be emptied, or lest the air should be exhausted. The supply is over-abundant, and the waste is infinitely more than that which we use.

—Becker.

8. Must be personally sought.

(2346.) As a man is saved by catching hold of a cable; God's mercy is a great cable let down from heaven to us; now, taking fast hold of this cable by faith, we are saved.

—Watson, 1696.

(2347.) If God show mercy to thousands, labour to know that this mercy is for you. "He is the God of my mercy" (Ps. lix. 17). A man that was ready to drown, saw a rainbow; saith he, "What am I the better, though God will not drown the world, if I drown?" So, what are we the better God is merciful, if we perish? let us labour to know God's special mercy is for us.

—Watson, 1696.

9. Is limited to this life.

(2348.) Let us take heed, for mercy is like a rainbow, which God set in the clouds to remember mankind: it shines here as long as it is not hindered; but we must never look for it after it is night, and it shines not in the other world. If we refuse mercy here, we shall have justice there.

10. Is not to be abused.

(2349.) Take heed of abusing this mercy of God. Suck not poison out of the sweet flower of God's mercy: do not think, that because God is merciful, you may go on in sin; this is to make mercy become your enemy. None might touch the ark but the priests, who by their office were more holy; none may touch this ark of God's mercy but such as are resolved to be holy. To sin because mercy abounds, is the devil's logic. He that sins because of mercy, is like one that wounds his head because he hath a plaister; he that sins because of God's mercy, shall have judgment without mercy. Mercy abused turns to fury. "If he bless himself, saying, I shall have peace though I walk after the imaginations of my heart, to add drunkenness to thirst, the Lord will not spare him, but the anger of the Lord and His jealousy shall smoke against that man." Nothing sweeter than mercy when it is improved; nothing fiercer, when it is abused; nothing colder than lead, when it is taken out of the mine; nothing more scalding than lead, when it is heated; nothing blunter than iron; nothing sharper, when it is whetted. "The mercy of the Lord is upon them that fear him." Mercy is not for them that sin and fear not, but for them that fear and sin not. God's mercy is an holy mercy; where it pardons, it heals.

—Watson, 1696.

(2350.) Would we not cry, Shame of him, who had a friend always feeding him with money, and he should betray and injure that friend. Thus ungratefully do sinners deal with God, they do not only forget His mercies, but abuse them. "When I had fed them to the full, they then committed adultery." Oh how horrid is this, to sin against a bountiful God! to strike (as it were) those hands that relieve us! This gives a dye and tincture to men's sins, and makes them crimson. How many make a dart of God's mercies, and shoot at Him? He gives them wit, and they serve the devil with it; He gives them strength, and they waste it among harlots; He gives them bread to eat, and they lift up the heel against Him. "Jeshurun waxed fat, and kicked." These are like Absalom, who, as soon as David his father kissed him, plotted treason against him (2 Sam. xv. 10). Like the mule, who kicks the dam after she hath given it milk. Those who sin against their giver, and abuse God's royal favours, the mercies of God will come in as witnesses against them. What smoother than oil? But if it be heated, what more scalding? What sweeter than mercy? But if it be abused, what more dreadful? It turns to fury.

—Watson, 1696.

XXV. HIS GRACE.

1. Is ever needful.

(2351.) All our power for sacred performances is wholly from another; "Not that we are sufficient of ourselves to think anything." To think, we suppose, is an easy thing; but unless God help, it is too hard for us. God gave Israel their manna every day, or they could not have subsisted. God must give us fresh supplies of His Spirit in every duty, or they cannot be rightly performed. The greatest fullness of a Christian is not the fullness of a fountain, but of a vessel, which, because always is letting out, must be always taking in. The conduit, which is continually running, must be always receiving from the river. The Christian's disbursements are great and constant; therefore such must his incomes from God be, or he will quickly prove a bankrupt.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(2352.) Our preservation from evil and perseverance in good is a most free unmerited favour, the effect of God's renewed grace in the course of our lives. Without His special assistance, we should every hour forsake Him, and provoke Him to forsake us. As the iron cannot ascend or hang in the air longer than the virtue of the loadstone draws it, so our affections cannot ascend to those glorious things that are above without the continually attracting power of grace.

—Bates, 1625-1699.

(2353.) Alas, O Lord, what am I when left to myself but a dry parched ground, which, being rent on every side, witnesses its thirst for rain from heaven, but which in the meantime is dispersed by the wind and reduced to dust.

—Francis de Sales.

(2354.) As the earth can produce nothing unless it is fertilised by the sun, so we can do nothing without the grace of God.

—Vianney.

(2355.) It (grace) is God taking the sinner by the hand, and wishing to teach him to walk. We are like little children, we do not know how to walk on the road to heaven; we stagger, we fall, unless the hand of God is always ready to support us.

The grace of God helps us to walk, and supports us. He is as necessary to us as crutches are to a lame man.

—Vianney.

(2356.) Let the lily be exposed to the scorching sun, and deprived of the refreshing dew, and its leaves will droop and die. Just so the Christian: let him be exposed to the scorching heat of indwelling corruption, the world's cares, and Satan's wiles, without the dew of God's grace, he will not advance in holiness of heart and life. But when that descends, his leaves stand erect, and, like the lily, his growth is rapid. Integrity strengthens, benevolence expands, holiness opens in all its lily-like loveliness, and in due time the plant is removed to the paradise of God, there to bloom in unfading beauty.

—Jackson.

(2357.) The acts of breathing which I performed yesterday will not keep me alive to-day; I must continue to breathe afresh every moment, or animal life ceases. In like manner, yesterday's grace and spiritual strength must be renewed, and the Holy Spirit must continue to breathe on my soul, from moment to moment, in order to my enjoying the consolations, and to my working the works of God.

—Toplady, 1740-1778.

(2358.) What man can re-create himself? I go, in January, into my garden. This plum tree has ceased growing. So has that pea tree—and so have all these other trees. And my flowers, to all appearance, are dead. And I propose a resurrection. It may be that by building a shelter around one single plant or tree, I can thaw out the soil, and by artificial heat wake up the dormant bud, and bring spring into it. But what man can enclose his whole garden, and bring summer into that in the middle of winter?

And if a man can't do this with his garden, who can do it with his whole farm? It is a task that defies all human power. Not till God calls the sun, and it comes hastening back, full of vivific powers, and fruitful influences—not till then does the soil heave, and the root swell, and the leaf shoot forth, and the bud protrude, and the blossom exhale, and all things show that more than a man, with his artificial appliances, is at work.

Now, with regard to a man's character, it is true that, so far as any special disposition is concerned, the power of the will to do right or wrong is undoubted. You can correct a single habit; but the great outlying domain of the soul, with its multitudinous habits, formed and forming—what man can look upon this and say, "By the power of my own volition, I will bring up good where there is evil; love shall rule where selfishness reigns?" There is not one single moment when a man does not run away from himself; when his disposition does not break loose from his will. It is not till some influence from God is shed down upon a man, vivifying him as summer vivifies the soil, that he feels, "I have hope." Therefore it is said, "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling," as a man must that works in such a crater as the human heart; "for it is God which worketh in you."

—Becher.

2. Ever available.

(2359.) When a child has been away all day long, playing truant, and the afternoon comes, and with it hunger and the necessity of shelter, he must go home; and he goes towards his father's house, thinking to himself what plausible lie to tell—how he can make tattered truth seem like an unrent garment. And so, with an ill-feigned appearance of innocence, and perhaps with a forced smile on his face, he enters the door, trying to look as if he were not a guilty child. He runs with alacrity to perform every errand imposed upon him. His conduct, however, is suspicious; for he is too good for an innocent child. He thinks nothing is known of his disobedience. But while he sits with the family at tea, the burden on his mind grows heavier and heavier; and he says to himself, "They are very kind to me, and if I thought that they knew it all, and they were so kind, how happy I should be!" He expects that they will find it out, and that then there will be a time of it. Now his father and mother are pleasant toward him, but he thinks that by and by it will come out, and that then will follow chastisement and trouble. And that great undiscovered guilt in the soul, that account yet to be settled, takes away all the joys of his home, and makes the evening a torment. But if, when he came in, his mother had stolen behind him, and said to him in a gentle tone, "We know it all, my child; we are sorry; but we shall say nothing about it; we shall let it pass," the child, as soon as he found that it was all known and forgiven, and that he was the recipient of so much love, not because they did not know it, but because knowing it they saw sufficient reasons why it should be passed by, and not laid to his account, how sweet to him would have been his father's and mother's kindness! It would have brought tears to his eyes as it had never done before. And when he went to his couch at night, how sweet would their unscolding forgiveness have been to him! It would have been all the sweeter because all the time they knew his guilt.

Now, the apostle says, "With your guilt, with your trouble, go before God." He knows all. What nobody else knows, He knows. He knows what even the wife of your bosom does not know. He knows what has never been divulged to any living soul. Wicked thoughts and intentions in connection with your business, which perhaps no man knows except yourself, He knows. And when you feel an impulse to go before God, do not say, "I would go; but that crime." He knew of that crime before He invited you to go to Him. Do not say, "I would go; but that unwashed lust." He has known that lust from the beginning. "All things are naked and opened unto the eyes of Him with whom we have to do." "Let us, therefore," says the apostle, "come boldly to the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help." Grace to help—that is it: grace to help you out of your sin. Let no one, then, who has a sense of his sinfulness, who is truly repentant, and who is striving to do better, hesitate to go to God, saying, "Have mercy upon me, and help me."

—Becher.

(2360.) The truth of the bountifulness and largeness of God's grace and goodness is true for everybody, provided everybody will put himself in a relation to take it. The reason why the sun produces in one place geraniums, camellias, azaleas, all forms of exquisite flower, and does not produce them in another place, is not in the sun. The cause of the difference is in the use to which you put the sun. It shines on the south side of my barn, and what does it produce there? A warm spot, where chickens and cows gather. It shines on the south side of my neighbour's barn, and what does it produce there? Flowers and grapes. What is the reason of the difference? Does the sun change? No, but it is put to different uses. It is just the same sun, with just the same vivific power to all; but its effects are different when it is differently employed. In one man's hands it amounts to nothing, because he does not make any use of it; but in another man's hands it amounts to a great deal, because he does make use of it, and makes it do a great deal for him. The nature of God is the same to all men, but the effects are not the same on all men; because they do not all put it to the same uses.

—H. W. Becher.

3. Unmerited.

(2361.) The way to heaven lies, not over a toll-bridge, but over a free-bridge; even the unmerited grace of God in Christ Jesus.

Grace finds us beggars, and always leaves us debtors.

—Toplady, 1740-1778.

(2362.) We are apt to suppose that God is such an one as ourselves. If we wish to enjoy the patronage of a great man, we very naturally think we must say or do something that may acquire his esteem, and recommend us to his notice. Thus would we also treat with God; when, alas! the plain truth is, we can have, and say, and do, nothing that He approves, until He Himself give it of His free grace, and work it in us by His Spirit.

—Salter.

4. All-sufficient.

(2363.) The heart of every believer is like a vessel with a narrow neck, which, being cast into the sea, is not filled at the first easily, but by reason of the strait passage receives water drop by drop. Thus God giveth unto us even a sea of mercy, but the same on our part is apprehended and received by little and little : we go from strength to strength, from grace to grace, and from one degree of virtue to another.

—Boys, 1560-1643.

(2364.) Go and ransack thy heart, Christian, from one end to the other, find out thy wants, acquaint thyself with all thy weaknesses, and set them before the Almighty, as the widow her empty vessels before the prophet; hadst thou more than thou canst bring thou mayst have them all filled.
—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2365.) The Gospel supposeth a power going along with it, and that the Holy Spirit of God works upon the minds of men, to quicken, and excite, and assist them in their duty. And if it were not so, the exhortations of preachers would be nothing else but a cruel and bitter mocking of sinners, and an ironical insulting over the misery and weakness of poor creatures; and for ministers to preach, or people to hear sermons, upon other terms, would be the vainest expense of time, and the idlest thing we do all the week; and all our dissuaves from sin, and exhortations to holiness and a good life, and vehement persuasions of men to strive to get to heaven and to escape hell, would be just as if one should urge a blind man, by many reasons and arguments, taken from the advantages of sight and the comfort of that sense and the beauty of external objects, by all means to open his eyes, and to behold the delights of nature, to see his way and to look to his steps, and should upbraid him, and be very angry with him, for not doing so.
—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(2366.) There is in God not only a sufficiency, but a redundancy; He is not only full as a vessel, but as a spring. Other things can no more fill the soul, than a mariner's breath can fill the sails of a ship: but in God is a cornucopia, an infinite fulness; He hath enough to fill the angels, therefore enough to fill us.
—Watson, 1696.

(2367.) God is a sun, which, though but one, is sufficient to enlighten and vivify a whole world.
—Michel le Faucheur.

(2368.) The moral impotence in men to vanquish their lusts, though it will be no apology at the day of judgment, will discourage them from making resistance: for who will attempt an impossibility? Despair relaxes the active powers, cuts the nerves of our endeavours, and blunts the edge of industry. 'Tis related of the West Indians, that upon the first incursion of the Spaniards into their country, they tamely yielded to their tyranny; for seeing them clad in armour which their spears could not pierce, they fancied them to be the children of the sun, invulnerable and immortal. But an Indian carrying a Spaniard over the water, resolved to try whether he were mortal, and plunged him into the river so long that he was drowned. From that experiment they took courage, and resolved to kill their enemies, who were capable of dying, and recover their dear liberty, lost by such a foolish conceit. Thus men will languish in a worse servitude if they fancy the lusts of the flesh, their intimate enemies, to be inseparable. Fear congeals the spirits, and disables from noble enterprises, which hope persuades, and courage executes. Now we have an army of conquerors to encourage us in the spiritual war with the flesh, the world, and Satan, enemies in combination against us. How many saints have preserved themselves unpotted from the most alluring temptations! They were not statues, without sensible faculties, they were not without a conflict of carnal passions, but by the Holy Spirit subdued them; and though some obtained a clearer victory than others, yet all were victorious by divine grace

—Salter.

(2369.) It is equally easy for God to supply our greatest as our smallest wants, to carry our heaviest as our lightest burden—just as it is as easy for the great ocean to bear on her bosom a ship of war with all its guns and crew aboard, as a fisherman's boat, or the tiniest craft that floats, falling and rising on her swell.
—Guthrie.

(2370.) The grace of God is marked by the affluence which characterises all His works. What abundance in that sun which has shown so many thousand years, and yet presents no appearance of exhaustion, no sign of decay! What abundance of stars bespangle the sky; of leaves clothe the forest; of raindrops fall in the shower; of dews sparkle on the grass; of snow-flakes within the winter hills; of flowers adorn the meadow; of living creatures that, walking on the ground, or playing in the waters, or burrowing in the soil, or dancing in the sunbeams, or flying in the air, find a home in every element—but that red fire in which, type of hell, all beauty perishes and all life expires!

This lavish profusion of life, and forms, and beauty, in nature, is an emblem of the affluence of grace, of God's saving, sanctifying grace. In Christ all fulness dwells. We are complete in Him. There is in His blood sufficient virtue to discharge all the sins of a guilty world, and in His Spirit sufficient power to cleanse the foulest and break the hardest heart. Ye are not straitened in me, says God, but in yourselves. Try me herewith, He says—ask, seek, knock! Who does will find that it is only a faint image of the plentitude of grace we behold in that palace-scene where the king, looking kindly on a lovely suppliant, bends from his throne to extend his golden sceptre, and says, "What is thy petition, and what is thy request, Queen Esther, and it shall be given thee to the half of my kingdom?"
—Guthrie.

(2371.) Men do not avail themselves of the riches of God's grace. They love to nurse their cares, and seem as uneasy without some fret, as an old friar would be without his hair girdle. They are commanded to cast their cares upon the Lord; but, even when they attempt it, they do not fail to catch them up again, and think it meritorious to walk burdened. They take God's ticket to heaven, and then put their baggage on their shoulders, and tramp, tramp, the whole way there afoot.
—Becher.

(2372.) A man says to his agent, "I want you to go on a business tour for me. First go to Buffalo. Here is the money, and here are the directions that you will need while there. Thence go to Cleveland, and there you will find remittances and further directions. When you get to Cincinnati you will find other remittances and other directions. At St. Louis you will find others; and at New Orleans still others." "But," says the agent, "suppose when I get to Cleveland, or any of the other places, I should not find anything?" He is so afraid that he will not, that he asks the man to give him money and directions for the whole tour before he starts. "No," says the man, "it will be sufficient if you have the money and directions you need for each place when you get to it: and when you do get to it you will find them there."

Now God sends us in the same way. He says, "Here is your duty for to-day, and the means with which to do it. To-morrow you will find remittances and further directions; next week you will find other remittances and other directions; next month you will find others; and next year still others. I will be with you at all times, and will see that you have strength for every emergency."

—Becher.

(2373.) Suppose I were to set out on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and before I started, were to go to Brown Brothers & Co., and obtain letters of credit for the cities of London, Jericho, &c. Then, with these papers, which a child might destroy, which would be but ashes in the teeth of flame, which a thousand chances might take from me, I should go on with confidence and cheer, saying to myself, "As soon as I come to London I shall be in funds. I have a letter in my pocket from Brown Brothers & Co. which will give me five hundred dollars there; and in the other cities to which I am bound I shall find similar supplies, all at my command, through the agency of these magic papers and pen strokes of these enterprising men." But suppose that, instead of this confidence, I were to sit down on shipboard, and go to tormenting myself in this fashion—"Now, what am I to do when I get to London? I have no money, and how do I know that these bits of paper which I have with me mean anything, or will amount to anything? What shall I do? I am afraid I shall starve in the strange city to which I am going." I should be a fool, you say; but should I be half the fool that that man is, who, bearing the letters of credit of the Eternal God, yet goes fearing all his way, cast down and doubting whether he shall ever get safe through his journey? No fire, no violence, nor any chance, can destroy the cheques of the Lord. When He says, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee," and "My grace shall be sufficient for thee," believe it; and no longer dishonour your God by withholding from Him the confidence which you freely accord to Brown Brothers & Co.

—Becher.

(2374.) Many people are afraid to embrace religion, for fear they shall not succeed in maintaining it.

Does the spring say, "I will not come unless I can bring all fruits and sheaves under my wings?" No. She casts down loving glances in February, and in March she ventures near in mild days, but is beaten back and overthrown by storm and wind. Yet she returns, and finally yields the earth to April, far readier for life than she found it. The rains are still cold, but the grass is growing green, and the buds are swelling. In May the air is yet chilly, but it has the odour of flowers, and every day grows warmer till the delicious June, when all is bloom and softness, and even the storms have nourishment in them. Then come the glowing July and the fervid August, followed by the glorious autumn of harvest and victory!

And shall nature do so much, while we dare not attempt to overcome the coldness and deadness of our hearts, and to fill them with the summer of love?

When stars, first created, start forth upon their vast circuits, not knowing their way, if they were conscious and sentient, they might feel hopeless of maintaining their revolutions and orbits, and despair in the face of coming ages. But, without hands or arms, the sun holds them. Without cords or bands the solar king drives them unharnessed on their mighty rounds without a single misstep, and will bring them, in the end, to their bound without a wanderer. Now, if the sun can do this—the sun, which is but a thing itself, driven and held—shall not He who created the heavens, and gave the sun his power, be able to hold us by the attraction of His heart, the strength of His hands, and the omnipotence of His affectionate will?

5. Is the source of all spiritual excellencies.

(2375.) Day and night, the tides are rising along our shores, filling bay and estuary, silently for the most part, yet surely. The power that draws them resides afar off in the heavenly bodies, and is not seen nor noticed, but only inferred. All the goodness of men, their generous impulses, their loves and faiths and inspirations of purity, their zeal and enthusiasm in self-denial and devotion—that great human tide of goodness which is moving in upon the human heart—is derived from God, who, afar off, silent as the moon in summer nights, is drawing all men unto Him.

—Becher.

6. Its transforming power.

(2376.) In nature there is hardly a stone that is not capable of crystallising into something purer and brighter than its normal state. Coal, by a slightly different arrangement of its particles, is capable of becoming the radiant diamond. The slag cast out from the furnace as useless waste, forms into globular masses of radiating crystals. From tar and pitch the loveliest colours are now manufactured. The very mud of the road, trampled under foot as the type of all impurity, can be changed by chemical art into metals and gems of surpassing beauty. And so the most unpromising materials, from the most worthless moral rubbish that men cast out and despise, may be converted by the Divine alchemy into the gold of the sanctuary, and made jewels fit for the mediatorial crown of the Redeemer. Let the case of Mary Magdalene, of John Newton, of John Bunyan, of thousands more, encourage those who are still in the gall of bitterness and in the bond of iniquity. Seek to be subjected to the same purifying process: lay yourselves open to the same spiritual influences; yield yourselves up into the hands of the Spirit to become His finished and exquisite workmanship. Seek diligently a saving and sanctifying union with Christ through faith; and He will perfect that which concerneth you, and lay your stones with fair colours. "Though ye have lien among the pots, ye shall yet be as the wings of a dove, covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold."

—Macmillan.

7. Inexhaustible.

(2377.) God is ever giving to His children, yet hath not the less: His riches are imparted, not impaired: like the sun that still shines, yet hath not the less light.

—Watson, 1696.

XXVI. THE REST AND PORTION OF THE SOUL.

(2378.) As he that walketh in the sun careth not whether the moon shine or no, because he hath no need of her light : even so, when a man hath found the heavenly riches, he careth not for earthly riches.

—Caudray, 1609.

(2379.) The favour of God makes a little estate great riches, every state contentful. A little thing, given as a token of the king's goodwill, do we not prize it more than thrice the value of that which is no pledge of his favour? And when the love of a sinful man is of such force that many a woman, while she may enjoy it, feels not beggary itself to be grievous, what a force is there in the grace of God, while it is perceived, to make us find no grievance in greatest extremity ! Whereas without this, were a man in a paradise of the earth, with all the good of it, all were nothing. There are noblemen in the Tower who may ride their great horses, have their ladies, fare deliciously, want not for wealth, yet because they are out of the king's favour, no wise man would be in their coats, none esteem their state happy. How much more, then, are all things of no value, if they be possessed without this favour of which we entreat? This grace is our life ; it is better than life. As the marigold opens when the sun shines over it, and shuts when it is withdrawn, so our life follows this favour, we are enlarged if we feel it ; if it be hidden, we are troubled. Finally, that which the king's favourable aspect does in his subject, that which the sun and dew do in the creatures of the earth, which they make to smile in their manner, the like does this grace, through all the world of spirits, who feel the influence of it.

—Bayne, 1617.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(2381.) A man that is hungry finds his stomach still craving. Something he wants, without which he cannot be well. Give him music, company, pictures, houses, honours, yet there follows no satisfaction (these are not suitable to his appetite), still his stomach craves ; but set before this man some wholesome food, and let him eat, and his craving is over. So it is with man's soul as with his body ; the soul is full of cravings and longings, spending itself in sallies out after its proper food. Give it the credit, and profits, and pleasures of the world, and they cannot abate its desire ; it craves still (for these do not answer the soul's nature, and therefore cannot answer its necessity) ; but once set God before it, and it feeding on Him, it is satisfied ; its very inordinate, dogged appetite after the world is now cured. He, tasting his manna, tramples on the onions of Egypt : "He that drinketh of this water shall thirst again, but he that drinketh of the water which I shall give him shall never thirst."

—Swissnock, 1773.

(2382.) It is with God and the soul as between the sun and the earth. In the decline of the year, when the sun seems to draw afar off from us, how doth the earth mourn and droop ; how do the trees cast off the ornament of their leaves and fruits ; how doth the sap of all plants run down to the roots, leaving the bare boughs seemingly sere and dead ! But, at the manifestation of it in the rising of the spring, all things seem revived ; the earth decks herself in the fresh habiliments of blossoms, leaves, and flowers, to entertain those comfortable heats and influences. So, and no more, in the declining and approach of this all-glorious Sun of Righteousness ; in His presence there is life and blessedness, in His absence nothing but grief, disconsolateness, and despair. If an earthly being do but withdraw himself from us for a time, we are troubled ; how much more if the King of glory shall absent Himself from us in displeasure !

—Salter.

(2383.) God is not only the rewarder, but is Himself the reward of His saints. A king may enrich his subjects with gratuities ; but he bestows himself upon his queen.

(2384.) As bees can never stay upon any corrupt thing, but only stop among the flowers, so no creature can ever satisfy your heart, for it can never rest but in God alone ; God not being willing that our hearts should find any resting-place, no more than the dove which went out of Noah's ark, to the end it may return to Himself from whom it proceeded.

—De Sales.

(2385.) And now is the question asked, Why is this world unsatisfying? Brethren, it is the grandeur of the soul which God has given us, which makes it insatiable in its desires—with an infinite void which cannot be filled up. A soul which was made for God, how can the world fill it? If the ocean can be still with miles of unstable waters beneath it, then, the soul of man, rocking itself upon its own deep longings, with the Infinite beneath it, may rest. We were created once in majesty, to find enjoyment in God, and if our hearts are empty now, there is nothing for it but to fill up the hollowness of the soul with God.

Let not that expression—filling the soul with God—pass away without a distinct meaning. God is love and goodness. Fill the soul with goodness, and fill the soul with love, that is the filling it with God. If we love one another, God dwelleth in us. There is nothing else that can satisfy.

—F. W. Robertson, 1816-1853.

(2386.) The objects of human desire and ambition are very fair, and at a distance promise very well to him who can come up with them. But the pursuit of them (and the whole natural life of man is one long pursuit) is like the countryman's chase after the rainbow. He thought that one limb of the bright arch rested in the field close to him, but when he had cleared the hedge, and come up to the spot on which it seemed to rest, the rainbow had adjourned into another field. Even so these various earthly objects of desire or ambition, one after another disappoint those who attain them; their prismatic colours all vanish when we come up close to them, they are found to have their anxieties and their troubles (not the least of which is the precarious tenure of them), and some new rainbow is seen ahead, two or three fields off, to lure us into a pursuit which turns out to be as fruitless as the former. Must it ever be so? Is there no really satisfactory object in which the soul of man may find a full and perfect contentment? assuredly there is. Our Creator does not mock and baffle us by implanting strong instincts in our nature, and great yearnings after happiness, which have nothing corresponding to them. In the knowledge of God, in the appreciation of God, in the enjoyment of God, in communion with God, but in nothing short of this, man can find rest.

—Goulburn.

(2387.) As when I hunger, my hunger says that there is food; as when my eye was made, that eye said that there was light to match it and to meet it; so in the higher realms of experience, I do know that certain struggles and yearnings, certain mute wants, certain indefinite and indescribable experiences, all point to something higher than I am.

What is it that the vine seeks, day by day, struggling through the leaves, and twining itself upon whatever comes in its way? Is it support? It would be just as well supported if it lay on the ground. Why does the vine go still twining up? It is because it is in love with the light. Why is it that men's souls twine, and rise, and aspire? Is it instinct? What is instinct but this: that there is something in the nature of the soul which reaches out after a stimulus which it feels, as the plant grows toward the light which looks upon it and stimulates it? As everything in the vegetable kingdom reaches toward the sun, so the soul reaches toward God. He yearns for us, and we reach out toward Him.

—Becher.

XXVII. HIS INDWELLING IN THE SOUL.

(2388.) We would be receptacles of Thine influence. As the sun shines in the dewdrop according to its measure, so shine in us. Fill the whole of our little orbs with Thy presence, so that Thy life shall augment ours, and sustain it.

—Becher.

(2389.) To creatures made in God's image, and renewed in God's image, God Himself must ever be the standard of completeness. Between God and all His creatures there is, we reverently acknowledge, a vast difference; but the pitcher may be full as well as the river, and the hand may be full as well as the storehouse. There is a fulness which is as really the attribute of that which in capacity is small, as of that which in capacity is infinite. The sweet little flower "forget-me-not," is as full of colour as the bright blue sky over its tiny head. The vine of the cottager may be as full of fruit as the vineyard of the wealthy vine-grower. The baby, which smiles on its mother's breast, may be as full of joy as the seraph before the throne. The vast difference which exists between God's nature and ours, does not prevent that nature in some respects being a standard. The fulness of man may be as the fulness of God. God is full, and man in his capacity, may be full as God.

—S. Martin.

XXVIII. THE EVER-FAITHFUL FRIEND.

(2390.) It is the saying of Euripides, that a faithful friend in adversity is better than a calm sea to a weather-beaten mariner. Indeed, the world is full of false lovers, who use their friends as we do candles, burn them to the snuff, and when all their substance is wasted, trample them under their feet, and light others; but God to His chosen is as the ivy clasping about a wall, which will as soon die as desert it. Extremity doth but fasten a trusty friend; whilst he, as a well-wrought vault, is the stronger by how much more weight he beareth. Though many men are as ponds, dry in the heat of summer, when there is most need of them, yet the blessed God dealeth not so with His saints; but His help is nearest when their hardships are greatest. When they walk in the valley of the shadow of death, He is with them.

—Swinnock, 1673.

GOOD WORKS.

1. Can be performed by none but good men.

(2391.) All our works before repentance are dead works (Heb. vi. 1). And these works have no true beauty in them, with whatsoever gloss they may appear to a natural eye. A dead body may have something of the features and beauty of a living, but it is but the beauty of a carcase, not of a man. A statue, by the stone-cutter's art, and the painter's skill, may be made very comely, yet it is but a statue still; where is the life? Such services are but the works of art, as flowers painted on the wall with curious colours, but where is the vegetative principle? Since man, therefore, is spiritually dead, he cannot perform a living service. As a natural death does incapacitate for natural actions, so a spiritual death must incapacitate for spiritual actions.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

2. In what sense any man's works can be said to be good.

(2392.) When we mingle water with wine in a cup, that which is poured out from it is called wine though water be mingled with it; and albeit there be more water than wine, yet that which is the principal and most precious part of all beareth the name: even so the good works which we do by the grace of God, be it that they have a great many spots and imperfections as they proceed from us, yet for all that they hold always the name and reputation of Him who is the principal Author.

—Cawdrey, 1609.

3. Are required of all who profess to be Christ's.

(2393.) Of such as have His special love, He looks for obedience and honour, wherein is there thankfulness. The courtier that is advanced above others ought to be more respectful of the prince and his will, and with more care and cheerfulness perform all obedience and the duty of his place than others. He that hath his life, liberty, and living given unto him when all was lost, if he should not respect him, every tongue should be ready to condemn him. But if he should be made heir to the crown, if his issue fail, or he have no child, then more. So in this, and this not being, nothing will more prove that they are not that they would seem to be, and that they have not that they brag on.

—Stock, 1568-1626.

(2394.) Howsoever God may endure barrenness out of the Church, in want of means, yet He will never endure it under means. It is better for a bramble to be in the wilderness than in an orchard; for a weed to be abroad, than in a garden, where it is sure to be weeded out, as the other to be cut down. If a man will be unprofitable, let him be unprofitable out of the Church. But to be so where he has the dew of grace falling on him, in the means of salvation, where are all God's sweet favours, to be a bramble in the orchard, to be a weed in the garden, to be noisome in a place where we should be fruitful, will God, the great husbandman, endure this? Whatsoever is not for fruit is for the fire (Matt. iii. 10).
—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

—T. Stapleton.

If a skilful architect, observing you expending your summer days and your manhood's strength in an effort to build a house upon the sand, should benevolently warn you that the labour would be labour lost, you would poorly profit by his counsel if you should simply desist from the work and loiter idle near the spot. The architect, your friend, did not object to the expenditure of your time and strength in building, but he saw that the higher your wall should rise on that foundation, the more certain and more destructive would be its fall. He meant that you should find the solid rock, and build there—build with all your might.

The Gospel rejects good works, not as the fruit of faith, but as the meritorious ground of hope before God. The place of man's works in the Christian system decisively affects their nature. Although in form they may be good, if they are made the foundation of the doer's hope, they are dead, and therefore loathsome to the living. They are the offerings which guilt makes under the pressure of fear to the God whom the conscience dislikes because of His holiness. Those who work thus are workers of iniquity, although they give all their goods to feed the poor, and their bodies to be burned to boot. But when we labour to keep good works out of the wrong place, we do not disparage them in the right place. Beneath a sinner as the material of his confidence, they are not only useless but ruinous; in the life of a believer they are natural and necessary. Life does not spring from them, but they spring from life. As ciphers added one by one in an endless row to the left hand of a unit are of no value, but on the right hand rapidly multiply its power; so, although good works are of no avail to make a man a Christian, yet a Christian's good works are both pleasing to God and profitable to men.

—Arnot.

(2397.) I ask you to remember, at home, in the shop, and in the counting-house, that you are epistles of Christ; and that in your spirit, habits, and character, His very thoughts are to be translated into forms which common men can read and understand. You would condemn with heaviest censure the presumptuous hand which wilfully corrupted the text of the printed book in which the acts and thoughts of God are preserved for the instruction of the world; you would condemn with censure hardly less severe the carelessness which should omit chapter after chapter, and give false readings instead of true. But you are the living revelation of God to mankind. Through you it is meant that the Holy Ghost should speak, not in mere words, but in acts, which are more intelligible and emphatic than words. The very life of the Spirit of God is intended to be manifested in your conduct, as the life of a plant is manifested in the flower, and the life of a tree in the fruit. Are you giving a true revelation to mankind, or are you perverting, corrupting, falsifying it?

Your religious emotions irreligious men can know nothing of, but your virtues and vices are a language plain and familiar to them as their mother tongue. They can read these without note or comment. They can judge of the divine inspiration of these, without any argument from miracles. As the style of a great artist is recognised in the drawing and colouring of his pictures; as the genius of Mozart or Beethoven may be known at once by the movement of the melody and the flowing sweetness or mysterious complexity of the chorus, so—if you are really God's workmanship—there ought to be the manifested impress of the divine hand in your character, and to those who know you well, your life ought to be plainly the revelation of a divine idea.

4. Their relation to faith.

(2398.) Works without faith are like a fish without water; in which, though there may seem to be some quick actions of life and symptoms of agility, yet they are, indeed, but forerunners of their end, and the very presages of death.

Faith, again, without works, is like a bird without wings; who, though she may hop with her companions here on earth, yet, if she live till the world ends, she will never fly to heaven.

But when both are joined together, then doth the soul mount up to the hill of eternal rest; these can bravely raise her to her first height; yes, carry her beyond it; taking away both the will that did betray her, and the possibility that might. The former, without the latter, is self-cozenage; the last without the former is mere hypocrisy; together, the excellency of religion. Faith is the rock, while every good action is as a stone laid; one the foundation, the other the structure. The foundation without the walls is of slender value; the building without a basis cannot stand. They are so inseparable, as their conjunction makes them good. Chiefly will I labour for a future foundation, saving faith; and equally will I seek for strong walls, good works. For a man judges the house by the edifice more than by the foundation; so, not according to his faith, but according to his works, shall God judge man.
—Felltham, 1668.

—Hammond, 1605-1666.

(2400.) The bark which covers the tree, seems to be of little worth compared with the body of the tree ; yet if that be peeled off, the tree dies. Though righteous dealings seem to be but the bark and outside of thy religion, yet if once thou castest them off, thy religion, as thriving as thou thoughtest it to be, will quickly wither and come to nothing. The heart-blood of thy godliness may be let out by a wound in thy hand.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(2401.) True faith is of a working, stirring nature ; without good works it is dead or dying. 'Tis kept in plight and heart by a holy life, as the flesh which plaisters over the frame of man's body, though it receive his heat from the vitals within, yet helps to preserve the very life of those vitals : thus good works and gracious actions have their life from faith, yet are necessary helps to preserve the life of faith ; thus we see sometimes the child nursing the parent that bare it, and therein performs but his duty.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(2403.) "A renewed man whose seed is within himself brings forth fruit after his kind, as well as the herba and the trees." (Gen. i. 12.) All living creatures move agreeably to their natures, with a spontaneity and freedom of nature. The bramble does not more naturally bring forth thorns, than a habit of sin does steam out sinful actions ; nor a fountain more freely bubble up its water, than a habit of grace springs up in holy actions.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(2404.) We cannot perform any good works, unless we are created unto them in Christ Jesus ; and hence that creation in Christ Jesus cannot be anywise the effect or consequence of our good works ; we were saved, as the apostles tell us, by grace, when we were dead in trespasses and sins. But if we are indeed created anew in Christ Jesus, our good works must follow, as a necessary, certain, irrepressible result. They are the only evidence of that creation to others ; and they are no less indispensable to ourselves, to certify us of its reality. If we do not bring forth good works, we ought to be convinced that we cannot have been created anew in Christ Jesus, that in one way or other the process of our regeneration has been marred. Good works are the mark, the proof, the evidence of Christian life ; they are the badge of a Christian community ; and they are the means through which the members of that community are bound together, and the Christian life is brought to pervade them all. When they are scanty, the Christian life must be feeble ; when they are totally wanting, whether in an individual or a community, the Christian life must be all but extinct. They are the evidences of the Christian life ; and they are also the means of growing in it ; for it is by exercise, by action, that every living principle is strengthened. This is no way at variance with the assertion that the Christian life is not the effect of our good works. The primary creative cause is, in all instances except the highest, distinct from the highest nutritive causes. The bread which feeds will not beget a man. By study we do not acquire the power of knowing ; but we improve and increase that power, and may do so almost indefinitely. By practising any art—be it music, or painting, or statuary—we do not acquire that particular faculty of the mind which fits a man for becoming a musician, or a painter, or a sculptor, any more than we acquire our eyes by seeing ; indeed if a man has not that faculty already within him, no teaching or practising will draw it out of him ; but when he has it, practice will greatly sharpen and better it. Such, too, is the case with the Christian life. It is not created by our good works, but it is to be fostered and nourished by them, and may be so to a wonderful extent, if we always bear in mind how it originated, and are careful to have it replenish from its only source ; while, on the other hand, without them it will pine and die. Indeed in this instance we have the special assurance : And to him who hath shall be given ; and from him who hath not shall be taken away even what he hath.

—Harr.

5. Their relation to salvation.

(2405.) As the apple is not the cause of the apple-tree, but a fruit of it : even so good works are not the cause of our salvation, but a sign and a fruit of the same.

—Candray, 1609.

(2406.) "Over a few things . . . many things." One reason against all merit in our good works is this : there is no just proportion between our works of righteousness and the reward of them. Our good works are but a few seeds, but the reward is a harvest.

—Bishop Bull, 1634-1710.

(2407.) If we are saved and justified entirely by a righteousness imputed, to what purpose are those good works which the Bible everywhere inculcates ? I answer, that as robes and a coronet do not constitute a peer, but are ensigns and appendages of his peerage (for the will of the sovereign is the grand efficient cause which elevates a commoner to noble rank) ; and as the very patent of creation is only an authentic manifesto, not causal, but declarative, of the king's pleasure to make his subject a nobleman ; just so, good works do not make us alive to God, nor justify us before Him, nor exalt us to the dignity and felicity of celestial peerage ; they are but the robes, the coronet, and the manifesto, shining in our lives and conversations ; and making evident to all around us that we are indeed and in truth chosen to salvation, justified through Christ, and renewed by the Holy Ghost.

—Toplady, 1740-1778.

(2408.) He that for giving a draught of water to a thirsty person should expect to be paid with a good plantation, would be modest in his demands compared with those who think they deserve heaven for the little good they do on earth.

—Franklin.

(2409.) There can be no doubt at all that salvation is by faith, and that its being by faith is one of those special circumstances which make the Gospel a new covenant; but still it may be by works also; for, to use a familiar illustration, obedience is the road to heaven, and faith the gate. Those who attempt to be saved simply without works, are like persons who should attempt to travel to a place not along the road, but across the fields. If we wish to get to our journey's end, we shall keep to the road; but even then we may go the wrong road. This was the case with the Jews. They professed to go along the road of works, they did not wander into the fields, so far well; but they took the wrong road. That particular road of which faith is the gate, that particular obedience, those particular works, which commence in faith, these are the only right and sure road to heaven. It is wrong to leave the road for the open country; again, it is wrong to go along the wrong road; but it is not wrong to go along the right road! And in like manner it is sinful to attempt no obedience whatever; it is blind perversity to attempt obedience by the Jewish law of nature; but it is not sinful, it is not perverse, it is nothing else than wisdom, nothing else than true godliness, to follow after that obedience which is of faith.

The illustration may be pursued further. A road may want repairing, it may get worse and worse as we go on till it ceases to be a road; it may fall off from a road into a lane, from a lane to a path, or a wild heath, or a marsh; or it may be cut off by high impassable mountains, so that a person who attempts that way will never arrive at his journey's end. This was the case with the works of the law by which the Jews thought to gain heaven,—this is the case with all works done in our natural strength; they are like a road over fens or precipices, which is sure to fail us. At first we might seem to go on well, but we should find at length that we made no progress. We should never get to our journey's end. Our best obedience in our own strength is worth nothing; it is altogether unsound, it is ever-failing, it never grows firmer, it never can be reckoned on, it does nothing well, it has nothing in it pleasing or acceptable to God; and not only so, it is the obedience of souls born and living under God's wrath, for a state of nature is a state of wrath. On the other hand, obedience which is done in faith is done with the aid of the Holy Spirit; it is holy and acceptable in God's sight; it grows habitual and consistent, it tends to possess the soul wholly, and it leads straight onward to heaven.

—Newman.

6. Are the life of devotion.

(2410.) All devotional feelings require sacrificial expression. There is "a sacrifice of the lips," and there is also a sacrifice of an offering which involves expense and suffering. The first, being the readiest at command, is that most usually given; and, being given, it unfortunately prevents the other, because, first of all, costing little, words are given prodigally, and sacrificial acts must toil for years to cover the space which a single fervid promise has stretched itself over. No wonder that the slow acts are superseded by the available words, the weighty bullion by the current paper-money. If I have conveyed all I feel by language, I am tempted to fancy, by the relief experienced, that the feeling has attained its end and realised itself. Farewell, then, to the toil of "daily sacrifice!" Devotion has found for itself a vent in words.

Now there seems to me to be a great difference in the effects produced by these two kinds of sacrificial expression. That by words is simply relief—necessary, blessed—without which smothered feeling would be torture—sometimes, in some minds, madness. But, being only relief, it does not strengthen the feeling, except so far as it prevents morbidness. It rather weakens it, by getting rid of the painfulness. It is a safety-valve; but the danger is that so much force should escape by an impetuous rush through this—that there should be little left to bring higher energies into action. For this reason I rejoice, even though made restless, when my words cannot be commensurate with emotions. The other kind of expression, on the contrary—the sacrifice of acts—is not only a relief, but a strength to feeling. You condense your floating vogue desires in something that does not disperse into thin air. There it is, visible—done; one of the facts of life; part of your history, credit realised in gold; a pledge for the future, for this reason, that if your feelings should alter afterwards, all those acts which have cost so much are thrown away, and become so much time, suffering and expense lost for ever. You guard the feeling for the sake of not losing all this.

—F. W. Robertson, 1816-1853.

7. Are not to be boasted of.

—White, 1576-1648.

(2412.) A gardener offering a rape-root (being the best present the poor man had) to the Duke of Burgundy, was bountifully rewarded by the duke, which his steward observing, and thinking to make use of his bounty, presented him with a very fair horse; the duke, being a very wise, discreet man, perceived the project, received the horse, and gave him nothing for it. Right so will God deal with all merit-mongers who think, by their good works, to purchase heaven, which cannot be, the work being finite, the wages infinite; so that merit must needs be a mere fiction, since there can be no proportion betwixt the work and reward. There is, indeed, mention made of a mercy-seat in the temple, but there was never heard of any school of merit but in the chapel of Antichrist.

—Trapp, 1601-1669.

8. Are scrutinised by God.

(2413.) Be careful of your words, thoughts, ways, affections, desires, all which are the fruits of your souls; for God takes notice of all; He walks in this His garden every day, and spies out how many raw, unripe, indigested performances, as prayers, &c., hang on such or such a branch, what gum of pride, what leaves, what luxuriant sprigs, what are rotten boughs and which are sound, and goes up and down with His pruning-knife in His hand, and cuts and slashes where He sees things amiss; He turns up all your leaves, sees what fruit is under, and deals with men accordingly. — Goodwin, 1600-1667.

3. Evangelical preachers are not enemies to good works.

(2414.) Because we deny salvation by our own works, many charge us with being enemies to good works. But am I an enemy to a nobleman, because I will not attribute to him those honours which are due only to the king? If I say to a common soldier in an army, You cannot lead that army against the enemy, will he therefore say, Then I may begone: there is no need of me? Or, if I see a man at his day labour, and say to him, You will never be able to purchase an estate of £10,000 per annum by working in that manner, will he therefore give over his work, and say he is discouraged?

— Salter, 1840.

GOSPEL, THE

1. A Great Mystery.

(2415.) We are far from suppressing our conviction that this is a great mystery. We rejoice, on the contrary, in its incomprehensibility. We delight to lose ourselves in the impenetrable shades which invest the subject; because in the darkness and cloud which envelop it God dwells. It is the greatness which forms the mystery of the fact; the matchless love and condescension constitute the very nucleus of the difficulty. It could only be brought within the sphere of our comprehension by a contraction of its vast dimensions, by a depression of its natural grandeur. A prostration of it to the level of our feeble capacities would only render it incapable of being the magnet of souls, the attraction of hearts, the wonder of the universe.

— Robert Hall, 1764-1831.

2. The Gladdest Tidings.

(2416.) We have many sweet and precious promises to cheer our present existence, and enliven the gloom of an untried futurity. But the glorious announcement of a free and full salvation through the merits of the Lord Jesus, imputed to the believer simply through faith in Him, eclipses them all. Like the stars in the presence of the sun, they hide their diminished heads, lost in the effulgence of this bright luminary; and as the moon will pour from one end of the heavens to the other, a light which could not be contributed from the whole host of minute studding stars—so it is with this wonderful gift of God's salvation. It sheds a brighter and wider light than the whole hemisphere of God's love, starred with all His other precious promises, can dispense.

— Salter, 1840.

3. Is Addressed to all Mankind.

(2417.) While there is eternal life in the Gospel sufficient for all, none are specially excluded from its benefits. Those only are excluded who exclude themselves, and refuse to be saved on God's own terms. His proclamation of mercy to a lost, rebel world, is clogged with no exceptions. After our brave men had crushed that terrible revolt which some years ago shook our Indian empire to its foundations, and filled many of our homes with grief, an amnesty was proclaimed, but not to all. Some were by name excluded from its grace; and, as might have been expected, these desperate men fought it out to the last in the fastnesses and deadly jungles of Nepaul. They did not come in to accept the amnesty. There was no reason why they should. It was not for them. Heads of the revolt, and guilty of cold-blooded murders, as well as of the blackest treachery, there was no hope of mercy held out to them; and so, standing to their arms, they resolved to spin out their lives to the last thread, and sell them at the dearest price. What a contrast to this, the Gospel! Whatever be men's sins and crimes, none are excluded, by name or by character, from the amnesty which God proclaims, from the benefits of eternal life. "Whosoever cometh unto Me," says Jesus, "I will in nowise cast out."

— Guthrie.

4. Universally and permanently needful.

(2418.) Let us for a moment suppose (what can never be proved), that mankind are now much better able to investigate the truth, and to find out their duty by themselves, than they were in former ages; and that reason can give us (the utmost it ever did or can pretend to give) a perfect system of morality. But what will that avail us, unless it can be shown that man is also perfect and uncorrupt? A religion that contains nothing more than a perfect system of morality, might perhaps suit an angel, but it is only one part, it is only a subordinate part, of the religion of a man and a sinner. It would be but very poor consolation to a nobleman expecting to be led forth for execution, to put into his hand a complete collection of the laws of his country, when the poor wretch perhaps expected a reprieve. It could serve no other purpose than to embitter his agonies, and make him see more clearly the justice of his condemnation. If you choose to do the unhappy man a real service, and to give him any substantial comfort, you must assure him that the offence for which he was going to die was forgiven him; that his sentence was reversed; that he would not only be restored to his prince's favour, but put in a way of preserving it for the future; and if his conduct afterwards was honest and upright, he should be deemed capable of enjoying the highest honours in his master's kingdom. But no one could tell him this, or at least he would credit no one that did, except he was commissioned and authorised by the prince himself to tell him so. He might study the laws in his hands till the very moment of his execution, without ever finding out from them that he should obtain a pardon.

Such, the Scriptures inform us, was the state of man before Christ came into the world. The sentence of death had passed upon him, and he had no plea to offer to arrest the execution of it. Reason, you say, gives him a perfect rule to walk by. But he has already transgressed this rule, and if even this transgression were cancelled, yet if left to himself he may transgress it again the next moment. He is uneasy under his sentence, he wants forgiveness for the past, assistance for the future, and the prospect of being restored to the honours and favour of the King of heaven, which he has forfeited by rebellion; and till you can give him this, it is an insult upon his misery to talk to him of a perfect rule of action. If this be all that reason can give him (and it really is much more than it can give him), he must necessarily have recourse to revelation: God only knows, and God only can tell, whether He will forgive, and upon what terms He will forgive, the offences done against Him; what mode of worship He requires; what helps He will afford us, and what condition He will place us in hereafter. All this God actually has told us in the Gospel. It was to tell us this He sent His Son into the world.

—Salter, 1840.

(2419.) "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men to me." So said the Saviour of men. The cross is for all ages, and all countries, the great moral magnet to draw men from barbarism to civilisation, from sin to holiness, from misery to happiness, and from earth to heaven; and it were as rational to say the loadstone had lost its original property of popular attraction, and that the mariner's compass is an old stale invention, and must now be replaced with some new device better adapted to the modern light of science, as to suppose that the doctrine of the cross has become effete, and must give way to some new phase of theological truth.

—James.

(2420.) It is never to be forgotten, amidst all the fluctuations of opinion, all the vicissitudes of earthly affairs, and even the advance of civilisation, science, and social improvement, that human nature, in its spiritual condition and its relation to God, remains unchanged. The lapse of ages will never wear out our natural corruption, nor will the progress of science and advance of civilisation eradicate it. Man as he is born into the world, and grows up in it, will still, as ever, need both the redemption and the regeneration of the Gospel of Christ. Amidst the light of the nineteenth century, he as much needs this as he did amidst the darkness of the Middle Ages; it is as needful to the philosopher of Great Britain as to the savage of the Pacific Ocean; and let science carry on its discoveries, and art multiply its inventions, and literature polish the surface of society, as they may, the redemption and regeneration of the Gospel will be as much needed by our posterity, amidst the universal triumphs of civilisation, and the light and glory of the millennium, as they now are. Infidels may babble as they please, and it is but babble, after all, though it calls itself philosophy, about society outgrowing the need of old Christianity. They may just as rationally talk about human nature outgrowing the need of the old laws of the material universe; doing without the old sun to enlighten us, the old atmosphere to sustain us, the old water to refresh us, and the old corn to nourish us, as without the Gospel to renew, sanctify, and save mankind; for the relation of these to our material nature is not one whit more fixed and unalterable than is the Gospel as a remedial system to our lapsed and diseased moral nature.

—James.

5. Its universal adaptation.

(2421.) Heaven's gate is no wider open to a Jew than to a Grecian. "In Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature. And as many as walk according to this rule, peace be on them, and mercy, and upon the Israel of God." The sun of the Gospel, as of the world, is not confined to lighten Judea only, but shines universally.

(2422.) However we may differ from one another in training, in habits, in caste of thought, in idiosyncracies of character, in circumstances, in age, all these are but the upper strata which vary locally. Beneath all these there lie everywhere the solid foundations of the primeval rocks, and beneath these, again, the glowing central mass, the flaming heart of the world. Christianity sends its shaft right down through all these upper and local beds, till it reaches the deepest depths which are the same in every man—the obstinate wilfulness of a nature averse from God, and the yet deeper-lying longings of a soul that flames with the consciousness of God, and yearns for rest and peace. To the sense of sin, to the sense of sorrow, to the conscience never wholly stifled, to the desires after good never utterly eradicated and never slaked by ought beside itself, does this mighty word come.

Hence its universal adaptation to mankind. It alone of all so-called faiths overleaps all geographical limits and lives in all centuries. It alone wins its trophies and bestows its gifts on all sorts and conditions of men. Other plants which the "Heavenly Father hath not planted," have their zones of vegetation and die outside certain degrees of latitude, but the seed of the kingdom is like corn, an exotic nowhere, for wherever man lives it will grow, and yet an exotic everywhere, for it came down from heaven. Other food requires an educated palate for its appreciation, but any hungry man in any land will relish bread. For every soul on earth this living, dying love of the Lord Jesus Christ addresses itself to and satisfies his deepest wants. It is the bread which gives life to the world.

—MacLaren.

(2423.) God's Gospel is made not for Englishmen but for all men. There is a light for every land, and a blessing for every nation and kindred and people. Many think the Gospel is a very beautiful thing if you would only keep it at home; but the moment you try to apply it to anybody else it will not suit them. Try it upon the negro: "Well, the fact is, he is too low; he is not capable of being elevated to the height of Christianity." Try it upon the Brahmin: he is too high, far above; you cannot reach him. Each of these must have some particular religion adapted to himself; but one religion would not suit them all. A man looked into the eye of an Anglo-Saxon and found it blue, and into the eye of a negro, and found it black, and he said, These are different organisations; you are not so bewildered as to think you can enlighten both these eyes with the same sun. You must have a sun for each of them; you must have different suns, you see, because the eyes are differently organised. Very well, that is exceedingly fine in theory, but try it—try whether the sun which God put in the heaven will not illuminate the pale eye of the northerner and the dark eye of the southerner.

—Arthur.

ing with a thousand gorgeous hues, the air perfumed in its passage over fields and heath, the lovely flowers of the field and hedge-row, these are provided by a beneficent God for rich and poor alike. And who would leave these for the painted gaieties of art? So the blessings of the Gospel are not for the learned alone. They may taste the beauties of the inspired poetry better, and penetrate more deeply into the few obscurities of holy writ; but the comforts of the Bible, pardon of sin, reconciliation with God, peace, and holiness, and heaven—these are for all; these gladden the heart of the labourer at his toil, of the patient of an hospital on his dying bed. And beware then how thou quit these divine consolations for all that learning can offer.

—Salter.

6. Its adaptation to our need a proof of its divine origin.

(2425.) The sin and misery of the world is such that it groaneth for a Saviour; and when I hear of a physician sent from heaven, I easily believe it, when I see the woful world mortally diseased, and gasping in its deep distress. The condition of the world is visibly so suitable to the whole office of Christ, and to the doctrine of the Gospel, that I am driven to think that if God have mercy for it, some physician and extraordinary help shall be afforded it. And when I see none else but Jesus Christ whom reason will allow me to believe is that Physician, it somewhat prepareth my mind to look toward Him and hope.

And also the evil of this present world is very suitable to the doctrine of Christ, when He telleth us how He came not to settle us here in a state of prosperity, nor to make the world our rest or portion; but to save us from it, as our enemy and calamity, our danger, and our wilderness and trouble, and to bring up our hearts first and then ourselves to a better world, which He calleth us to seek and to make sure of, whereas I find that most other religions, though they say something of a life hereafter, yet lead men to look for most or much of their felicity here, as consisting in the fruition of this world, which experience tells me is so miserable.

(2426.) If a man but see his deficiencies, then by a single glance of the eye may he also see how the doctrines of the Gospel and these deficiencies fit to one another; and thus, by an act of intuition, may a man without learning, but with a conscience simply awakened, be made to perceive what no erudition, and no elaborate contemplation of the articles of orthodoxy, will make another man to perceive whose conscience is unawakened. It is somewhat as if a fragment of anything was broken away from some mass of which at one time it formed a part. All the hollows and all the protuberances on one surface will be in a state of most accurate adjustment with the corresponding protuberances and hollows upon the other. But it is not looking, however intently, to one of these surfaces, that we shall come to ascertain the truth of this separation; or if re-union be possible, the place at which the re-union should be made. It is not by the most strict and scientific measurement of the various angles and unevennesses which have been made at the place of disruption, if we have only one side of the fracture to look upon. But if we have both sides to compare the one with the other, we may, with the rapid inspection of a moment, perceive what the labour of a whole life expended on the inspection of one side could not have enabled us to perceive. We may come at once to the belief, that here at one time a part was rent away—and this is the very fragment which has fallen off—and that on the rock from which it was detached, we behold its precise and certain counterpart—a conclusion to which we never should have come by the single contemplation of the precipice that is above us, but to which we come immediately, and as if by the light of intuition, on comparing it to the dissevered piece that is beneath us. And such is the certainty of our religious experience.

(2427.) The Divine character of the Gospel appears in this—in its wonderful capacity to adapt itself to the boundless wants of the whole family of man. It is like the mighty ocean which rolls itself on the wide-spreading shores of a hundred empires, and yet replenishes and fills with its tide the little creek. Thus the Gospel, while it visits with its healing waters the wide-spreading Church of Christ, fills, and supplies with the waters of life, the soul of the meanest believer in Jesus.

—Salter.

7. Its power.

—Cudworth, 1617-1688.

(2429.) The river Wye is considered one of the most beautiful streams that flow across our country. It is admitted that it winds its beautiful course through some of the fairest scenery and the richest and most fruitful districts of our land,—scenes so fair, so varied, so lovely, and so beautiful, that one would think that in themselves they would be sufficient to win the hearts of the inhabitants to God, and to inspire them with holy thoughts and admiration of the great Source of nature, and of beauty, and goodness. But, alas! the history of man shows that in some of the fairest regions of the world man has been the most degraded. So it was on the banks of that beautiful stream. On the south side there were a number of parishes, and these parishes were in deadly feud between each other. We will call, if you please, those on the one side the northerners, and those on the other side the southerners. I cannot say the number of parishes on each side that were engaged in this matter, but this was a fact—that once a year some hundreds of men met in a village upon the banks of this beautiful river to fight a battle that lasted several hours, with sticks and clubs loaded with lead. Nobody knew the origin of it, nor what it was about; but they had commenced settling some unknown question by blows, and, though the one party sometimes was satisfied, or gained the victory, the other side was never satisfied, who lost it, and the result was, it had to be fought out again, and settled again, and it never got settled at all. The magistrates were in the habit of guarding the peace against these rude people by swearing in a great number of constables;

but, in spite of all the constables, farmers and their sons,—men who held respectable positions in the neighbourhood,—with their dependencies, came and met on the anniversary of this battle, and always would fight it out. The last time they fought, the northerners gained the day; they went home with flying colours; the southerners went home swearing vengeance upon their old enemies, and saying they would give it them the next time they met. However, during the course of the summer, one fine afternoon, a stranger, decently clad, was seen walking into one of the villages belonging to the conquered army. He looked round about, turned into a cottage, and asked for the loan of a chair. The good woman of the cottage saw he was a stranger, but as he had a decent appearance, she judged that he might be trusted with an old chair for a short time. He walked off and planted his chair under a tall elm growing in the centre of the village green. He mounted the chair, and commenced singing a hymn. The villagers all come out of their doors, and there is a strange speculation going on as to what all this could mean: "This man is not begging,—he would not beg there; what is he about?" Nobody knew where he came from nor where he was going to. He had brought no letter of recommendation or commendation to the clergyman of the parish, to Mr. Boniface of the "Red Lion," to the churchwardens, or to anybody else. Nobody knew anything about him. After singing the hymn he prayed. By the time he had opened his eyes after prayer, he found two or three hundred people about him. Then he sang a hymn—then he preached. The people were astonished that the man could pray without a prayer-book, and that he could preach without a manuscript. It was a thing they had never witnessed before. They listened to him, and, with power, and energy, and Divine unction, he spoke the truth to these rude people. Many of the people who were accustomed to fight the neighbouring villages once a year were there, and for the first time heard the truth in that honest, earnest manner, delivered in their hearing. It was a fortnight after, and a fortnight after that; and then he went to the other villages, and, in the course of six or eight months, numbers of these rough people were converted to God. A society was formed. The 17th of May, the anniversary of the battle, returned. The northerners were there to fight their old enemies, but not a southerner was there to fight that day. Never has a battle of that character been fought there since. And this peace was not brought about by the interference of the magistrate, nor by the powerful arm of the police, but by a simple stranger that nobody knew, with God's love in his heart, and God's Book in his hand, preaching the truth to these people.

—Henry Phillips.

(2430.) The Gospel is the spiritual medicine of the soul. In numberless cases, certainly, it does not restore the health of the soul; but let the blame be cast where it ought to rest. Let it never be forgotten that the fault is not in the medicine, but in the indisposition of sinners to take it. In a case where the Gospel does not produce holy perceptions and affections, are we warranted to suppose that it is essentially incompetent to their production, even when by the power of faith it is brought to bear upon the mind? Ought we not rather to suppose that it has not been brought to bear upon the mind of this individual in consequence of his rejection of its testimony? The latter, surely, is the true state of the case. I can scarcely imagine a greater mistake than one which I fear is committed by many who speak as if they thought that, when the Gospel is scripturally understood and firmly believed, it has no power to raise the affections from sin to holiness; from the world to God;—that even in this case some additional influence must be imparted to it, or that it would remain totally inoperative. To entertain this notion is virtually to maintain that the sinner may not be blameable even while he remains unsanctified, having by supposition exhausted his duty by believing the Gospel. He has done, on this admission, all that God requires of him. He has taken the right medicine—taken it in the prescribed manner, and yet his spiritual malady remains. How could we avoid feeling that, if this were indeed the case, the fault would be in the medicine, and that he would be an object of pity, and not of censure? On these accounts, I cannot but strongly object to the phraseology of some who apply the words, "a dead letter," to the Word of God. If the terms were merely meant to intimate the fact that Divine revelation is never understood and received as the record of God without Divine influences, they would convey a most undeniable and important truth. But I fear that, in many cases at least, the words are designed to teach that the medicine itself is essentially inoperative; and when this idea is conveyed to the mind of the sinner, it will veil the full extent of his guilt, by failing to fix his attention upon his own obstinate rejection of the medicine, as the direct and, indeed, exclusive cause of his remaining under the full power of spiritual disease.

—Payne.

8. How it is to be treated by us.

(2431.) We look at flowers and admire them, but the bees extract from them honey and wax. Some admire the Gospel; others get blessing from it.—R.

(2432.) We may form some idea of the manner in which the Gospel ought to be received from its being represented as an embassy. "We are ambassadors for Christ," saith the apostle, "as though God did beseech you by us: we pray you, in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God." The object of an embassy, in all cases, is peace. Ambassadors are sometimes employed between friendly powers for the adjustment of their affairs; but the allusion, in this case, is manifestly to a righteous prince, who should condescend to speak peaceably to his rebellious subjects, and, as it were, to entreat them for their own sakes to be reconciled. The language of the apostle supposes that the world is engaged in an unnatural and unprovoked rebellion against its Maker; that it is in His power utterly to destroy sinners; that if He were to deal with them according to their deserts, this must be their portion; but that, through the mediation of His Son, He had, as it were, suspended hostilities, had sent His servants with words of peace, and commissioned them to persuade, to entreat, and even to beseech them to be reconciled. But reconciliation to God includes everything that belongs to true conversion. It is the opposite of a state of alienation and enmity to Him (Col. i. 21). It includes a justification of His government, a condemnation of their own unprovoked rebellion against Him, and a thankful reception of the message of peace; which is the same for substance as to repent and believe the Gospel. To speak of an embassy from the God of heaven and earth to His rebellious creatures being entitled to nothing more than an audience, or a decent attention, must itself be highly offensive to the honour of His Majesty; and that such language should proceed from His professed friends must render it still more so.

"When the apostle beseecheth us to be 'reconciled' to God I would know," says Dr. Owen, "whether it be not a part of our duty to yield obedience? If not, the exhortation is frivolous and vain." If sinners are not obliged to be reconciled to God, both as a Lawgiver and a Saviour, and that with all their hearts, it is no sin to be unreconciled. All the enmity of their hearts to God, His law, His gospel, or His Son, must be guiltless. For there can be no neutrality in this case: not to be reconciled is to be unreconciled; not to fall in with the message of peace is to fall out with it; and not to lay down arms and submit to mercy is to maintain the war.

—Andrew Fuller, 1754-1815.

(2433.) I only wish I saw people as eager to be saved from hell, as I once saw a man to be saved from drowning. It was at yonder ferry. Procrastination, the ruin of souls, was almost his death. The time was up; the bell was rung; the gangway withdrawn; the boat in motion; when, after too many delays, he came running along the pier, and, deaf to the cries of warning, took a bold and desperate spring to catch our bulwark. He caught it, but lost his hold, fell backwards; and went down instantly—engulfed in the roaring sea. Sucked out by the receding wave, he rose to the surface a good way off. And though it was a blessed sight to see his head emerge from the water, every eye was still anxiously fixed on him. He floated on his back, but could not swim; and therefore must soon perish. And he had perished; but that then one, bearing a life-buoy aloft in his hand, came rushing down the pier at the top of his speed. Anxiety was now wound up to the highest pitch. Shall he save him? He stops; and with the spray of the stormy sea flying in his face, takes aim; now he bends like a bow; and then, rising to the spring, with herculean arm he sends the life-buoy spinning through the air, away over the waves, to the drowning man. What a moment of suspense for him; for us—the on-lookers! Well thrown by man, and well directed by a watchful Providence, it fell right over his sinking head. With what joy he caught it! How he laid hold of it! Never lover embraced lover with such eager, happy arms. I saw him holding on, pulled from a watery grave; and thought, Would God, that poor sinners, that every man ready to perish, laid hold as eagerly of eternal life!

—Guthrie.

(2434.) Scatter money in a crowd, how they scramble for it; offer bread to the starving, how greedily they seize it; throw a rope to the drowning, how he eagerly grasps it! With like eagerness and earnestness may the Spirit of God help you to lay hold on Christ.

—Guthrie.

9. The danger of neglecting it.

(2435.) The Gospel is a proclamation of free mercy to guilty creatures—an act of grace to rebels. Now, though a rebel should throw away his pistols, and determine to go into the woods, and make his mind better before he goes to court and pleads the act; he may indeed not be found in arms, yet being taken in his reforming scheme he will be hanged. So will it be with those who delay coming to Christ. Hell is paved with good intentions.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

10. Not to be rejected because of the imperfections of its preachers.

(2436.) As a famished man, who doth never refuse any wholesome food prepared for him by his host, though his host himself will not taste thereof; and, likewise, a very sick patient, who never rejecteth healthful medicine, though his physician doth minister the same with a leprous hand; or as a miserable beggar will not forsake a fair piece of silver or gold, though it be proffered him in a filthy fist; and like as unto an imprisoned rebel, who will never reject the prince's pardon, though it be brought him by a most lewd ribald; or as a sorrowful, distressed catiff would willingly hear any joyful news, notwithstanding the messenger who brings the same be a very ungracious varlet: so there can be no more dainty diet provided for Christians than the food of their souls; there cannot be a more healthful medicine made for Christian hearers of the Word than that which amendeth their spiritual maladies, nor can a more golden gift be given unto them than the seven times purified gold of the Sacred Scriptures rightly divided, neither can there be any more welcome pardon proclaimed to men than that which concerns the inheritance of everlasting life. Notwithstanding the preacher himself be careless, be leprous, be filthy, be beastly, or vile, yet the godly hearer will not forsake this heavenly food, or make light account of this wholesome medicine, or lightly esteem this gold, or reject this pardon, or scorn this news, but feed hungrily upon it, apply it in time, lay it up in his heart, yield all reverence unto it, and delight only therein, as in the very joy of his soul.

—Caudray, 1609.

11. Not to be rejected on account of the scepticism of able men.

(2437.) It should not surprise us when men of acute and powerful understandings more or less reject the Gospel, for this reason, that the Christian revelation addresses itself to our hearts, to our love of truth and goodness, our fear of sinning, and our desire to gain God's favour; and quickness, sagacity, depth of thought, strength of mind, power of comprehension, perception of the beautiful, power of language, and the like, though they are excellent gifts, are clearly quite of a different kind from these excellencies—a man may have the one without having the other. This, then, is the plain reason why able, or, again, why learned men are so defective Christians, because there is no necessary connection between faith and ability; because faith is one thing and ability is another; because ability of mind is a gift, and faith is a grace. Who would ever argue that a man could, like Samson, conquer lions or throw down the gates of a city, because he was able, or accomplished, or experienced in the business of life? Who would ever argue that a man could see because he could hear, or run with the swift because he had "the tongue of the learned"? These gifts are different in kind. In like manner, powers of mind and religious principles and feelings are distinct gifts; and as all the highest spiritual excellence, humility, firmness, patience, would never enable a man to read an unknown tongue, or to enter into the depths of science, so all the most brilliant mental endowments, wit, or imagination, or penetration, or depth, will never of themselves make us wise in religion. And as we should fairly and justly deride the savage who wished to decide questions of science or literature by the sword, so may we justly look with amazement on the error of those who think that they can master the high mysteries of spiritual truth, and find their way to God, by what is commonly called reason, i.e., by the random and blind efforts of mere mental acuteness, and mere experience of the world.

That truth, which St. Paul preached, addresses itself to our spiritual nature ; it will be rightly understood, valued, accepted, by none but lovers of truth, virtue, purity, humility, and peace. Wisdom will be justified of her children. Those, indeed, who are thus endowed may and will go on to use their powers of mind, whatever they are, in the service of religion ; none but they can use them aright. Those who reject revealed truth wilfully, are such as do not love moral and religious truth. It is bad men, proud men, men of hard hearts, and unhumiliated tempers, and immoral lives, these are they who reject the Gospel. These are they of whom St. Paul speaks in another epistle—"If our Gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost, in whom the god of this world has blinded the minds of them which believe not." With this agrees the instances of turning the ears from the truth which the New Testament affords us. Who were they who were the enemies of Christ and His apostles ? The infidel Sadducees, the immoral, hard-hearted, yet hypocritical Pharisees ; Herod, who married his brother Philip's wife ; and Felix, who trembled when St. Paul reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come. On the other hand, men of holy and consistent lives, as Cornelius the centurion, and those who were frequenters of religious ordinances, as Simeon and Anna, these became Christians. So it is now. If men turn unto fables of their own will, they do it on account of their pride, or their love of indolence and self-indulgence.

This should be kept in the mind when Christians are alarmed, as they sometimes are, on hearing instances of infidelity or heresy among those who read, reflect, and inquire ; whereas, however we may mourn over such instances, we have no reason to be surprised at them. It is quite enough for Christians to be able to show, as they well can, that belief in revealed religion is not inconsistent with the highest gifts and acquirements of mind, that men even of the strongest and highest intellect have been Christians ; but they have as little reason to be perplexed at finding other men of ability not true believers, as at finding that certain rich men are not true believers, or certain poor men, or some in every rank and circumstance of life. A belief in Christianity has hardly more connection with what is called talent, than it has with riches, station, power, or bodily strength. —J. H. Newman.

12. In what sense men are damned for rejecting it.

(2438.) It may, in a sense, be said of a rebel who refuses to lay down his arms and submit to mercy (which is a case more in point than that of a cor-demned criminal in the hands of justice), that when he comes to be punished, he will die because he refused the king's pardon ; but it is easy to see that the word "because" is, in this connection, used improperly. It does not mean that the refusal of mercy is the crime, and the only crime, for which he suffers ; no, this is not the direct or procuring, so much as the occasional cause of his punishment. Rebellion is that for which he suffers ; and his refusal of mercy is no further a procuring cause of it than as it is a perseverance in rebellion, and, as it were, the completion of it.

—Andrew Fuller, 1754-1815.

13. Its diverse effects.

—Spencer, 1658.

(2440.) Even as it is with the proclamation of a prince, which he sendeth out to his rebellious subjects, wherein he maketh offer not only of pardon, but of grace and favour, to those who will lay down their arms and come in, showing themselves loyal and obedient, but, on the other hand, threatneth extremity of punishment to those who shall yet stand out ; now, this proclamation, with the same breath, breatheth out both life and death—life to those who will hearken to it (which is the main end and intent of proclaiming it), but death to those who oppose themselves against it : even so it is with the evangelical proclamation, the preaching of the Gospel. It reacheth out life and death after the same manner—life to penitent believers, who readily accept the offers of grace and mercy there tendered, but death to obstinate and rebellious sinners, who reject them. To the one it is a savour of life unto life, to the other a savour of death unto death ; to believers the morning star, bringing the light of grace here and of glory hereafter ; to others the evening star, leading to everlasting darkness. Not that it is so in itself, being in its own nature the Word of Life ; but accidentally it becometh so to them, through their unbelief and rejection of it.

—Brinsley, 1600-1665.

(2441.) The Gospel becomes a trial of men's spirits ; and, by it, "the thoughts of many hearts are revealed." The man who loathes his dungeon will gladly take this Lamp, and explore his way to liberty ; while another, who loves his bondage, will only dispute or slumber by it.

—Cecil, 1748-1810.

(2442.) The Gospel is preached equally to every man. The same message comes to us all, offering us the same terms. Christ stands before each of us in the same attitude. And what is the consequence !

A parting of the whole mass of us, some on one side, and some on the other. As when you take a magnet, and hold it to an indiscriminate heap of metal filings, it will gather out all the iron, and leave behind all the rest! "I, if I be lifted up," said He, "will draw all men unto Me." The attractive power will go out over the whole race of His brethren; but from some there will be no response. In some hearts there will be no yielding to the attraction. Some will remain rooted, obstinate, steadfast in their place; and to some the lightest word will be mighty enough to stir all the slumbering pulses of their sin-ridden hearts, and to bring them, broken and penitent, for mercy to His feet. To the one He is "a savour of life unto life, and to the other a savour of death unto death." The broadest doctrine of the universal adaptation, and the universal intention, too, of the Gospel, as the "power of God unto salvation," contains hidden in its depths this undeniable fact, that, be the cause what it may (and, as I believe, the cause lies with us, and is our fault), this separating, judging effect follows from all faithful preaching of Christ's words. He came to judge the world, "that they which see not (as He Himself said) might see, and that they which see might be made blind." And on the cross that process went on in two men, alike in necessity, alike in criminality, alike in this, that Death's icy finger was just being laid upon their hearts, to stop all the flow of its wild blood and passion, but different in this, that the one of them turned himself, by God's grace, and laid hold of the Gospel that was offered to him, and the other turned himself away, and derided, and died.

—Maclaren.

14. To what its success is to be attributed.

(2443.) Our dispute is not whether the Gospel be a suitable means in the hand of the Holy Spirit to convert a sinner, but whether it is sufficient, in virtue of this its suitability, to effect the change without an almighty and invincible agency attending it. A sword is a suitable instrument to cause a wound; but it does not thence follow that it is of itself sufficient to effect this without a hand to wield it. Three things I would here beg leave to offer:

(1.) The Holy Spirit can and does make use of the law as well as the Gospel, in a sinner's conversion. "I had not known sin," says the apostle, "but by the law." "The law is a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ."

(2.) If the success of the Gospel is to be attributed to its suitability, then I suppose, it must be on account of its containing good tidings; and so tending to slay men's native enmity, and to conciliate their hearts to God. But the Scripture represents the human heart as equally prone to abuse God's mercy as to despise His severity. "Let favour be showed to the wicked," says the prophet, "yet will he not learn righteousness: in the land of uprightness will he deal unjustly, and will not behold the majesty of the Lord." The reason why men hate God is not because they consider Him, in every sense, as their enemy; if so, could you but persuade them that God loved them, and Christ died for them, their enmity would subside. But is that indeed the case? Do not the generality of men consider God as their friend? Nor can you persuade them that they are under His displeasure. Yet this has no tendency to remove their enmity. What they hate in God is that from which their hearts are wholly averse, and that is, His true character.

(3.) The success which has attended the Gospel is not ascribed to its supposed fitness to conciliate a sinner's heart, but to the power of Almighty God attending it. I hope this last has been sufficiently proved already. God ordered Moses to take a rod, and smite the rock. The rod, to be sure, was the means of breaking the rock, not, however, on account of its being equal to such an effect; the rock rather had a tendency to break the rod than the rod the rock. But an almighty energy attended it from Him with whom all things are possible.

—Fuller, 1754-1815.

15. The permanence of its influence.

(2444.) It is not merely as a subtle and diffused influence that the Gospel establishes a permanent effect upon us. It is presented to each of us here individually, in the definite form of an actual offer of salvation for each, and of an actual demand of trust from each. The words pass into our souls, and thenceforward it can never be the same as if they had not been there. The smallest particle of light falling on the sensitive plate produces a chemical change that can never be undone again, and the light of Christ's love once brought to the knowledge and presented for the acceptance of a soul, stamps on it an ineffaceable sign of its having been there. The Gospel once heard, is always the Gospel which has been heard. Nothing can alter that. Once heard, it is henceforward a perpetual element in the whole condition, character, and destiny of the hearer.

—Maclaren.

16. Symbols of the Gospel.

(2445.) The Gospel is like leaven, sour to the natural spirit, yet makes him holy bread. . . . As leaven spreads into the whole lump, so the Gospel regenerates the whole man.

—Adams, 1653.

(2446.) "I am come to send fire on the earth." A fire is a power. What a reality, what a vitality, what a sweeping and resistless strength resides in that element of fire. How it spreads, and glows, and fages, and devours! How it strides from point to point, from wood to stone, from gallery to wall, from floor to tower, licking, and devouring, and consuming, while a whole population cowers before it, and can only stand idly by, beholding and weeping over its work! Now, I say that, when the Gospel is called a fire sent upon the earth, we shall do well to remember that a fire is a power; not a name, not an idea, not a poor, faint, creeping thing which may be disregarded and let alone, because at any moment human exertion can interpose and put it down; but a great, an active, at least a domineering and irresistible force, against which all the skill and all the strength in the world is as powerless as an infant's touch. Never suppose that the Gospel is an insignificant or despicable thing; whatever else it is or is not, it is certainly not that. The Gospel is a fire; and what a fire is, you know and you have seen.

—C. J. Vaughan.

17. Nothing else will satisfy believers.

(2447.) Take away a toy from a child, and give him another, and he is satisfied; but if he be hungry no toy will do. As new-born babes, true believers desire the sincere milk of the Word; and the desire of grace in this way is grace.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

18. It is our duty to spread it.

(2448.) Huber, the great naturalist, tells us, that if a single wasp discovers a deposit of honey or other food, he will return to his nest, and impart the good news to his companions, who will sally forth in great numbers to partake of the fare which has been discovered for them. Shall we who have found honey in the rock Christ Jesus, be less considerate of our fellowmen than wasps are of their fellow insects? Ought we not rather like the Samaritan woman to hasten to tell the good news? Common humanity should prevent one of us from concealing the great discovery which grace has enabled us to make.

—Spurgeon.

19. Fear for it is not inconsistent with faith in it.

(2449.) The hearts of God's people have ever been alternating, as St. Paul's did, between faith in the Gospel and fear for the Gospel. Men have asked us, as they asked him, "How can you reconcile the intensity of your faith in the Divinity of your religion with the nervousness of your fear for its success? If your Christianity be a Divine thing, why are you Christians so afraid of the unbelief and godlessness in the world? Why not trust God with His religion? And if you are so much afraid, how can you tell us it is Divine?" The answer to this is a very simple one, and it is one which needs to be remembered in all times of the Church's history; never more than when we are starting a new work for God. We are afraid for the Gospel of Jesus Christ, not because it is not Divine, but because it is. It is just because it is the Gospel of God; it is just because it comes down from heaven to earth that we are afraid for it. The world may be trusted to provide for its own. The product of the world's soil grows naturally, as the weeds or wilder fruit grow. But the Divine teaching, the Divine gift, is not of this world's growth. It is a foreign plant; it is an exotic. It comes from another clime, and it is entrusted to us to tend, to water, to train, to prune; and just because it will not thrive without care or without culture, and because to our trembling hands has been committed the care and culture of the Divine gift, we fear. It is just because the kingdom is not of this earth that we fear for it. It is because it is the ark of God we carry that we tremble, as we put our hands to it, to lift it up and carry it into the battle of our day. The ark shall never perish, but yet the hands that carry it may falter, and for a time let it fall into the hands of its enemies. The Church of Christ shall never perish, but there is no promise that the living branch shall not be scathed here and there by the storm of unbelief and godlessness. The kingdom of Christ shall never perish, but there is no promise that some part of it shall not grievously err from the faith. Thus it is because of the preciousness of the treasure that we hold in earthen vessels, because the treasure is Divine and the vessels earthen and fragile—the potter's vessels it is borne in—that we rejoice and yet tremble as we receive in trust this gift from God.

—Magee.

20. The great hindrance to its progress.

is in it: and its believers are many—perhaps never so numerous as now; and their aggregate resources are immense. It is astonishing, when you consider the amount of learning, and intellectual eloquence, and social influence—it is delightful to recount the various accomplishments and talents which, in one form and another, and within this living age, have been laid at the Saviour's feet. And whilst the Church is numerous and powerful, there is no lack of zeal. There is vitality, and there is energy, and sometimes stupendous exertion; but the misery is that so much of it is zeal misspent—that so much of it is energy devoted to mutual destruction. The elastic vapour which murmurs in the earthquake, or explodes in the mud-volcano, if properly secured and turned on in the right direction, might send the navy of an empire all round the world, or clothe with plenty an industrious realm. And the zeal which has hitherto rumbled in ecclesiastical earthquakes, and left no nobler mementoes than so many steaming cones—so many mud-craters, on the sides of the great controversial Jorullo—if rightly directed, might long before this time have sent the Gospel all over the globe, and covered a rejoicing earth with the fruits of righteousness. The river which Ezekiel saw was a tiny rill when it first escaped from the temple, but a course of a thousand cubits made it ankle-deep, and a few more furlongs saw it a river that he could not pass over—the waters were waters to swim in. And this is the course of the Gospel when Christians do not hinder it. But instead of clearing the common channel, and strengthening the main embankments for its universal and world-gladdening flow, the effort hitherto has been to divert it all into denominational reservoirs. Each one has gone with his spade and his pickaxe—has breached the grand embankment, and tried to tempt the mighty stream into his own more orthodox canal. And the consequence of these sectarian efforts—these poor attempts to monopolise the Gospel—the consequence is, that, like a certain river in the southern hemisphere, which has only been known to reach the ocean once during the last thirty years—betwixt the scorching secularity overhead, and the selfish interruptions of the stream, it is only now and then that the Gospel is allowed to flow far enough to fertilise new territory, and gladden weary souls.

But a day is coming, and in these movements we hail its dawn. Instead of monopolising or dividing the stream—instead of breaking its banks, or interrupting its course—our individual and our united efforts shall hereafter seek to clear its channel and deepen its flow; and the work of our different denominations shall be, not to pierce the bank or dig diverting canals, but each to strengthen the enclosing mounds, and remove the interrupting rocks as it sweeps alongside of their respective territories. Thus acting, thus seeking not our own things, but the things of Jesus Christ, we shall soon behold the little stream which welled up Jerusalem eighteen hundred years ago, holding on in its prosperous course. We shall see life leaping in its sunny ripple, and a joyful world resorting to its genial current; we shall see one flock reposing on its green margin, and besides its still waters One Shepherd leading them. And, best of all, on its teeming brink we shall again behold the long exotic Tree of Life—its laden branches mirrored in the tranquil tide, and showering on the azure amplitudes its leaves of heavenly healing.

II. Its ultimate triumph.

(2451.) At first but a beam of light is seen to glimmer in the midst of the darkness. And the night still seems to hold its undisturbed sway. But the beam becomes slowly a streak of light shooting its way in the path of heaven. It becomes more fixed and determinate in its character; it increases, it is a glowing light. There is a mass of darkness still around, and clouds yet hang about it; but it contends successfully with the darkness, still it penetrates, still it breaks through the hideous mass; the contest is no longer doubtful, and the clouds and shadows flee away. But the rising beam at first so faintly seen, and dimly visible, would have been soon lost and overwhelmed in the darkness which it invaded, if it had not been a beam from an exhaustless fountain of light, the sun, that continued to send forth supplies of strength, by adding beam upon beam. And now it pours out its effulgent rays, and now this dawning beam is become a bright and glorious sun, ascending majestically through the heavens, the mighty creative principle of fruitfulness, ripening, maturing, and enriching the vegetable kingdom, and in its brightness showing forth a faint image of its Maker's glory. In like manner the first manifestation of the Gospel is like that little beam of light. The land which it visits is involved in the deepest shades of darkness. A mental and spiritual midnight rests upon it. But it becomes a growing light, and as it flashes its beams around, it only serves to make more visible the darkness and misery of the benighted inhabitants. What though its enemies deny it to be the true light—and though all the clouds of heathen darkness and superstition overhang its pathway, yet it still contends, and contends successfully, penetrating the foul and hideous mass of corruption around it. And so this little beam would have been long since overwhelmed and swallowed up, if it had not been supplied from the exhaustless fountain of the Sun of Righteousness; if it had not the promise, "Thy light shall no more go down;" yes, and soon this increasing light is destined to ascend the heavens, and fill the whole horizon with its beams. Like the natural sun it shall continue its noble and majestic course till its light shall fall upon every darkened nook of the habitable world, manifesting itself, as it everywhere rolls its course, the mighty creative principle of fruitfulness, enriching the world, civilising it with true knowledge, and making it to flourish everywhere with the fruits of peace, happiness, good will and love to God and man:—a sun that shall never go down, but continue to shine till the light of grace is lost and swallowed up in the more illustrious splendours of the light of glory. —Salter.

GRACE.I. CONSIDERED AS A DIVINE ENERGY WORKING IN THE SOUL.*1. The mode of its operation.

(2452.) Grace does not pluck up by the roots and wholly destroy the natural passions of the mind, because they are distempered by sin. That were an extreme remedy, to cure by killing, and to heal by cutting off. No; but it corrects the distemper in them. It dries not up the main stream of love, but purifies it from the mud it is full of in its wrong course, or calls it to its right channel, by which it may run into happiness, and empty itself in the ocean of goodness. —Lighton, 1681-1684.

2. The transformations it effects.

(2453.) Take a river: Let it be dammed and stopped up, yet if the course of it be natural, if the vent and stream of it be to go downward, at length it will overbear, and ride triumphantly over. Or let water that is sweet be made brackish by the coming in of salt water; yet, if it naturally be sweet, at length it will work it out. So it is with every man. Look what the constant stream of his disposition is, look what the frame of it is; that which is most natural and inward to a man, though it may be dammed up and stopped in such a course for a while, yet it will break through all at the last; and though there be some brackish, some sinful dispositions that may break in upon a man, yet he, by the grace of God, will wear them out, because his natural disposition, the frame of his heart, runs another way. —Preston, 1587-1628.

(2454.) A rough jewel lay in the sand among many common stones. A boy picked up some of these to use them for playthings, and took them home together with the jewel; but he did not know this. The boy's father looked on when he was playing; he perceived the rough jewel, and said to his son, "Give me that stone."

The boy did so, and smiled, for he thought, "What is my father going to do with this stone?"

The father took the stone and polished it skillfully into regular planes and angles, and behold a diamond glittered brilliantly.

"See," said the father, "here is the stone you gave me."

The boy wondered at the splendour and brilliancy of the stone, and exclaimed, "My father, how could you accomplish this?"

The father said, "I knew the hidden virtue, and the value of the stone; therefore I freed it from its coating of dross. Now it sparkles with its natural radiance."

When the boy had increased in years, the father gave him the precious stone, as an emblem of the worth and dignity of life.

—F. A. Krummacher.

3. It cannot be hid.

(2455.) Grace, like fire, cannot be hid; you may as soon conceal musk in your hand as grace in your heart. —Swinnock, 1673.

4. Its fruits are unmistakable.

(2456.) Fruits are infallible evidence of the nature of the tree that brings them forth. Therefore, if these are good, the tree is certainly good, an engrafted tree. If there be fervent desires, pantings, and breathings of the soul after God, delight in the Word and ordinances, love to God and His people, secret goings out of the soul after, and closing with spiritual things, disliking and hating corruptions, and whatsoever is against the mind of God, and opposing of it, with a rising of spirit against it, with zeal and indignation; if there be a secret joy and cheerfulness in the spirit when things go well with the people of God, when holiness and the power of godliness is like to be set up, promoted, and encouraged, and sin suppressed; if the spirit be stirred to pray against the dominion and power of wicked and unregenerate men, not only such as are profane, but also such as are but morally honest, yea though they be accomplished with the utmost of natural and moral endowments, prizing and preferring sincerity and holiness in any person, before all gifts without grace. These fruits (I say) are infallible evidences of a good tree, of a tree engrafted into Christ, and that soul that finds them in itself (if the Spirit of God shine upon them and show them) may as certainly conclude upon the truth of grace there, as if an angel were sent from God to 'tell such a one, that he is beloved of God.

It is as possible in nature for thorns to bring forth grapes, or thistles figs, as for a bad tree (a person out of Christ) to bring forth these fruits. Let not such souls, therefore, so dishonour God, wrong themselves, and gratify Satan, as to question the truth of grace in themselves; but rejoice evermore, because their names are written in heaven. Hereby we know we are translated from death to life, because of these fruits.

—Austen.

8. Its conflicts.

—Caill, 1748-1810.

(2458.) It is the nature of all the works of God's creation to seek, and to go on to, their perfection. The first dawn of morn continues to increase until it shines in the noontide radiance. The feeble plant which is just breaking the clod, continues to grow until in the course of years it stands a flourishing and a stately tree. In the animal kingdom we see God's creatures gradually emerging from the weakness and insignificance of infancy, and rising, where no obstructions exist, into the vigour and maturity of age. And shall the light go on to perfection, the plant and the flower to blossom, the tree to bring forth its fruit; and all God's creatures grow up and flourish each its own perfection—and grace—the immortal plant of grace—"the incorruptible seed," which is to "live and abide for ever."—this little tree of the Lord's own planting—shall this alone be denied the benefits of God's universal law,—let all things grow until the harvest? No! grace has its destined perfection. True grace is a seed which, though sown in a lowly soil, will soon manifest its heavenly origin. It will infallibly spring forth, and be ever aspiring to ascend upwards, until it climbs the skies, and there transplanted, shall bloom in the courts of the Lord for ever.

—Salter.

(2459.) Our old corrupt nature is eventually destined to fall before the power of grace. Its case is that of an ancient castle that had been for days assaulted by the battering-ram. It was long before the stroke of that engine made any sensible impression, but the continual repetition at length communicated a slight tremor to the wall; the next, and the next, and the next blow increased it. Another shock put the whole mass in motion, from the top to the foundation; it bends forward, and is every moment driven farther from the perpendicular, till at last the decisive blow is given, and down it comes. And so must fall the strong tower of corruption. At first it seems to defy the efforts of grace; but by little and little its wall gives way, for "the weapons" in the divine warfare are mighty through God for the pulling down of these strongholds; till at last it shall be shaken to its deep foundations, and fall a glorious ruin for the saint to rejoice over. "We shall be satisfied with His likeness."

—Salter.

II. CONSIDERED AS CHRISTIAN CHARACTER.

1. Its source.

(2460.) As in nature there is one common influence from heaven, but yet variety of flowers, violets, roses, gilliflowers, spices, all sweet in their several kind, with a different kind of sweetness; so all graces have their beginning from the common influences of Christ's Spirit, though they differ one from another; and are all accepted of the "Father of lights," from whence they come.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(2461.) There is never a grace but it is beautiful and fair; for what is grace but the beams of Christ, the Sun of righteousness? —Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(2462.) The sea enters into the rivers before the rivers can run into the sea. In like manner, God comes to us before we go to Him; and heaven enters into our souls before we can enter into heaven.

—Drelincourt, 1666.

2. Adorns the soul.

(2463.) Grace sheds a glory and lustre upon the soul. As the diamond to the ring, so is grace to the soul. A heart beautified with grace hath the King of heaven's picture hung in it.

—Watson, 1696.

3. How it is wrought in the soul.

(2464.) Many pray to be made "men in Christ Jesus," and think in some miraculous way it will be given to them; but God says, "I will try My child, and see if he is sincere," and so He lays a burden upon Him, and says, "Now, stand up under it, for thus you are to grow strong." He sends a provocation, and says to him, "Be patient." He throws him into perplexities, and says, "Where now are thy resources?" If the ambitious ore dreads the furnace, the forge, the anvil, the rasp, and the file, it should never desire to be made a sword. Man is the iron, and God is the smith; and we are always either in the forge or on the anvil. God is shaping us for higher things.

—Beecher.

(2465.) You pray for the graces of faith and hope and love; but prayer alone will not bring them. They must be wrought in you through labour and patience and suffering.

A garden has heard that the royal garden has a fountain, and sends up a petition to the head gardener that it may have a fountain too. He favours the request, and comes with workmen and the necessary implements to make it. The flower beds are torn up, the turf is cut and removed, the earth is thrown out in piles, and the astonished garden exclaims, "What is this? you are killing all my violets and roses." And now the boring commences, down through the quicksands and the surface soil, till a bed of rock is gained. Then, when the severer drilling begins, the terrified garden cries out, "My foundations will be destroyed! I thought I was to have a fountain." A small stream of water appears, but the gardener knows it would not always flow, and so he penetrates the earth yet further, till at last, hundreds of feet below the surface, he reaches unfailling springs. Now the pipes are brought, and when they are adjusted, the earth is thrown back, the stones are removed, the turf is replaced, the ground is swept, and the flowers returned to their beds; and day in and day out the fountain plays, falling into its marble basin with ceaseless shower. The plants revive in its cooling spray, the birds come to sing to its music, and the whole garden rejoices in its beauty.

Now, who is willing that God should bore in his heart for the graces of faith, and hope, and love? You pray for them, but when God begins to work, you cry out, "O Lord I save my flower beds. You are killing all my violets and roses." Yet only through this working are the wells of salvation dug in our hearts, and the living waters made to flow.

—Becher.

(2466.) Every man that has cultivated fruit knows that no tree can bear very rich the first year. The first year a tree bears, the fruit is of the lowest quality; the second year it is a little better; the third year it is still better; the fourth year it is better yet; and it continues to improve every year until the tenth; and then you begin to know what is the best thing that tree can do. Trees have to go through a maturing process of ten years' duration, before they can bear fruit of the highest flavours.

So it is with Christians and Christian graces. You cannot bear high spiritual fruit until the spirit of Christ has dwelt with you, so as to form the very wood and fibre of your life. It is not until you have borne the fruits of Christian life and conduct year after year, that you can bring them forth in their highest state of development.

Besides, there are some things that no mere flush touches, just as low degrees of heat do not affect the roots of some plants. Some plants—for instance, the chick-weed—feel the influence of spring in March. They shake hands with the frost, and say, "How do you do?" to the snow. Others do not feel anything till the next month comes along. As a sleeper, when called, knows that something disturbs him, and begins to turn himself; so the roots of these plants, when April invites them to come forth, know that something is rousing them, and commence to bestir themselves. It is not until June makes its appearance that they begin to lift up their heads; and they are not above the ground before the middle of June. July and August develop the stalk and branches and buds; and September gives us the flower that would not show itself till the whole summer had passed.

So it is in respect to the fruits of the Spirit. Some come quick and early, at the first touches of divine grace; and some not until, through a long summer of experience, the rays of the Sun of righteousness have penetrated the deepest parts of the soul. Then you can gather the most beautiful fruits of Christian life.

—Becher.

4. How it is maintained in the soul.

(2467.) Grace in the saints is not like light in the sun, that springs from itself, but like the light of a lamp that is constantly fed with supplies of oil, otherwise the weak light will faint and die. Inherent grace is maintained by the continual emanations from the Holy Spirit: nay, the habits of grace are drawn forth into active and vigorous exercise, by superabundant exciting grace, without which they would be ineffective and useless. As there cannot be actual sight unless the organs of sight be irradiated by light of the air; so without special assisting grace we cannot do any spiritual good, nor avoid evil: we shall be foiled by every temptation, even the best will leave God, and provoke God to leave them.

—Salter, 1840.

(2468.) There is no greater delusion than the idea that all things are well with us, if we are in a state of grace. The inquiry should be, whether it is grace in operation, grace in living exercise, and daily working in us. It is with grace as it is with fire—it may be in a half lifeless and inert state, and therefore useless. Fire is one of the most active agents in nature with which we are acquainted. You may see it smouldering in the ashes, without any power to burn or emit any heat. Here, though there is undoubtedly fire in the embers, yet in this state it is profitable to no purpose. But let its dying embers be kindled into flame, and it can rend the living rocks, control the mightiest engines, and prove itself to be endowed with the most astonishing power. So grace, which is capable of the greatest things, may be in a dull and torpid state, and effect nothing; and while in this state, the believer is weak as another man. Here is the presence of grace, but it is without its strength, and so far useless. But let him stir up the grace that is in him, and his soul shall be clothed with energies, and endued with a living power that is truly surprising. It is nature now rising out of her native feebleness, a living active thing exhibiting powers hitherto unknown to herself, and capable of passing on to perfection till the believer shall be filled with all the fulness of God.

—Salter.

5. Its development may be hindered.

(2469.) The Holy Spirit, as given to the Church, and to each member of the Church, is not an illumination once for all, or a confirmation once for all, but a germ of, and strength capable of, indefinite development. It is potentially, but only potentially, a revelation of all truth to the intellect, and a communication of all power to the will. It is a growing and expansive force, not a force which exhausts itself in one impulse. In short, it is a seed, not a full-formed flower; and like all seeds, its growth is liable to checks and drawbacks. It is planted in the poor barren soil of the human heart, which by nature engenders weeds only. It shoots up into the climate of a wicked world. And just as, in the world of nature, plants are exposed to blight, which is said to be composed of hosts of minute insects, so in the moral world Grace is apt to be thwarted by the legions of fallen angels, whom the Scriptures speak of as swarming around us on every side, "principalities and powers, and the rulers of the darkness of this world." What wonder if the spiritual development of the saints be often thrown back, and if their best graces be sadly marred by infirmities?

—Goulburn.

6. Weak grace is real grace.

—J. Trapp, 1601-1669.

(2471.) However feeble its commencement, yet is it a reality in the soul of man. If we had rescued some poor struggling creature from the waves, one whom we had watched buffeting with the storm, and had seen sink at last beneath the many waters—if we had brought him to the shore, and yet could mark no evidence of life in him, not a breath stirring, not an eyelid moving, not one single gesture to describe consciousness, but all apparent death—we go on in hope, we use every means, persevere in every remedy, and at last we hear one feeble sigh, we see the eyelash gently move, we see some little change in the features. What conclusion do we draw from it? He lives; he has life; life as real as if he walked and moved; as essentially as if we saw him rise in all the vigour, and strength, and power of health and animation. Look at the dead sinner—there he stands, “dead in trespasses and sins;” nothing moves him; we preach to him the terrors of the law, we speak to him, though dead, just as Ezekiel spake to the dry bones; the mandate goes forth from the eternal God, “Go, My Spirit, and teach his heart; go and enlighten his conscience; go and take away that hard clod that bears upon his affections; go and convey life into his soul.” What is the effect? He begins to feel sin; he begins now to cry out, “God be merciful to me a sinner.” “Lord, save me, or I perish.” We begin now to see him a praying man. “Behold he prayeth.” We find that individual who was “enmity against God, by reason of his wicked works,” now turning to the wall, and calling upon God. We find him now pleading the blood of Christ—looking to Him for mercy to pardon, and grace to sanctify. This is a reality. It is as real as the evil principle is real within him. It is no fancy that he has inherited an evil principle in his heart from the first Adam; so is it no fancy, but a reality, that he hath received a holy principle from the second Adam, communicated to him by the eternal Spirit.

—Salter, 1840.

7. Its relation to glory.

(2472.) The kingdom of grace is nothing but the inchoation or beginning of the kingdom of glory; the kingdom of grace is glory in the seed, and the kingdom of glory is grace in the flower; the kingdom of grace is glory in the daybreak, and the kingdom of glory is grace in the full meridian; the kingdom of grace is glory militant, and the kingdom of glory is grace triumphant. There is such an inseparable connection between these two kingdoms, grace and glory, that there is no passing into the one kingdom but by the other. At Athens there were two temples, a temple of virtue and a temple of honour; and there was no going into the temple of honour, but through the temple of virtue; so the kingdoms of grace and glory are so close joined together, that we cannot go into the kingdom of glory, but through the kingdom of grace. Many people aspire after the kingdom of glory, but never look after grace; but these two, which God hath joined together, may not be put asunder; the kingdom of grace leads to the kingdom of glory.

—Watson, 1696.

GROWTH IN GRACE.

1. IN WHAT IT CONSISTS.

(2473.) Growth in grace doth not always consist in doing of other works for the kind, but in doing the same works over and over again better than before. As now, when one learns to write, when a man hath attained to a great perfection in writing, he doth not make other letters than he made at first; he makes the same letters that he did, only he makes them better and sets them closer.

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

—Goodwin, 1600-1679.

(2475.) I am sure there are too many of us, that have long pretended to be in Christ, who make little or no progress in Christianity, that is, holiness of life; that ever hang hovering in a twilight of grace, and never seriously put ourselves forward into clear daylight, but esteem that glimmering crepusculum which we are in, and like that faint twilight better than broad open day: whereas “the path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day.” I am sure there be many of us, that are perpetual dwarfs in our spiritual stature—like those silly women, that St. Paul speaks of, laden with sins and led away with divers lusts, that are “ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth;” that are not now one jot taller in Christianity than we were many years ago, but have still as sickly, crazy, and unsound a temper of soul as we had long before.

Indeed, we seem to do something; we are always moving and lifting at the stone of corruption that lies upon our hearts, but yet we never stir it notwithstanding, or at least never roll it off from us. We are sometimes a little troubled with the guilt of our sins, and then we think we must thrust our lusts out of our hearts; but afterwards we sprinkle ourselves over with I know not what holy water, and so we are contented to let them still abide quietly within us. We do every day truly confess the same sins; and yet still commit them as much as ever, and lie as deeply under the power of them. We have the same water to pump out in every prayer, and still we let the same leak in again upon us. We make a great deal of noise, and raise a great deal of dust with our feet; but we do not move from off the ground which we had gained; as if religion were nothing else but a dancing up and down upon the same piece of ground, and making several motions and friskings upon it; and not a sober journeying and travelling onwards to a certain place. We do and undo; we do Penelope solam tenere; we weave sometimes a web of holiness, but then we let our lusts come, and undo and unravel all again. Like Sisyphus in the fable, we roll up a mighty stone with much ado, sweating and tugging up the hill; and then we let it go, and tumble down again unto the bottom; and this is our constant work. Like those Danaides, which the poets speak of, we are always filling water into a sieve, by our prayers, duties, and performances, which still runs out as fast as we pour it in.

What is it that thus cheats us, and gulls us out of our religion? that makes us thus constantly to tread the same ring and circle of duties, where we make no progress at all forwards, and the further we go, are still never the nearer to our journey's end.
—Cudworth, 1617-1688.

—Erskine, 1685-1754.

(2477.) Some professors are like the mill-wheel, it goes round, yet still it stands in the same place where it was: they go the round of duties, and morning and evening prayers; and attend Sabbath and week-day sermons, which is well done: but they are at a stand; they are the same now, that they were ten, twenty years ago, if not worse. But, in gathering to Shiloh, the people are made to advance nearer and nearer to heaven, getting more knowledge, more experience, more hatred of sin, more love and likeness to Christ. It is true, the saints themselves have their winter-decays, but they have also their summer-revivings, that set them forward again. And thus the path of the just is as the shining light, which shineth more and more unto a perfect day.
—Erskine, 1685-1754.

(2478.) There may be a continual motion that is not progressive, like that of a door which continually moves on its hinges, yet never removes from its place; but walking in the Spirit imports a progressive motion in a course of spirituality. When persons make still nearer and nearer approaches unto their end, the term of their course; draw nearer and nearer to God; and, as they draw nearer to Him, find a gradual influence of divine light, and life, and power; more discernible impressions of the Divine image; grow more and more into suitableness to Him; are more acquainted with Him, are brought into higher delectations, and to take more complacency in Him; this is walking in the Spirit; when a man's path, as it is said concerning the righteous man, is as the shining light, that shineth more and more, brighter and brighter, unto the perfect day. As you know, the nearer approach we make unto the light of a glorious lucid object the more light we have, still, all along as we go, our way grows more and more lightsome. They do not walk in the Spirit, therefore, who keep moving but move in a circle, or in a round of empty, sapless duties, who keep up the formalities of religion, and no more; but they walk in the Spirit who make a progress, who go forward, who draw nearer and nearer unto God, and become more suitable to, and like Him, and fit for His eternal converse, and for all the present service wherein He calls them.

—Salter, 1840.

II. IS NECESSARY.

1. Because we are born into the Divine life imperfect.

(2479.) God deals in spiritual proceedings, as in natural, to extremes by the mean. We are not born old men; but first an infant, then a man, then old. We are conceived of immortal seed, born of the Spirit, so go on to perfection. There is first a seed, then a plant, then a tree. We get not at one jump into heaven, nor at one stroke kill the enemy.
—Adams, 1653.

(2480.) Who starts up a finished Christian? The very best men come from their graves, like Lazarus, "bound with grave clothes"—not like Jesus, who left the death-dress behind Him; and, alas! in their remaining corruptions, all carry some of these ceremonies about with them, nor drop them but at the gate of heaven.
—Guthrie.

(2481.) The process of being born again is like that which a portrait goes through under the hand of the artist. When a man is converted, he is but the outline sketch of a character which he is to fill up. He first lays in the dead colouring. Then comes the work of laying in the colours; and he goes on, day after day, week after week, month after month, and year after year, blending them, and heightening the effect. It is a life's work; and when he dies he is still laying in and blending the colours, and heightening the effect. And if men suppose the work is done when they are converted, why should we expect anything but lopsided Christian characters?
—Becher.

(2482.) No man is born into the full Christian character, any more than he is born into the character of a man when he comes into the world. A man at conversion is in the state of one who has just come into possession of an old homestead. He has the title, and he can make for himself a beautiful home. But the dust, the dirt, and the cobwebs of years choke all the rooms, and must be cleared away. Many sills and beams are rotten, and must be replaced by new ones. Chambers must be refitted, walls newly plastered, the whole roof must be searched over, and every leak stopped. There must be a thorough cleansing and repair before the mansion is habitable; and when all this is done, 'tis only an empty house that the man has.

The same kind of thing that man is, who has trained himself into freedom from wrong, without having become faithful in right deeds.

Now for a man's house he may buy carpets ready made; but there is no loom that will weave carpets for his heart, except the loom that is in himself. Furniture, beds, chairs, and tables, he may buy for his house, but rest and peace for his soul can only be worked out within his soul, and long labour it often proves. He may purchase paintings, whose voiceless language shall make eloquent his walls, and statues to grace niche and pedestal, and books to fill his many shelves, but the painter, the sculptor, and the publisher, for the man's mental house, are all in his own heart.

—Becher.

2. To prove the sincerity of our profession and the reality of our grace.

(2483.) We are pilgrims and travellers, as we profess, towards our heavenly home, who are still going on, and every day despatch some part of the way. But if we stand at a stay, and after many years spent are no more forward in our journey than we were at our first setting forth, it shows plainly that we are no true travellers, but loiterers, that lazily lie lurking in our ruin, or that we have not gone in the right way that leads to our country.

We would be counted soldiers in the Christian warfare, and profess that we fight against the spiritual enemies of our salvation. But if Satan in every temptation prevails with us; if the world has so allured us by her bewitching baits, that we are in league and love with it; if after many years we have got no conquest over our corruptions, pride, covetousness, voluptuousness, malice, envy, and such like, but that they still reign and rule in us as in former times; it is a sign that we are either none of God's soldiers, seeing we have made a peace with His enemies, or that we are notable cowards, who justly deserve to be cashiered, and that there is little grace or goodness in us, seeing so long time and such large means have so little improved and increased it.

—Downham, 1644.

(2484.) Look where you will in God's book, you shall never find any lively member of God's Church, any true Christian compared to any but a fruitful tree; not to a tall cypress, the emblem of unprofitable honour; nor to the smooth ash, the emblem of unprofitable prelacy, that doth nothing but bear keys; nor to a double-coloured poplar, the emblem of dissimulation; nor to a well-shaded plane, that hath nothing else but form; nor to a hollow maple, nor to a trembling asp; nor to a prickly thorn; nor to the scratching bramble, nor to any plant whatsoever, whose fruit is not useful and beneficial; but to the fruitful vine, the fat olive, the seasonable sapling planted by the rivers of water. Yet it is most true, that the goodly cedars, strong elms, fast-growing willows, sapgy sycamores, and all the rest of the fruitful trees of the earth, i.e., all fashionable and barren professors whatsoever, they may shoot up in height, spread far, show fair, but what are they good for? Yes, they may be fit for the forest, the ditches, the hedge-rows of the world; not for the true saving soil of God's Israel, that is a soil of use and fruit, that is a place for none but vines, for trees of righteousness, fruitful trees, fruitful Christians. He that abideth in Me, bringeth forth much fruit, saith our Saviour (John xv. 5).

—Spencer, 1658.

(2485.) We must increase our talents, enlarge our graces, shoot up in tallness, grow up to this stature. For God's family admits no dwarfs: stunted profession was never sound.

—Adams, 1653.

(2486.) The growth of grace is the best evidence of the truth of it: things that have no life will not grow, a picture will not grow, a stake in the hedge will not grow; but a plant that hath a vegetative life grows.

—Watson, 1696.

(2487.) Where there is life, real, spiritual life, there is also progress in that life. A plant which makes no shoots or growth, is dead or sickly. Even the tree which has reached its full height does not remain as it is, but constantly renews and varies its outward appearance. Thus it is with the kingdom of nature, and so it is with the kingdom of grace. "Be ye therefore renewed in the spirit of your minds." "Though our outward man perish, yet our inward man is renewed day by day."

—Saller.

(2488.) It is only living things that grow; and all living things do grow. Be it the lichen that clings to the rock, or the eagle that has her nest on its craggy shelf, or man that rends its heart with powder and draws the gold from its bowels—from the germ out of which they spring they grow onwards to maturity; in the words of my text, they "increase more and more."

These words are as true of spiritual as of natural life. According to heathen fables, Minerva, the goddess of wisdom and daughter of Jupiter, sprung full-grown and full-armed from her father's head. No man thus comes from the hand of the Holy Spirit, in sudden, mature, perfect saintship. There is nothing in the spiritual world which resembles this: no, nor even what the natural world presents in the development of the insect tribes. During their last and perfect stage, in the condition, as it is called, of the imago, be their life long or short, they undergo no increase. So soon as the green worm that once crawled on the ground and fed on garbage, bursting its coffin-shell, comes forth, a creature with silken wings, to roam in the sunny air, to sleep by night on a bed of flowers, and by day banquet on their nectar, it grows no more—neither larger nor wiser; its flight and faculties being as perfect on the day of what may be called its new birth, as when, touched by early frosts or drowned in rain, it dies. Here, indeed, we have a symbol of the resurrection-body as it shall step from the tomb; in beauty perfect, in growth mature; to undergo henceforth, and through eternal ages, neither change nor decay. It is otherwise with the renewed soul. Before it, in righteousness, and knowledge, and true holiness, stretches a field of illimitable progress—upwards and onwards to what it shall be for ever approaching, yet never reach, the throne of God.

—Guthrie.

3. To preserve us from apostasy.

(2489.) The best remedy against apostasy is growth in goodness. It is a rule in policy that the ambitious man should never stay at any step of preferment until he comes at the top, because it is some security to be in motion. Our ascent to heaven is steep and narrow, and we are safest when we do not stand still; temptation cannot so well take its aim at us.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(2490.) There is no standing at a stay in religion, either we go forward or backward: if faith doth not grow, unbelief will; if heavenly-mindedness doth not grow, covetousness will. A man that doth not increase his stock, diminisheth it; if you do not improve your stock of grace, your stock will decay. The angels on Jacob's ladder were either ascending or descending; if you do not ascend in religion, you descend.

—Watson, 1696.

(2491.) By reason of corruption, we are like the boat in the stream; if we go not forward by the oar, we go backward by the tide; so, if we go not forward by the strength of grace, we will go backward by the strength and power of corruption.

—Erskine, 1685-1754.

(2492.) If an examination of conscience should show that we are not growing in grace, there is but one alternative, which is that we are falling back. An awful truth, but one as infallibly certain as any other phenomenon of our moral state. Neither in mind nor body does man ever "continue in one stay." His body is constantly throwing off old particles of matter, and appropriating new ones. Every breath he breathes, every exertion of his muscles and limbs, every particle of food he swallows, makes some minute change in the bodily framework, so that it is never entirely the same. Of each individual among us it may be said with truth at any given moment, that he is either rising to, or declining from, the prime of life and the maturity of his physical powers. And the mind, no less than the body, is in a continual flux. It, too, has its moral element,—the society in which it lives; it, too, has its nourishment, which it is constantly imbibing,—the influences of the world and the lower nature, or those of the Spirit of God. One or other of those influences is always imperceptibly passing into the mind and effecting a gradual change. And the awful thought is, that if the change is not for the better, it must be for the worse; if the mind is not appropriating the higher, it must be appropriating the lower influences; if there is no growth in grace, there must be a growth in worldliness and sin.

—Goulburn.

4. To qualify us to receive more grace.

—Henry Smith, 1593.

5. To secure God's commendation.

(2494.) A child that stayeth at one stature, and never groweth bigger, is a monster. The ground that prospereth not, and is not fruitful, is cursed. The tree that is barren, and proveth not, is cut down.

—Jewell, 1522-1571.

(2495.) If a man should bind his son apprentice to some science or occupation, and when he had served his time should have to seek his trade, and be never a whit the more his craft's-master in the ending of his years than he was at the beginning, he would think he had lost his time, and complain of the injury of the master or the carelessness of the servant. Or, if a father should put his son to school, and he always should continue on the lowest form, and never get higher, we should judge either great negligence in the master or in the scholar. Behold, such apprentices or such scholars are most of us! The Church of God is the school of Christ, and the best place to learn the science of all sciences. Now, if we have many of us lived long therein, some of us twenty, some thirty, some forty, some fifty years, &c., and some longer, and we no wiser than a child of seven, were it not a great shame for us? What! no forwarder in religion than so? O disgrace! And may we not be condemned of great negligence in the matters of our salvation?

—Atterhol, 1618.

6. To our comfort and joy.

(2496.) When there is no growth in grace, nor in the practice of holy duties, we can take little comfort in such a state. But as it is a grief to parents, when their children grow in age and not in wisdom; and an ill-sign that nature is out of frame and hindered in her course; when in their bodies they stand at a stay, and though they eat, and drink, and sleep, yet do not grow at all in their stature: so have we more just cause to grieve, when after many years we remain children in knowledge, and weaklings in saving grace; and may take it as an ill-sign that there is little grace in us, or some notable impediment which stops and hinders it in its operations, when, having enjoyed for a long time the spiritual food of the Word and sacraments, we grow not up thereby, nor any whit increase in our strength and stature.

—Downname, 1644.

(2497.) If you do not strengthen your grace, you will make way to strengthen your doubts. Though weak grace will carry a man to heaven, it will be just as a small and weak vessel surprised by a shattering storm, which though it may get to the shore, yet with excessive hardships and fears; such will sail through a stormy sea, and have a daily contest with stormy doubts ready to overset their hopes; whereas a stout ship, well rigged, will play with the waves in the midst of a tempest, and at last pass through all difficulties, without many fears, and into its haven.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

7. To bring us to heaven.

(2498.) There is a medium betwixt sin and glory, and that is grace, a royal road, a milky way. walk this way, or expect not this end. God did enough to bring the way to us, who could never else have brought ourselves to the way: would we have Him bring down heaven and glory too? We are in the bondage of sin, as the Israelites were in Egypt; Canaan was theirs, heaven is our promised land; if neither of us fall to walking, nor admit a motion and removal, they through the desert, we through amendment of life, neither can arrive at their home. If thou think thyself too good for this journey, God will think thee too bad for His glory.

—Adams, 1653.

III. WHAT IT IS THAT IS REQUIRED OF US.

—Scriver, 1629-1693.

IV. SHOULD BE EARNESTLY DESIRED

(2500.) Let us not content ourselves with that small measure of grace which we have received, nor rest in those duties which we have already performed, but let us labour to grow daily, and increase in grace and in the Christian practice of a godly life. For as in nature things stand not at a stay, but as weary of the state of imperfection, tend to perfection, growing up therein from one degree to another till they come to the highest—as the grain of corn, taking root in the earth, shoots up into a blade, and then grows to have an ear, and so ripening multiplies itself in its kind; and the little kernel, springing first into a small shoot, and then grows by degrees to a flourishing and fruitful tree—so the growth of grace proceeds from imperfection to one degree of perfection after another until we come into a perfect age in Christ.

And as sick men newly recovered cannot rest contented that they live, but long after their wonted strength, desiring first to sit up; and when they can do this are not satisfied, but desire ability to walk and to recover their stomach and appetite, and then to go abroad; and not so content wish to be freed from faintness, to be restored to their former good habitude, plight, and liking, and, in a word, are never quiet in their desires till they have recovered their perfect health; so we, having been sick unto death, after we are revived and quickened by God's Spirit, must not content ourselves with some first degrees of spiritual life and beginnings of health and strength, but long and labour by all good means, that we may daily increase in them until we attain to them in full perfection.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

V. HOW IT IS TO BE SECURED.

1. By constant contemplation of the character of Christ.

—Scriver, 1629-1693.

2. By a wise use of the means of grace.

(2503.) That we may grow in grace, we need to use the means of grace in their due proportion. Nothing is more common than the almost exclusive use of particular means of growth to the neglect of others. Meditation is good, but where it becomes exclusive it is evil. So outward activity, in labouring for the salvation of men, it is of the highest importance; but let this absorb the Christian; let there be but little time for the soul to pass into the shade and night of retirement, and self-reflection and private communion with God, and the most fruitful branch of piety will wither and die. The Saviour went frequently into solitary places for prayer. He left ministering to thousands, that His own soul might be refreshed in communion with the Father.

Give the soul to any one means of religious growth alone, and it will suffer. Thought of God is a precious means of grace, but exclusive thought of God would turn the brain, and send the mistaken one to an asylum. In times of deep religious interest, persons have lost their reason, and it has been said that religion occasioned it. It was not religion, but an exclusive attention to some one department of religion. The best food we eat, if eaten exclusively, would cause dyspepsia, perhaps death. Hence Christians are always injured when any one thought of duty, or usefulness, or reform of society takes possession of them, to the neglect of other spiritual nourishment or other calls upon their sympathy and assistance.

This excessive use of particular means is adopted very naturally. The Christian, perhaps, has found, on some occasion, great benefit from meditation, and forthwith concludes that this is all he needs. Or he has waked up to see the worth of the soul and the need of direct labour for its salvation, and now he feels that this is the only end of life. This is all natural, but not the less mistaken. When there has been no rain for a long season, and all vegetation is withering and dying, as we see the first shower descend, and mark its effects, we feel, Oh! this is all that is needed; but do we not know that if the shower continues unabated, it will as readily destroy as the burning sun? Christians must grow as plants grow, not by the use of one means alone, but by every means. The plant grows by day and by night, in the sun and in the shade, in the clear sky and in the shower, by means of earth, air, dew, rain. Any one alone will injure and destroy. In combination they will cause the plant to grow in beauty and fruitfulness.

—John Al'Leod.

3. By earnest effort.

(2504.) As the widow's oil increased, not in the vessel, but by pouring out; and as the barley bread in the Gospel multiplied, not in the whole loaf, but by breaking and distributing; and as the grain bringeth increase, not when it lieth on a heap in the garner, but by scattering upon the land; so are these spiritual graces best improved, not by keeping them together, but by distributing them abroad. The talent gathereth nothing in the napkin, unless it be rust and canker; but travelling in the bank, besides the good it doth as it passeth to and fro, it ever returneth home with increase.

—Sanderson, 1587-1662.

(2505.) Growth demands earnestness. No one grows who does not mean to grow. Paul made great progress; but Paul had a great purpose; mark his emphatic language: "This one thing I do." This earnestness of purpose will lead one to watch for every opportunity of growth. It will turn every event, and especially every annoyance of life into a round of the ladder, by which the soul may daily ascend to God. Annoyance—what is annoyance but something permitted by thy Father to discipline thy spirit?

That man will grow in grace who understands the meaning and value of these little but frequent trials of our temper, just as a man may become wealthy by the income of small but constant profits.

Where there is earnestness there will be growth under the most unpromising circumstances. Earnest souls may seldom hear the Gospel. They live in some destitute region; yet they grow. The Church may be dead about them, the pure doctrines of the Gospel may be so encrusted with superstitions and ceremonies as scarcely to be recognised, yet such will grow on the little gleams of light and the little nutriment which may be separated from the gross adulterations; just as you sometimes see a living and growing tree whose roots seem to grasp nothing but rocks. As you see a flower flourishing right by the edge of a glacier—a field of ice. Fenelon, Madame Zuion, A. Kempis, lived the life of God, surrounded by the forms of the Roman Catholic Church. And, no doubt, to-day may be found many of the hidden ones of the Saviour in the midst of that corrupt communion.

The earnest Christian will find nutriment for his piety everywhere. Want of growth will not be for want of material for assimilation, but for want of a principle to assimilate.

—John M'Leod.

(2506.) We are to make efforts to grow. Some men have mooted the strange notion that that peculiar adaptation of the bodies of certain animals to their habits, in which we see the wisdom of their Maker, has resulted from the efforts which they made to adapt themselves to their circumstances—that the heron, for instance, by stretching itself up to preserve its feathers, from the water of the stream or shore where it fishes, got its limbs lengthened into stilts, and acquired also its taper neck by constant and long continued efforts to strike its prey at the bottom of the pool. Any theory more absurd can hardly be imagined. Yet, in the spiritual kingdom, the very wish and effort to be good has, with God's blessing and through operation of the Holy Spirit, a tendency to improve us. In the attempt to be better we grow better, even as the flapping of a nestling's wing, impotent though it be to raise the bird into the air, fits its pinions for future flight; or as the creeping of an infant on the floor prepares its limbs for walking. It is to efforts, not to idleness, to supineness, to sleep, that God promises the blessing—those heavenly aids, without which the arm of a giant, to say nothing of a child in grace, cannot snap the feeblest cord that binds us to earth and sin. God works; and we are to be fellow-workers with Him, that we may "increase more and more."

—Guthrie.

(2507.) Cast a sponge into water, and the fluid filling its empty cells, it swells out before our eyes; increases more and more. There is no effort here, and could be none; for though once a living animal, the sponge is now dead and dry. But it is not as sponges fill with water, nor, to use a Scripture figure often employed, and sometimes misapplied, as Gideon's fleece was filled with dew, that God's people are replenished with His grace. More is needed than simply to bring ourselves in contact with ordinances; to read the Bible; to repair on Sabbath to the church; to sit down in communion seasons at the Lord's table. The babe, for example, is laid in a mother's arms, and in contact with her breast; but is laid there only to die, unless, with slumbering instincts awakened, it fasten, and suck by its own efforts the nourishment provided for it, independent of itself; and there, drawing life from a mother's bosom, it lies in her loving arms, the symbol of him who hangs by faith on Christ, and, fed on the sincere milk of the Word, is nourished up into the likeness and image of God. And after all, this picture conveys but an inadequate idea of what is required of us, in order that we may increase more and more. It is by other and greater efforts than the infant's we are to grow in grace, and get to heaven: for instance, Search the Scriptures—Watch unto prayer—Pray without ceasing—Fight the good fight—Labour for the bread that never perisheth—Give all diligence to make your calling and election sure—Work out your salvation with fear and trembling—See that no man take your crown.

While all our hopes of salvation centre in the cross of Christ, and all our hopes of progress hang on the promised aids of the Holy Spirit, let us therefore exert ourselves to the utmost; reaching forth to higher attainments, and aiming at daily increase in every holy and Christian habit.

—Guthrie.

VI. ITS METHOD.

1. It is gradual.

(2508.) Natural fruit-trees increase by little and little every year, they are not suddenly great and large trees, but they increase by degrees; every year they grow larger every way, by the culture and diligence of the husbandman, and influences of heaven, until they attain their full growth.

This shadows out unto us the state of spiritual fruit-trees in this proposition—that grace in the hearts of believers is not suddenly strong, but strength is gotten by degrees.

—Austen.

(2509.) Perfection comes by leisure, and no excellent thing is done at once. The gourd, which came up in a night, withered in a day; but the plants that live long rise slowly. It is the rising and setting of many suns that ripens the business both of nature and art.

—Adams, 1653.

(2510.) God is the God of order, not of confusion. As, therefore, in natural things He useth to proceed "from one extreme to another by degrees, through the mean; so doth He in spiritual. The sun rises not at once to its highest, from the darkness of midnight; but first sends forth some feeble glimmering of light in the dawning, then looks out with weak and waterish beams, and so by degrees ascends to the midst of heaven. So in the seasons of the year, we are not one day scorched with a summer heat, and on the next frozen with a sudden extremity of cold. But winter comes on softly; first, by cold dews, then hoar frosts, until at last it descends to the hardest weather of all. Such are God's spiritual proceedings. He never brings any man from the estate of sin to the estate of glory, but through the estate of grace. And as for grace, He seldom brings a man from gross wickedness to any eminence of perfection. I will be charitably jealous of those men, who, from notorious lewdness leap at once into a sudden forwardness of profession. Holiness does not, like Jonah's gourd, grow up in a night. I like it better to go on soft and sure, than for a hasty fit to run myself out of wind, and after stand still and breath me.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(2511.) A Christian is not of hasty growth, like a mushroom ; but rather like the oak, which, from a little acorn and a tender plant, advances with an almost imperceptible growth from year to year, till it becomes a broad spreading and deep-rooted tree, and then it stands for ages. The Christian oak shall grow and flourish for ever.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(2512.) The growth of grace in the heart may be compared to the process of polishing metals. First, you have a dark opaque substance, neither possessing nor reflecting light. Presently, as the polisher plies his work, you will see here and there a spark darting out ; then a strong light, till, by and by, it sends back a perfect image of the sun which shines upon it. So the work of grace, if begun in our hearts, must be gradually and continually going on ; and it will not be completed till the image of God can be seen perfectly reflected in us.

—Salter, 1840.

(2513.) Lettuces, radishes, and such like garden crops, are soon out of the ground and ready for the table, a month almost suffices to perfect them ; but an oak requires long centuries to come to the fulness of its growth. Those graces which are most precious and durable will cost us longest to produce ; those good things which spring up hastily may have some transient worth about them, but we cannot look for permanence and value in them. There is no need to deplore the slowness of our spiritual growth, if that which comes of it be of a solid character.

—Spurgeon.

(2514.) The lustre of the glass can be produced in a few minutes by man's agency ; but the radiance of the diamond takes unknown ages to develop in the bowels of the earth, under the subtle action of Nature's most powerful forces. The fair colours of grace are of slow growth. They do not spring up quickly, but are wrought out through long weary days of discipline, as the flower grows a long time in dull uniform greenness, through storm and sunshine, before it is crowned with the rainbow blossom.

—Macmillan.

(2515.) A Christian, just born into the kingdom, is often like a loaf of bread when its materials are just put together. The baker has mixed them, and left the bread to rise. You go to the dough and say, "Are you bread?"—"No," says the dough, "I am not." In an hour you go again and ask, "Are you bread?"—"No, I am not," replies the dough. "I feel a little stirring" (said with a rising of the shoulders) "in me, but I am not bread." In two hours more you try : "Are you bread now?"—"No," is still the reply ; "I'm sponge, but not bread. I'm not baked, nor eaten yet." But by and by, after the baker gives it the final kneading, and it is ready for the oven, when it is baked, it owns that now it is really bread. Yet it has gained no new element since the first mixing. The kingdom of heaven in the heart is like leaven which a woman hid in a measure of meal until the whole was leavened.

—Becher.

(2516.) Young Christians often get discouraged, and think that they bear no fruit, and shall be cut off. They say that Christ promised His disciples that He would dwell in them, and that they shall bear much fruit. Christ did not mean that fruit should come at once, all ripened. Remember to whom He spoke—men who were for years after this getting it through their heads that He was to die for them. It was twenty-five years before the fruit grew upon them that we find clustering in the Epistles ; and then only two or three of them had anything to do out of their own time.

When the gardener looks in the spring to see if the branches of his vine are alive, he is satisfied if he sees the tip of the most tiny bud—he don't call that a dead branch. There was but one of the disciples that seemed much changed for the better during the life of Christ—that was John. He was one of those persons who, soft and velvety outside, have in them a core of granite, who, under a smooth aspect, carry the charge of thunder. He was the one who wanted to call down fire from heaven to burn up the people who had offended his Master. His affections, when not disturbed, were tender and sweet ; but thwarted, he grew bitter as gall. Yet he came at last to that gentleness of character, by which he is now known ; and, after a score of years, grew able to pen those fervent letters, so remarkable for ringing all the changes of love. Indeed John seems to have forgot every word in the language but "love." It is not in one year, nor five, nor ten, that you will ripen.

—Becher.

2. And therefore is frequently imperceptible.

(1.) In its commencement.

(2517.) Nothing is so little as grace at first, and nothing more glorious afterward. Things of greatest perfection are longest in coming to their growth. Man, the perfectest creature, comes to perfection by little and little. Worthless things, as mushrooms and the like, like Jonah's gourd, soon spring up, and soon vanish. A new creature is the most excellent creature. Therefore it grows up by degrees. We see in nature that a mighty oak rises out of an acorn.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(2518.) Grace is compared to a grain of mustard seed, which, though it be very small, yet by degrees it groweth very great. The inclinations and new dispositions which the Spirit of God begetteth to work in the soul, they are then but very weak and slender, scarce (it may be) to be perceived, but afterwards they are more sensible ; it is as corn sowed in the field (our Saviour holds it forth by that similitude) which bringeth forth, "first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear." Corn (we know) springs up at first very small and slender, and scarcely to be distinguished from grass ; so the first springings of grace in some are so small, that they are scarce to be perceived, nor are they easily distinguished from moral virtues.

—Austen.

(2519.) Our conversion is by soft and scarce sensible beginnings, albeit not part after part, yet degree after degree ; in every part by gentle soakings in of goodness, in every degree by maturity and growing up to ripeness. As we cannot see the growing of a tree, yet know that it doth grow by the magnitude of bulk, and branches, and fruits ; so we may perceive our conversion to God, which walking on must confirm.

—Adams, 1653.

(2520.) The progress of holiness is sometimes like the lengthening of daylight, after the days are past the shortest. The difference is for some time imperceptible, but still it is real; and, in due season, becomes undeniably visible.

—Toplady, 1740-1778.

(2521.) Christian experiences usually rise from the smallest beginnings. Great and glowing fires proceed from the merest spark. By the spark the match is set on fire. Soon the blaze of the match is so much more than the spark, that the spark seems almost like nothing. But now the match is touched to the shavings, and the blaze which flashes up from them is so much larger than the blaze of the match, that the match is thrown into the ashes. In a short time the kindling has taken fire, and it burns with so much more power than the shavings, that their little blaze is lost in its greater fire. At length the wood sends up a brilliant flame with which the blaze of the kindling bears no comparison. And by and by large coals fall down upon the hearth, and the whole fireplace glows, and the room is warmed and ruddily lighted.

And so, when men begin their Christian life, it is but a spark. Soon there is kindled in the soul some joy, which is no more than the blaze of a match. This is gradually developed into greater experience; and, at length, the whole being begins to burn and glow with a heavenly fire. Oftentimes men, looking back upon their first Christian experience, and seeing how small it was, say, "I do not believe I was a Christian when I first believed myself converted."

Imagine a tree two hundred years old to look back upon the stages of growth through which it has passed, and to say, "I remember that when I was twenty years old I was only so big. I then thought I was an oak; but when I compare what I am now with what I was then, I see that I was not an oak at all!" What were you then?—moss? a vine? a weed?

Do you not know that the seed-form and the full disclosive form are the same in their nature? Do you not know that one is the legitimate result of the other?

—Becher.

(2.) In its progress.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2523.) This constant progress is not always discernible; saints themselves may have their winter-withering, as well as their summer fruit; and we are not to judge of the growth of a tree by looking to it this day from what it was yesterday; for there may be no sensible alteration; but stay till the spring comes, and then you will discern the flourish and the fruit; yea, let some years pass, and then you may see some sensible growth of the whole tree; so, the children of God are not always to judge of their continued growth, by comparing what they are this day with what they were the former day; or what they are this month with what they were the former month, lest there be no discernible advance; but let them (at least, if they be of any standing in Christ) judge by what they are now from what they were at their first engraftment into Christ, and they will find that they have attained more knowledge of Christ than at first, more experience of His favour, more outpourings of His grace, than they understood before; more insight into the Gospel, more strokes that their corruptions have got, and so more fruit and growth.

(2524.) If the husbandman, disappointed at the delay which ensues before the blade breaks the soil, were to rake away the earth to examine if germination were going on, he would have a poor harvest. He must have "long patience, till he receive the early and the latter rain." The winter frost must mellow the seed lying in the genial bosom of the earth; the rains of spring must swell it, and the suns of summer mature it. So with you. It is the work of a long life to become a Christian. Many, oh! many a time, are we tempted to say, "I make no progress at all. It is only failure after failure. Nothing grows." Now look at the sea when the flood is coming in. Go and stand by the sea-beach, and you will think that the ceaseless flux and reflux is but retrogression equal to the advance. But look again in an hour's time, and the whole ocean has advanced. Every advance has been beyond the last, and every retrograde movement has been an imperceptible trifle less than the last. This is progress; to be estimated at the end of hours, not minutes. And this is Christian progress. Many a fluctuation—many a backward motion with a rush at times so vehement that all seems lost;—but if the eternal work be real, every failure has been a real gain, and the next does not carry us so far back as we were before. Every advance is a real gain, and part of it is never lost. Both when we advance and when we fail, we gain. We are nearer to God than we were. The flood of spirit-life has carried us up higher on the everlasting shores, where the waves of life beat no more, and its fluctuations end, and all is safe at last. "This is the faith and patience of the saints."

—Robertson, 1816-1853.

(2525.) All real growth is very slow, and its actual progress imperceptible. The seed sown on stony ground, which forthwith sprang up, because it had no deepness of earth, proved a failure. Jonah's gourd, which came up in a night, perished also in a night. We never see plants actually growing; we only take notice that they have grown. He who would form a sound judgment of his spiritual progress must throw his eye over long, not short, intervals of time. He must compare the self of this year with the self of last; not the self of to-day with the self of yesterday. Enough, if amid the divers and shifting experiences of the world, and the manifold internal self-communings arising thereupon, that delicate plant, spiritual life, has grappled its fibre a little deeper into the soil than it seemed to have done in an earlier stage of our pilgrimage now fairly past.

—Goulburn.

(2526.) Progress in sanctification may, in fact, be going on when you do not see it; perhaps when it seems going back. Take comfort! "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation." The river may appear flowing away from the sea, when, but turning round the base of some opposing hill, it is pursuing an onward course. The ship may appear to be standing away from the harbour, when, beating up in the face of adverse winds, she is only stretching off on the other tack, and at every tack making progress shoreward, though to others than seamen she seems to lose it. God works in strange, mysterious, silent, unnoticed ways. Silently and slowly the water rises that shall one day on a sudden burst the dyke, and sweep away the obstacles that bar its onward path. Unseen and unnoticed the rains wash away the ground below the stone that shall one day, on a sudden, leap from its seat, and roll to the bottom of the hill. Quietly and slowly the root grows in the fissure that shall one day on a sudden split the rock, and reveal its long-continued, silent, secret, but mighty power. In a deep, growing sense of the evil of sin, produced perhaps by our very fall; in deeper humility, in a lower view of ourselves, in greater self-abasement; in a more entire dependence on Christ for righteousness, and on the Holy Spirit for the work of grace; in feelings that fill us with pain and regret and godly sorrow, making us eat our passover with bitter herbs, the work of sanctification may be going on. Like a patient who, through the power of returning life, begins to feel and complain of his pains, when we think we are growing worse we may actually be growing better, and making no little progress when we seem to be making none. Be not cast down! Progression is the ordinary law of God's government. It is star by star that the hosts of night march out; it is minute by minute that morn's grey dawn brightens up into perfect day; it is ring by ring that the oak grows into the monarch of the forest; it is inch by inch, and foot by foot, that the tide, which bears navies on its bosom, comes creeping in on the shore. And, not like justification an act, our sanctification being a work of God's free grace, is under the same law of progress. More or less rapid, it is a thing of steps and stages. Therefore, while praying earnestly and working diligently, live hopefully and wait patiently. He will perfect that which concerneth us; and one day bring forth the headstone with "shoutings of Grace, grace unto it."

—Guthrie.

3. It is intermittent.

(2527.) There is no visible difference, as unto light, between the light of the morning and the sunlight of the evening; yea, this latter sometimes, from gleams of the setting sun, seems to be more glorious than the other. But herein they differ; the first goes on gradually unto more light until it comes to perfection; the other gradually gives place unto darkness until it comes to be midnight. So is it as unto the light of the just and of the hypocrite, and so is it as unto their paths. And, by the way, this comparing of the just unto the morning light reminds me of what I have seen more than once. That light has sometimes cheerfully appeared unto the world, when, after a little season, by reason of clouds, tempests, and storms, it has given place again to darkness, like that of the night; but it has not so been lost and buried like the evening light. After a while it has recovered itself unto greater lustre than before, manifesting that it increased in itself while it was eclipsed as to us. So has it been with not a few at their first conversion unto God; great darkness and trouble have, by the efficacy of temptation and injections of Satan, possessed their minds; but the grace which they have received, being as the morning light, has after a while disentangled itself and given evidence that it was so far from being extinguished; as that it grew and thrived under all those clouds and darkness; for the light of the just increases by temptations, as that of the hypocrite is constantly impaired by them.

—Owen, 1616-1683.

(2528.) There may be progress as a whole, though there may not be continuous progress, stage by stage. On some days the plants grow rapidly; on other days they do not advance at all. But very often while the plant itself is not growing visibly as measured by a scale, it may be striking deeper its roots; it may be collecting and husbanding or sowing the elements of growth, and so preparing for mightier future efforts the secret sap that is its vitality and its power. The tide does not rush up to its accustomed mark at once. It advances so many yards one way; it retires a little; and seems as if it repented of its approach to the land, and wished to retreat again to the secret and silent depths of the sea. But if we wait a little, another wave comes with more majestic and onward sweep; and in the course of six hours we find there has been on the whole, though not at every minute of the six hours, progress towards the shore. Many a Christian who thinks he is not growing at all, may be growing in the most important sense of the word. He that is growing more acquainted with the weakness, and the sinfulness, and the waywardness of his own heart, is no doubt thinking that he is going back, but he may be really making preparation for going forward in the noblest sense of that word. We may be growing downwards in lowly humility, not less important in its place than growing upwards in conformity to the Lord Jesus Christ.

—Cumming.

(2529.) As an illustration of this law in the kingdom of grace, consider the movement of the tide when it is coming in. It is movement upon the whole. The water is sure to cover that dry beach in two or three hours' time, and to float that stranded sea-weed; but it is not a movement without relapses. Each wave, I suppose, gains a little ground, but each wave falls back as soon as it has plashed upon the shore. Even so in the Christian life, there may be a forward movement on the whole, consistently with many relapses, though this assertion requires to be guarded by the observation that the relapses must be such as proceed from infirmity, and not from malice prepense. Deliberate, habitual sin, cannot possibly consist with spiritual growth; but the shaking of a man's steadfastness by a sudden tornado of temptation (which was St. Peter's case) may do so. The great question is whether, after every such fall, the will recovers its spring and elasticity, and makes a fresh start with new and more fervent prayer and resolve. Indeed the making many fresh starts after relapses of infirmity is a hopeful sign of growth. In order to any great attainment in spiritual life, there must be an indomitable resolve to try and try again, and still to begin anew amidst much failure and discouragement. On warm dewy mornings in the spring, vegetation makes a shoot; and when we rise, and throw open the window, we mark that the May is blossoming in the hedgerows. And those periods when a man can say, "I lost myself sadly yesterday in temper or in talk ; but I know that my crucified Lord took upon Him those sins and answered for them, and to-day I will earnestly strive against them in the strength of His Spirit invoked into my soul by earnest prayer ; " these are warm dewy mornings of the soul, when the spiritual life within us sprouts and blossoms apace. —Goulburn.

(2530.) But there is, over and above the law of rest and activity, a law of periodicity in Christian growth. It is not ordinarily given to men to make a steady and uniform development. Men grow as nature grows, by fits and starts.

I have around my little cabin in the country a dozen or so of rhododendrons. Broad-leaved fellows they are. I love them in blossom, and I love them out of blossom. They make me think of many Christians. They are like some that are in this church. Usually they come up in the spring and blossom the first thing, just as many persons come into Christian life. The whole growth of the plants is crowded into two or three weeks, and they develop with wonderful rapidity ; but after that they will not grow another inch during the whole summer. What do they do ? I do not know exactly ; they never told me ; but I suspect that they are organising inwardly, and rendering permanent that which they have gained. What they have added to growth in the spring they take the rest of the season to solidify, to consolidate, to perfect, by chemical evolutions ; and when autumn comes, the year's increase is so tough that when the tender plants that laughed at these, and chided them, and accused them of being lazy, are laid low by the frost, there stand my rhododendrons, holding out their green leaves, and saying to November and December, " I am here as well as you." And they are as green to-day as they were before the winter set in.

Now, I like Christians that grow fast this spring, and hold on through the summer, and next spring grow again. I like Christians that, having grown for a time, stop and organise what they have gained, and then start again. I like periodicity in Christian growth. And that reproach which Christians so often heap upon themselves and each other, because they are not constant and steady in their development, frequently arises from a want of knowledge of the means by which God builds up human character. —Becher.

4. It is sectional.

(2531.) The Spirit of God appears not in all graces at once, it appears sometime or other in some one grace. We see in plants, the virtue of them appears diversely. In winter the virtue of them lies in the root ; in the spring-time, in the bud and the leaf ; in the summer, in the fruit ; it is not in all parts alike. So it is with the Spirit. As it is an " earnest," it appears not in all graces in a flourishing manner at the first. Sometimes it appears in the root, in humility, sometimes in faith, sometimes in love, sometimes in one grace, sometimes in another. —Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(2532.) As the work advances, though the affections are not left out, yet it seems to be carried on principally in the understanding. The old Christian has more solid, judicious, and connected views of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the glories of His person and redeeming love ; hence his hope is more established, his dependence more simple, and his peace and strength, ceteris paribus, more abiding and uniform, than in the case of a young convert ; but the latter has, for the most part, the advantage in point of sensible fervency. A tree is most valuable when laden with ripe fruit ; but it has a peculiar beauty when in blossom.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

5. Yet it is continuous.

(2533.) We must not be like meteors, which soon after their first beginnings make the greatest show ; nor like a fire of thorns, which as soon as it is kindled gives the fairest blaze, and makes the most noise and crackling ; both which decrease by little and little, till they disappear and are wholly extinguished ; but like the morning light, which shineth more and more unto perfect day. We must not be like mushrooms, which come to their perfection in one night's growth ; but trees of righteousness of God's planting, which are still in growth, and bring forth most fruit in old age. We must not resemble summer fruits, which are soon ripe and soon rotten, and best of taste when first gathered ; but winter fruits and long lasters, which are a great while in coming to their perfection, and relish best, and give wholesomest nourishment in their latter end.

—Downham, 1644.

(2534.) The growth of a believer is not like a mushroom, but like an oak, which increases slowly indeed, but surely. Many suns, showers, and frosts, pass upon it before it comes to perfection ; and in winter, when it seems dead, it is gathering strength at the root ! —Newton, 1725-1807.

(2535.) Observe the daybreak. At first but a beam of light is seen to glimmer in the midst of the darkness, and the night still seems to hold its undisturbed sway. But the beam becomes slowly a streak of light shooting its ray in the path of heaven. It becomes more fixed and determinate in its character—it increases—it is a growing light. There is a mass of darkness yet around, and clouds still hang about it—but it contends successfully with the darkness, still it penetrates—still it breaks through the hideous mass—the contest is no longer doubtful, the clouds and shadows flee away. But this rising beam, at first so faintly seen and dimly visible, would have been soon lost and overwhelmed in the darkness which it invaded, if it had not been a beam from an exhaustless fountain of light, the sun, that continued to send fresh supplies of light by adding beam upon beam. And now it pours out its effulgent rays, and now this dawning beam is become a bright and glorious sun, ascending majestically the heavens, the mighty creative principle of fruitfulness, ripening, maturing, and enriching the earth, and in its brightness showing forth a faint image of its Maker's glory. Striking emblem of the believer's progress ! At first spiritually dead, midnight rests upon his soul ; but he awakes at the voice of Him who cries, " Awake, thou that sleepest," &c. And there is light in his soul ! It is a beam from the Eternal Spirit, flashing conviction of his sinfulness, and only serving to make visible to him the darkness and misery of his benighted state. But it leads him on, through many perplexities, in his inquiry how he shall find peace with God. " His feet stumble on the dark mountains," and his little light appears often in danger of being totally eclipsed. But it is like the smoking flax which shall not be quenched. And he has learned to distinguish it at last as the true light; and that which was but a beam becomes a light shining in darkness; and as he continues to follow it, it at last guides him to the cross, and he is enabled steadily to gaze upon Him who is the Light of the world. From Christ, who was raised from that cross with power, he receives "grace for grace." And now behold him; "looking unto Jesus, he runs the race that is set before him, casting off every weight," and "like the sun when he goeth forth in his strength." Now he causes his light to shine out, and men beholding his good works, God is glorified. He is the cause of fruitfulness to others, and reflects his Maker's image in the beauty of holiness.

—Salter.

(2536.) The spiritual kingdom within you comes not "by observation." It is a growth; so that you must not look for violent or sudden changes in yourself. Remember that the waters of the stream, however slowly they may at times appear to move, yet, by never stopping on their journey, are sure to reach the great sea. Let your progress towards godliness be like that of the gentle stream which never murmurs nor chafes nor dashes against its banks, but keeps overflowing on and on, until it fulfils the task which God has set it, and loses its own littleness by mingling with the mighty waters.

—A. Hare.

(2537.) It is not by fits and starts that men become holy. It is not occasional, but continuous, prolonged, and life-long efforts that are required; to be daily at it; always at it; resting but to renew the work; falling but to rise again. It is not by a few, rough, spasmodic blows of the hammer, that a graceful statue is brought out of the marble block, but by the labour of continuous days, and many delicate touches of the sculptor's chisel. It is not a sudden gush of water, the roaring torrent of a summer flood, but a continuous flow, that wears the rock, and a constant dropping that hollows out the stone. It is not with a rush and a spring that we are to reach Christ's character, attain to perfect saintship; but step by step, foot by foot, hand over hand, we are slowly and often painfully to mount the ladder that rests on earth, and rises to heaven.

—Guthrie.

(2538.) We are to increase constantly. This idea is embodied in all those figures under which our spiritual life is set forth in the Word of God.

Is it a seed? So soon as the seed is quickened in the soil it grows; grows by night and by day; grows beneath the foot that tramples on it; piercing the rugged clod, turning and twining to round the corner of a stone, it shoots its way upward, till it emerges into the blessed light, and drinks the dews of heaven; and under their influences, on and ever on it grows, rises and ripens, till sickles flash, and reapers sing where winter howled over dead fields of snow.

Is it the day? From the first faint streak of light that our eye catches in the eastern horizon, how steadily it grows! hill and dale, town and hamlet, woods and winding river, shore and sea, becoming more and more distinct; one star disappearing after another in the grey sky; the fleecy clouds changing into opal, and amber, and purple, and burning gold, until the sun springs up, flaming from his ocean bed; and the daisies open their golden eyes, and the birds sing for joy, and the waves flash and dance in light, and the earth rejoices in perfect day.

Is it human life? Hanging on a mother's bosom; sleeping, and by and by with wakening intelligence smiling in her arms; on little feet balancing itself so beautifully; trying its first tottering steps; speaking its first stammering words; its affections and faculties opening like the petals of a flower, how does the infant develop itself with each successive year! Infancy growing into prattling childhood; childhood into blooming youth; youth into ripened manhood, till the hand that once played with coral and bells, yonder amid royal pageant, and the blare of trumpets, and the boom of cannon, waves the sceptre of empire over an acclaiming throng—or till the voice that was once but a feeble wail, commands on the reeling deck, or amid the roar of battle; here stirs the deepest passions, or there stills the tumults of the people.

Such is the way that we should grow; should pray, should labour, and should strive to grow. Slow and silent, growth is a thing which you neither see nor hear; yet mark in these cases what its steady, constant progress achieves in the natural world. Should it do less in the spiritual? Is God less omnipotent in grace than nature? By no means. "My grace," He says, "is sufficient for thee;" sufficient for that. Would we rise every morning both to get and to do some good; to cultivate some grace and mortify some sin; to live more holily than yesterday—not to say its bad words, nor indulge its bad wishes, nor repeat its bad deeds; to learn from the experience of the past where we should watch, which is our weak side, what are our besetting sins, taking such precautions as a man who strengthens the dyke where the last flood broke through, or doubles his sentries where the enemy last surprised him—what progress we should make! we should be a stage nearer heaven every day. If not every day, every year, at least, would present a palpable, sensible difference. It is not, but it should be, as easy to tell how long it is since we were born the second time, as the first; our spiritual as our natural age; the years of our new life as those of a tree which we count by the rings that every season adds to its circumference.

—Guthrie.

6. It is cumulative in its rate.

(2539.) Even the tired horse, when he comes near home, mends his pace; be good always, without weariness, but best at last; that the nearer thou comest to the end of thy days, the nearer thou mayest be to the end of thy hopes, the salvation of thy soul.

—Adams, 1653.

(2540.) In natural motions the nearer anything comes to its end the swifter it moves. I have seen great rivers, which at their first rising might be covered with a bushel, which after many miles fill a very broad channel, and, drawing near to the sea do even make a little sea in their own banks. So the wind, at the first rising as a little vapour from the crannies of the earth, and passing forward about the earth, the further it goes the more blustering and violent it waxes. A Christian's motion, after he is regenerate, is made natural to God-ward; and, therefore, the nearer he comes to Heaven the more zealous he is. A good man must not be like Ezekiel's sun, that went backward; nor like Joshua's sun, that stood still; but like David's sun, that, like a bridegroom, comes out of his chamber, and as a champion rejoices to run his race. Only herein is the difference, that when he comes to his high noon, he declineth not.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(2541.) Every living fruit-tree is in some measure fruitful; though some bring forth more fruit, some less, yet all bring forth some. All living Christians are thriving and bearing fruit; though some are more eminent for growth and proficiency in grace, yet all bring forth "fruits meet for repentance." The hypocrite, like a dead stake in a hedge, continues at a stay, is without good fruit, nay, grows more rotten every month; but the true saint, like the living tree, the longer he continues rooted in Christ the more abundant he is in the work of the Lord.

—Swinmoke, 1673.

(2542.) The more grace thou hast, the easier it will be to add to it; as a little learning is got with more difficulty by a young scholar than a great deal afterward.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2543.) As rivers, the nearer they come to the ocean whither they tend, the more they increase their waters and speed their streams; so will grace flow more fully and freely in its near approaches to the ocean of glory.

—Owen, 1616-1683.

(2544.) It is with the believer under the influences of the Spirit as with fruit ripening beneath the genial influence of heaven's dews and sunbeams. Hard at first, it grows soft; sour at first, its juices become sweet; green at first, it assumes in time a rich and mellow colour; at first adhering tenaciously to the tree, when it becomes ripe, it is ready to drop at the slightest touch. So with the man who is ripening for heaven. His affections and temper grows sweet, soft, mellow, loose from earth and earthly things. He comes away readily to the hand of death, and leaves the world with a wrench.

—Guthrie.

VII. SHOULD BE SYMMETRICAL.

(2545.) To grow in grace is to grow not only in one grace but in all graces. It is the harmonious development of an entire Christian character; as in the healthful growth of a tree, there will be not only growth of roots, but of stock, branches, leaves, and fruit.

—John M'Leod.

(2546.) Some saints are remarkable for having one grace in peculiar prominence—faith, for instance; or resignation; or courage; or zeal; or benevolence. Yet though this peculiarity may draw most eyes upon them, and win them most praise, if not "in all the churches," in their neighbourhood, or even in their nation, these are not the most perfect specimens of Christianity. For it is with men as with trees, amongst which the least symmetrical may be the most noticeable. The more perfect the shape of the tree, the more symmetrical the proportion between its trunk and branches, between its height and width, it strikes the eye the less; and it is only on a near approach and closer scrutiny that we take in its size, and gaze with wonder on its towering form and enormous girth.

The finest specimen of a Christian is he in whom all the graces, like the strings of an angel's harp, are in the most perfect harmony. Therefore, we are to beware of cultivating one grace or attending to any one duty at the expense of others. The head, the heart, and the hand, doctrine, devotion, and work, should each have their due share of our time and attention; we working on our life like the ancient sculptor on the dead marble, when he produced forms where each feature was not only beautiful in itself, but in perfect proportion also to every other. On this account these statues of his divinities are the admiration of all ages, being the perfect models of men and women. Even so, it is by growing equally in the knowledge, and the love, and the life of Christ, that we are to reach the true model of a Christian; and, to use Paul's words, "grow into a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ."

—Guthrie.

VIII. HINDRANCES TO IT.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(2548.) It is made a matter of surprise that many professors are so unfruitful amidst so much seeming diligence in spiritual things. You go into a garden and behold a stately fruit-tree spreading its branches, and covered with abundant blossom, and conclude that in the fall of the year it will be loaded with fruit. Some months after, you again see the tree, expecting fruit on it, and you are surprised to find none. On looking closer into it, you see the remains of a blight, which explains the matter. It is so with many a professor in the Church. He stands as a tree in the vineyard, and he is diligent in the use of all the public ordinances; he bears the blossoms of an abundant promise, but months and years roll away, and yet there is no real fruitfulness; he is a barren tree, though covered thickly with the leaves and blossoms of profession. How is this? Look narrowly, and you will find a blight has come upon the man, and destroyed all chance of fruit. One is blighted with impenitence, another with pride or uncharitableness, a third with worldliness or covetousness: it is this which mars the growth of grace, and this explains the seeming mystery.

—Saller, 1840.

(2549.) It is more than likely, if we are hanging back in the Christian course, either that we are not surrendering our wills honestly and unreservedly to God, to be and to do as He bids us, and virtually saying, "I will not work at all, because it is God that worketh in me;" or, secondly, that, from a mistake as to the nature of sanctification, we are really looking to our own miserable efforts to sanctify us—putting a round of ordinances, and duties, and performances, into the place of the Lord Jesus, and virtually saying, "It is I who work in myself, both to will and to do of God's good pleasure."

By way of illustrating these contrary errors more clearly, let us imagine the case of a patient placed under a physician of most eminent skill, who has closely studied similar cases, and heretofore infallibly restored them by his treatment—making no progress. Recovery seems to be, on the whole, as far off as when he first consulted the physician, and even if one day there seems to be a little improvement, the next day the hopes to which that improvement gave rise, are thrown back; if symptoms are somewhat repressed, there is every reason to believe that the malady is still there. Now, supposing the physician's skill to be abundantly competent to a radical cure, it is evident that the non-recovery must spring from the patient's never having fairly surrendered himself into the physician's hands. And this want of an entire surrender may take one of two forms. Either the patient may not implicitly follow the physician's orders; or, not having a full trust in him, and being persuaded of the efficacy of certain other systems of medicine, he may be giving those systems a trial side by side with the course which physicians prescribe, and thereby nullifying the efficacy of that course. The not following the physician's prescriptions, or the following his own theories as well, both may equally defeat his recovery.

—Goulburn.

(2550.) What are the conditions, which alone could frustrate the progress upon a river of a strong man and an expert rower, placed in a good and swift boat, and furnished with oars? Such an one might either not use the oars at all, or use only one of them; and the result in each case would be practically much the same. In both cases the boat would drift with the stream; and the only difference would be, that when one oar was vigorously applied, the boat, in addition to drifting, would move round and round in a circle, and might perhaps for a while mock the rower by the semblance of progress. In spiritual things there are those who are utterly careless, and godless—dead alike to the claims of religion, and to its hopes. These are they who, launched upon the stream of life, quietly drift down it, giving no thought to the life which is to come after, and seeking only to gather the few perishable flowers which grow upon the brink. And, among persons of more serious mind, there are those who are willing indeed that Christ should do all for them, but have never surrendered themselves to Him to be and do all that He requires. And there are those, on the other hand, who have surrendered the will to Christ, and are making efforts to obey Him; but because they perceive not this simple truth, that they cannot sanctify themselves, that sanctification from first to last, like justification, must be wrought for us by Him—are constantly met by failures and disappointments, which a simple trust in Him to do all for them can alone remedy. Both these last are they who are rowing with one oar, moving indeed, but moving in a circle, and coming round always to the same point from which they started—deluding themselves for a while by the very fact of their motion, with the idea that they are progressing, and often bitterly complaining, as soon as they are undeceived, that they are making no way. And finally, there are those who are equally well contented to give all to Christ which they have to give (that is, their will), and to take all from Him which He has to give, sanctification, and wisdom, as well as righteousness—who in one and the same act of faith have renounced both self-will and self-trust. These are they who are rowing with two oars, and so realising a true progress towards that haven where they would be.

Show me a man who is both giving to Christ all he has to give, that is, his will, and at the same time taking from Christ all Christ has to give, which is a perfect salvation from sin's guilt, power, and consequences; or, as the Apostle expresses it, "wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption;" and I will show you a man who is growing in grace, and advancing daily in meetness for the inheritance of the saints in light. And if we find ourselves not thus growing and advancing, and yet are certainly well-disposed persons of some seriousness of mind, it is, no doubt, that we are endeavouring to push the boat forward with only one of the oars, to reach that holiness without which no man shall see the Lord, with trust in Christ alone, or with self-surrender alone. Apply the other oar simultaneously, and the bark shall at once begin to cleave the water, as an arrow cleaves the air, straight forward.

—Goulburn.

IX. PROOFS OF ITS REALITY.

1. Increasing spiritual discernment.

(2551.) The first sign of our growing, is when we are got beyond our former measures of grace: a sign a child thrives, when he hath outgrown his clothes, his clothes are too little for him. That knowledge which would serve us before, will not serve us now; we have a deeper insight into religion, our light is clearer, our spark of love is increased into a flame; there is a sign of growth. That competency of grace we once had, is too scanty for us; we have outgrown ourselves.

—Watson, 1696.

(2552.) Growth in grace, moreover, is accompanied by increasing spiritual discernment. Thus the advancing Christian grows more and more alive to the requirements of the Divine law, and the sole ability of Jesus Christ to meet those requirements. Just as the chamber which, through the deceptive twilight, while the shadows were clinging and hovering dimly in every corner, appeared to be swept, and cleaned, and garnished, no sooner grows pervaded by the strengthening and honest beam of day, than the choking dust, lying thick upon each article, is visible, and the unsightly cobweb is seen weaved over every crevice;—so do the chambers of the Christian's imagery, which seemed to be pure and comely by a merely moral light, look polluted and defiled under the searching glare of the candle of spiritual heart-searching, until all other images, like shattered Dagons, are expelled, and the image of Christ crucified is shined there alone.

—Mursell.

2. More successful resistance to temptation.

(2553.) Another sign of this spiritual progress will be apparent in increasing steadiness and success in the resistance of temptation.

In most instances resistance is the measure of force. The sea-wall which will not shake or shatter before the interminable squadrons of plumed waves which are marshalled against it, but which hurls them back all scattered into spume, and proudly waits another billowy charge, gives proof of its strength, and shows that it was a cunning mason who knit the work together. The phalanx which sustains the rush of legion after legion, led on by martial generals, but which will not draw back its foot, and fills up with more proud breast the gaps which the sword has thinned ; such a band shows strength, and testifies to the moral discipline of its generalship. And so, the more steady the Christian's resistance to the attacks of temptation and the assaults of sin the greater is the power of Divine grace in the soul. The natural man makes no stand. He rather goes over to the enemy. There is affinity in sin, not repugnance. Neither does the converted man, all at once, attain the full power of resistance, because he cannot, all at once, learn to look entirely to, and lean entirely on Jesus. The young conscript will often show more apparent zeal against sin than the advanced Christian ; but it is often the mere novelty of the position which inspires him—it is passion rather than principle which governs him. But it is the force of deep-seated principle which causes the hands of the veteran to war, and his fingers to fight. The old soldier does not battle the less valiantly when the enemy is before him, because he does not brandish his sword so swaggeringly on parade. It is purpose, and not impulse, by which the old soldier is guided. And it is the veteran, not the recruit, who makes the fewest relapses, is most seldom disgraced by a repulse, and who gains the more frequent and most signal victories.

—Mursell.

3. Greater patience under affliction.

(2554.) Growth of faith is judged by strength. We can do that now which we could not do before. When one is man-grown, he can do that which he could not do when he was a child ; he can carry a heavier burden : so thou canst bear crosses with more patience.

—Watson, 1696.

4. A more exact performance of duty.

(2555.) The more exact and accurate a man is in duty the more he grows in grace ; and the more he grows in grace the more exact and accurate he grows in his duty. He that writes better than he did before does not write more paper or make more letters, only he writes more exactly and accurately. So the Christian does not perform more duties than he did before, but the same more exactly.

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

5. Increased delight in duty.

(2556.) Growth of faith is seen by doing duties in a more spiritual manner, viz., with fervency ; we put coals to the incense, from a principle of love to God. When an apple hath done growing in bigness, it grows in sweetness ; thou dost duties in love, and now art sweeter, and come off with a better relish.

—Watson, 1696.

(2557.) It ought to grow more and more easy to Christians to do right, until at last the acts that were sore self-denial become a pleasure.

When this has come to pass do not be frightened, and begin to doubt your piety. Be glad and grateful, for your graces are growing ripe.

What was once sour and bitter has become sweet and agreeable.

When you first entered the Christian path, you found it hard to do those things as conscience commanded, and you were often tempted to cry out, "Thy paths are not the paths of peace, O God !"

You were as children who, hearing their father discourse of the rare and luscious apples that his orchard yielded, straightway ran thither, expecting, though it was in the early summer, to be able to judge of the flavour of the fruit. Biting into it, they cry with wry features, spitting and casting the apples to the ground, "Is this the perfumed, saccharine flavour our father talks of? We want no more of it."

The miser, when converted, finds that he must be a miser no more. He sees, perhaps, that duty requires him to give fifty dollars to a poor man. He wishes that twenty-five would do ; but it won't do. He knows that. He puts his hand into his pocket and—considers. He tries to go away without giving the sum.

"Do it—do it," growls conscience from within.

The man casts down the money hastily and runs away.

That was a victory, but a hard and painful one ; and the miser finds himself put through years of just such discipline, until at last he is a miser no more.

Giving has become a blessing and a pleasure to his heart. Shall he now say, dolefully, "I year I am not a true Christian. I cannot see that I carry any cross, or deny myself any, as once I did. Why, I remember when it was like crucifixion to give away five dollars. But I overcame nature and gave it, and then I had sure evidence that the root of the matter was in me. But now—oh ! I'm so much at ease now, something must certainly be wrong—nothing seems to try me."

Why, man, your graces are growing fully ripe.

—Becker.

6. A diminishing aversion from death.

(2558.) Maturity in grace makes us willing to part with worldly goods ; the green apple needs a sharp twist to separate it from the bough, but the ripe fruit parts readily from the wood. Maturity in grace makes it easier to part with life itself ; the unripe pear is scarcely beaten down with much labour, while its mellow companion drops readily into the hand with the slightest shake. Rest assured that love to the things of this life, and clearing to this present state, are sure indications of immaturity in the divine life.

—Spurgeon.

(2559.) The sixth and last sign of this growth which we notice, is a deepened composure in anticipating death and eternity. The unregenerate man may, and perhaps does, sometimes think of death without misgiving. He may so persuade himself that it is the common lot, and that what every one has to submit to cannot, after all, be such a fearful and formidable thing, that he actually encounters it without dismay ; but this is the anticipation of a stolid and unrealising apathy ; it is the braggart confidence of self-complacency or self-sufficiency.

But the Christian anticipates death and eternity with a complacency which he derives from Him who hath abolished death and illumed eternity. He does not sullenly, though quietly, submit to death as an inexorable intruder who will not be denied, simply because he has no alternative except submission ; but he hails the monster as a liberator who comes to dischain a captive thirsting to be free. He has a welcome for the last enemy—a welcome which springs right from his heart. Talk to him of death, and you talk to him of liberty ; you tell him of one who strikes off the dungeon bars, and unclasps the detaining gyves. He knows that what is sown cannot be quickened except it die ; and with the anticipation pulses of that quickening already throbbing in his soul, he cries, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" He fraternises with death because it manumits him, and gives him freedom to go to Christ, which is far better. He knows that if he would be with Jesus he must follow Him even through the tomb; and with the pleasure of eternal union with Him in view, he is not only "ready to be offered," but he "has a desire to depart." —Mursell.

X. ITS REWARDS.

(2560.) The growth of grace will hinder the growth of corruption. The more health grows, the more the distempers of the body abate: so it is in spirituals; the more humility grows, the more the swelling of pride is assuaged; the more purity of heart grows, the more the fire of lust is abated. The growth of flowers in the garden doth not hinder the growing of weeds; but the growing of this flower of grace hinders the sprouting of corruption. As some plants have an antipathy, and will not thrive if they grow near together, as the vine and the bay-tree; so, where grace grows, sin will not thrive so fast.

—Watson, 1696.

(2561.) The more we grow in grace, the more will God love us. Is it not that we pray for? the more growth, the more will God love us. The husbandman loves his thriving plants; the thriving Christian is God's Hephzibah, or chief delight. Christ loves to see the vine flourishing, and the pomegranates budding (Cant. vi. 11). Christ accepts the truth of grace, but commends the growth of grace: "I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel." Would you be as the beloved disciple that lay in Christ's bosom? would you have much love from Christ? labour for much growth, let faith flourish with good works, and love increase into seal.

—Watson, 1696.

(2562.) The more we grow in grace, the more we shall flourish in glory. Though every vessel of glory shall be full, yet some vessels hold more: he whose pound gained ten was made ruler over ten cities (Luke xix. 17).

—Watson, 1696.

XI. SHOULD INSPIRE US WITH THANKFULNESS.

(2563.) Let Christians be thankful for the least growth; if you do not grow so much in assurance, bless God if you grow in sincerity; if you do not grow so much in knowledge, bless God if you grow in humility. If a tree grows in the root, it is a true growth; if you grow in the root-grace of humility, it is as needful for you as any other growth.

—Watson, 1696.

XII. CANNOT BE TOO GREAT.

(2564.) We cannot grow too much in grace; there is no nimum, no excess there. The body may grow too great, as in the dropsy; but faith cannot grow too great: "Your faith groweth exceedingly;" here was exceeding, yet not excess. As a man cannot have too much health, so not too much grace. Grace is the beauty of holiness (Pa. cx. 3). We cannot have too much spiritual beauty; it will be the only trouble at death, that we have grown no more in grace.

—Watson, 1696.

XIII. IT SHOULD GO ON UNTIL THE END OF LIFE.

(2565.) A Christian has no solstice, no highest point, where he may stand still, and go no further. Much less has he any equator, where days and nights are equal, that is, a liberty to spend as much time ill as well, as many hours in sinful pleasures as in religious exercises. —Donne, 1573-1631.

(2566.) As a traveller passeth from town to town till he come to his inn; so the Christian from virtue to virtue till he come to heaven.

—Adams, 1653.

(2567.) Progress in piety is not unfitly compared to a building, to a race, to the morning light, and to the moon that waxes. Houses are raised from the foundation to the walls, from the walls to the roof; in a race, men run on to the goal; the morning light is brighter and brighter till the noonday; and the moon increases more and more till it comes to the full.

—Du Moulin, 1600-1684.

(2568.) What was suitable to us once, should not satisfy us now. The man outgrows the dress of childhood. Down among the rocky hollows of the sea there are creatures that cast their shell year by year; and up among the storm-beaten cliffs of the mountain, year by year also, the moulting eagle casts her feathers—these, that they may walk in larger, stronger mail; the other, that she may soar on broader pinions, and to higher flights. At such increase should we aim; to grow more busy in God's work; to spend more time and money in His service; to perform greater acts of self-denial; to increase both in the heavenliness of our temper, and in the generosity of our gifts. Not content with being only what once we were, and doing only what once we did, let us "covet earnestly the best gifts;" attempt the loftiest heights of grace; saying, with the holy ambition of an apostle, "When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man I put away childish things." —Guthrie.

XIV. IT SHALL GO ON FOR EVER.

(2569.) The nearer we reach the summit of a hill, the climb is harder; and the higher the eagle soars, ever mounting into thinner air, its flight grows more arduous. Now, both in the case of the foot that has climbed the highest Alp, and of the wing that cleaves the sky above its snowy summit, there is a point where progress ceases—this foot cannot climb, that wing can fly no higher. It is quite otherwise with spiritual progress. While the higher a believer rises in grace his ascent becomes not more difficult but more easy, he never reaches a point where progress ceases. Begun on earth, it is continued in heaven; the field that lies before us stretching beyond the grave and above the stars—illimitable as space and endless as eternity.

Man, physically considered, grows into maturity, stops, and then returns on his course. The descent on the other side of the hill corresponding with the ascent on this, he goes down much as he went up. The hair drops from his head; the teeth fall from his jaws; the light fades in his eye; he enters on the stage of a second childhood; and at length, naked as he came from his mother's womb, naked he returns thither. The emblem of his life is the day : first the gray dawn ; then sunrise, then the sun flaming in the zenith ; then sinking lower and lower, he wheels his course down the western sky ; then he sets ; then fading twilight ; and then the depth of night. But how unlike this to the progress of the immortal spirit ! With a course ever onward, upward, Godward, it presents a case somewhat analogous to the mathematical paradox of two bodies that are ever approaching, and yet, though moving through infinite space and for eternal ages, never meet ; and never can meet. Even so, though they shall never reach the infinite height and perfection of divinity, the saints in glory, constantly ascending, shall be ever approaching it ; so that death which, in a sense, makes us perfect, and introduces us into a state of rest, shall not arrest our progress. Our life, in fact, is like a ship working its way down a river, where the water grows deeper, and the banks grow wider, and the view expands as we move on, till at death, as there, where the waves roar upon the bar, we shall pass out on a great, broad, shoreless ocean, on which, with no limits bounding our progress, we shall advance evermore ; growing in the knowledge, and love, and likeness of Christ with the ages of eternity, increasing yet "more and more." — Guthrie.

HEARERS.

1. Various kinds of hearers :—

(1.) Drowsy hearers.

(2570.) If you would sanctify the Sabbath by diligent, attentive hearing, take heed of drowsiness in hearing ; drowsiness shows much irreverence. How lively are many when they are about the world, but in the worship of God how drowsy, as if the devil had given them some opium to make them sleep ! A drowsy temper is very absurd and sinful. Are not you in prayer asking pardon of sin ? Will the prisoner fall asleep when he is begging his pardon ? In the preaching of the Word, is not the bread of life broken to you : and will a man fall asleep at his food ? Which is worse, to stay from a sermon, or sleep at a sermon ? While you sleep, perhaps the truth was delivered which might have converted your soul.

— Watson, 1696.

(2571.) Can men be regardless of the Word, or drowsy when the weighty matters of eternity are set before them ? We preach of faith, and holiness of life, and the day of judgment, and the eternal recompenses ; here is life and death set before you ; and doth not all this call for serious attention ? If a letter were read to one of special business, wherein his life and estate were concerned, would not he be very serious in listening to that letter ? In the preaching of the Word, your salvation is concerned ; and if ever you would attend, it should be now. "It is not a vain thing for you, because it is your life."

— Watson, 1696.

(2572.) I deny not but that a child of God may sometimes through weakness and indisposition of body drop asleep at a sermon, but it is not voluntary or ordinary. The sun may be in an eclipse, but not often ; if sleeping be customary and allowed, it is a very bad sign and a profaning of the ordinance. A good remedy against drowsiness is to use a spare diet upon this day. Such as indulge their appetite too much on a Sabbath, are fitter to sleep on a couch than pray in the temple. — Watson, 1696.

(2.) Inattentive hearers.

(2573.) Thou must be an attentive hearer ; he that is awake, but wanders with his eye or heart, what doth he but sleep with his eyes open ? It were as good the servant should be asleep in his bed, as when up not to mind his master's business.

— Gurnall, 1617-1679.

— Watson, 1696.

(2575.) One would say, that if you went and began to talk to a man about something of great importance to him, and which he knew was of great importance to him, as, for instance, about how his life was to be saved when he was sick,—or how his family was to be kept from want after he was dead,—or how his house was to be saved from destruction when it was on fire—one would say that if you went and began to talk to a man about such matters as these, he would at least listen very attentively to what you had to say to him. Well, then, in every sermon we hear, the preacher is just a friend who has come to talk to us about something far more important than anything of that kind can be. He has come to tell us how we may be saved from a disease a thousand times worse than consumption, or fever, or apoplexy ; he has come to tell us how every poor man may provide for his family so completely, that he may be sure they shall never want for anything ; he has come to tell us how we may save our houses and ourselves from fires far more destructive than ever destroyed in an hour the work of laborious years. Well, we all know that too ; and yet, strange to say, there is nothing whatsoever to which many people listen so carelessly as a sermon.

(2576.) We crossed and recrossed the river several times by the ferry-boat at Basle. We had no object in the world but merely amusement and curiosity, to watch the simple machinery by which the same current is made to drift the boat in opposite directions from side to side. To other passengers it was a business, to us a sport. Our hearers use our ministry in much the same manner when they come to it out of the idlest curiosity, and listen to us as a means of spending a pleasant hour. That which should ferry them across to a better state of soul they use as a mere pleasure-boat, to sail up and down in, making no progress after years of hearing. Alas ! it may be sport to them, but it is death to us, because we know it will ere long be death to them.

— Spurgeon.

(4.) Curious hearers.

(2577.) Some come to the Word preached, not so much to get grace, as to enrich themselves with notions ; "Itching ears" (2 Tim. iv. 3). Austin confesseth that, before his conversion, he went to hear St. Ambrose, rather for his eloquence than for the spirituality of the matter. "Thou art unto them as a very lovely song of one that hath a pleasant voice, and can play well on an instrument." Many come to the Word only to feast their ears; they like the melody of the voice, the mellifluous sweetness of the expression, the newness of the notion (Acts xvii. 21). This is to love the garnishing of the dish more than the food; this is to desire to be pleased rather than edified. Like a woman that paints her face, but neglects her health: so they paint and adorn themselves with curious speculations, but neglect their souls' health. This hearing doth neither sanctify the heart, nor the Sabbath.

—Watson, 1696.

(5.) Discontented, querulous hearers.

(2578.) Such as have weak and sickly stomachs are always finding fault with the carter, cook, or carver, and think they could feed a great deal better if there were better provision. And thus there are some queasy, wanton hearers of God's Word, such as find fault with their pastor, and think they could be edified much better by such or such another, wherein they say they know not what; for it is neither Paul nor Apollos that can edify—that is, give increase, make the Word effectual. God hath reserved that work to Himself, that so His ordinance, not the gifts, His blessing, not the commendations of the preacher, might be regarded; that the treasure might not be esteemed for the vessel, but the vessel for the treasure, and so neither Paul magnified nor Apollos despised, nor either or both relied upon and God Himself neglected; nor hearing severed from prayer, for that makes hearing unprofitable, but that, both being joined together, our obedience in hearing may make our prayers accepted, and our fervency in praying may procure our hearing to be blessed.

—Croke, 1574–1649.

(2579.) As those that go in a ship upon the sea, it is not the tossing, but the stomach, that causes a sickness, the cholera within, and not the waves without: so the disquiet of querulous hearers, that nothing will go down with them, is from their own distemper.

—Sibbes, 1577–1635.

(2580.) Some peevish, childish persons are like sick stomachs, that no meat can please; you cannot dress it so curiously, but they complain that it is naught, or this aileth it, when the fault is in themselves; or like children, or sick persons that can scarce be touched but they are hurt: do you think that this sickness or curiosity in religion is a credit to you? This is not the tenderness of conscience which God requireth, to be easily hurt by other men's differences and faults. As it is the shame of many gentlewomen to be so troublesomely neat, that no servant knoweth how to please them: so is it in religion, a sign of your childish folly, and worse, to be guilty of such proud curiosity that none can please you who are not exactly of your mind and way.

—Baxter, 1615–1691.

(2581.) Wherever there is a Paul to preach, there will be a Tertullus to find fault.

—Toxady, 1740–1778.

(2582.) Of the two handles which attach to everything, what must we think of that mind which is ever choosing the wrong? Jesus Christ, for instance, shows how much the farm, the oxen, and the wife became impediments in the way of those who refused His invitation. But a perverse conclusion would infer that He was, therefore, an enemy to lawful engagements. Candour, however, sees at a glance that this was not His design in speaking the parable. His drift was evidently to mark the state and spirit of the recusants, and not to discountenance their lawful occupations. He meant to show that even lawful pursuits may be unlawfully pursued, when they become sole objects, and thus preferred to His inestimable proposal. It is thus the well-disposed hearer will mark the design of his minister, and draw wholesome nourishment from that discourse which another will turn to poison, by stopping to cavil at the letter.

—Cecil, 1748–1810.

(6.) Forgetful hearers.

(2583.) As an hour-glass or conduit, through which in an hour the sand runneth in and through the same, in another hour runneth out again: so, likewise, some hearers forget in one hour that which they heard and learned in the hour before.

—Cawdray, 1609.

(7.) Injudicious hearers.

(2584.) As a vessel that receiveth liquor, which being poured out, the dregs remain; or as a sieve that casteth out the good corn, and retaineth only the chaff: even so some hearers of the Word preached do reject and neglect the wholesome and profitable doctrine, and keep in mind only that which is not so necessary and profitable.

—Cawdray, 1609.

(8.) Hardened hearers.

(2585.) As the anvil, the more it is hammered, the harder it is: so most hearers of the Word now-a-days have their hearts so hardened in sin, and their consciences so seared as with a hot iron, that the hammer of God's Word cannot break them in pieces, nor zealous preaching approach to the quick, as it did before by the apostles, &c.

—Cawdray, 1609.

2. Need spiritual ears to appreciate the Gospel.

(2586.) Alphonse Karr heard a gardener ask his master's permission to sleep for the future in the stable; "For," said he, "there is no possibility of sleeping in the chamber behind the greenhouse, sir; there are nightingales there which do nothing but guggle, and keep up a noise all the night." The sweetest sounds are but an annoyance to those who have no musical ear; doubtless the music of heaven would have no charms to carnal minds, certainly the joyful sound of the Gospel is unappreciated so long as men's ears remain uncircumcised.

—Spurgeon.

(2587.) Jedediah Buxton, the famous peasant, who could multiply nine figures by nine in his head, was once taken to see Garrick act. When he went back to his own village, he was asked what he thought of the great actor and his doings. "Oh!" he said, "he did not know, he had only seen a little man strut about the stage, and repeat 7956 words." Here was a want of the ability to appreciate what he saw, and the exercise of the reigning faculty to the exclusion of every other. Similarly our hearers, if destitute of the spiritual powers by which the Gospel is discerned, fix their thoughts on our words, tones, gestures, or countenance, and make remarks upon us which from a spiritual point of view are utterly absurd. How futile are our endeavours without the Holy Spirit ! —Spurgeon.

3. Should seek to be profited rather than pleased.

(2588.) Seek not so much to have thy ear tickled as thy understanding enlightened. The painful bee passeth by roses and violets, and sits upon thyme; so shouldst thou rather choose to feed on plain and wholesome doctrine, though hot and biting, than on the quirks and flowers of man's invention. In a word, learn evermore to judge that sermon best, though plain, whereby thou understandest.

—N. Rogers, 1594-1660.

(2589.) Grace is contented with the simplicity of the Gospel; gifts are not contented therewithal. And therefore you shall observe that the Corinthians, who excelled in gifts, adulterated the gospel with their swelling words. The Galatians adulterated the doctrine of the Gospel, and mingled the doctrine of the Gospel with justification by works. The Corinthians mingled the words of the Gospel with their own swelling language. They had gifts, and they were not contented with the simplicity of the Gospel. Ay, but grace is. You see how it is with a child that comes into a corn-field; he is mightily taken with the blue or red weeds, or the daisies that grow there; but now, when the husbandman comes, he looks at the corn, and is not so much taken with the blue and red weeds, or the company of daisies, but is taken with the corn itself. So now take a man that hath gifts only, and bring him to a sermon or a prayer; and if there be any fine expressions, any daisies, he is much taken with them; he prizeth, and magnifieth them, and he hangs on them. But now bring a man that hath grace to a prayer, or to a sermon, and he looks at the corn; he doth not look at the daisies so much, but at the spirituality and power of those things that are there delivered.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

4. Are not to be weary of familiar truths.

(2590.) All is not well when a man is weary of his ordinary food, and nothing will go down but rarities; the stomach is sickly when a man delights rather to pick some salad than eat of solid meat; and how far this dainty age is gone in this spiritual disease, I think few are so far come to themselves as yet to consider and lament. Oh, sirs, be not weary as in doing, so not in hearing those savoury truths preached you have daily use of, because you know them, and have heard them often: faith and repentance will be good doctrine to preach and hear to the end of the world. You may as well quarrel with God because He hath made but one heaven, and one way to it, as be offended with the preacher for preaching these over and over. If thy heart were humble, and thy palate spiritual, old truths would be new to thee every time thou hearest them. In heaven the saints draw all their wine of joy (as I may so say) at one tap, and shall to all eternity; and yet it never tastes flat. God is that one object their souls are filled with, and never weary of; and can anything of God and His love be wearisome to thee in the hearing here? —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

5. Their craving for novelty unhealthy and absurd.

(2591.) It is a graceless, wicked soul, in a state of damnation, that conceits he knows so much of God and Jesus Christ, and the essentials of Christianity, that he cares not for hearing these things any more, but had rather have novelties, and let these alone; and feebleth not need of knowing much more, and more of the same truths; and of using and living upon these vital principles which he knows. You have eaten bread a hundred times; but perhaps you never did eat of sturgeon or whale, of a bear or a leopard, of chestnuts or pignuts, or many strange and dangerous fruits, in all your life; and yet I hope you will never seek after these, because they are novelties, and give over eating bread because you have eaten of it already. Nor will you churlishly refuse to go to a feast, because there is no meat but what you have eaten of before.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(2593.) Love, joy, humility, heavenly-mindedness, godly sorrow for sin, and holy resolutions against it, are not promoted so much by novel speculations, as by placing in a just and affecting light the acknowledged truths of the Gospel, and thereby stirring up the mind by way of remembrance. "Whilst I am in this tabernacle," said Peter, "I will not be negligent to put you in remembrance of these things, though ye know them, and are established in the present truth." We appeal to the experience of every real Christian, whether the sweetest and most profitable seasons he has enjoyed have not been those in which he is conscious of having learned no new truth, strictly speaking, but was indulged with spiritual and transforming views of the plain, unquestionable discoveries of the Gospel. As the Word of God is the food of souls, so it corresponds to that character in this respect among others—that the strength and refreshment it imparts depend not upon its novelty, but upon the nutritious properties it possesses. It is a sickly appetite only which craves incessant variety.

—Robert Hall, 1764-1831.

(2594.) On a Sabbath-day, years ago, a young minister appeared in a church in Edinburgh as a candidate for the vacant charge. He preached; the people were all attention. The discourse was worthy of one whose ministrations since then have been elsewhere much blessed to bring many souls to Christ. That did not save it, however, from the adverse judgment of a critic. So soon as the sermon was concluded, this modern Athenian turned round to him who related the circumstance, and said, with a shrug of his shoulders, and a tone bordering on contempt, "Ha! there is nothing new there!" Fancy a man to whom I offer a rose fresh plucked from the parterre, dyed in the richest hues, breathing the most fragrant odour, with the dew-drops still shining like diamonds on its pure bosom, tossing it from him with an air of contempt, to say, "Ha! there is nothing new there!" This were not more absurd than that. New? Anything in religion that professes to be new, beyond the light which modern researches into the geography and natural history, the manners, customs, and languages of the East, may throw on the contents of the Bible, is to be regarded with grave suspicion.

—Guthrie.

6. Should regard the message, not the messenger.

—Downname, 1644.

(2596.) All true ministers are the Lord's ambassadors, who in Christ's stead beseech their hearers that they will be reconciled unto God. We must not therefore look upon the man, but on God who sends him; not on the earthen vessel, but on the heavenly treasure which it brings; not on the simplicity of the cabinet, but on the precious pearl which is contained in it; not upon the meanness of the ambassador, but on the glorious royalty of the prince who sends him, and on his embassy, which is the glad tidings of the Gospel; the word of salvation and life, which is able to save souls: and then his feet will seem beautiful, and none shall be better welcome; then shall we not condemn or neglect his ministry, but receive joyfully, reverently, and attentively the word preached by him, remembering what our Saviour Christ has said: "He that heareth you heareth Me, and he that despiseth you despiseth Me; and he that despiseth Me despiseth him that sent Me."

—Downname, 1644.

(2597.) The clergy is a copy-book, their life is the paper, whereof some is purer, some coarser: their doctrine is the copies, some written in plain hand, others in a flourishing hand, some in a text hand, some in a Roman hand, others in a court hand, others in a bastard Roman. If the choice be in thy power, choose a book that has the finest paper; let it not be too straight nor too loosely bound, but easy to lie open to every eye. Follow not every copy, lest thou be good at none: among them all choose one that shall be most legible and useful, and fullest of instructions. But if the paper chance to have a blot, remember, the blot is no part of the copy.

—Quarles, 1644.

majestic God, who speaks, and the mountains tremble; threatens, and the foundations of the earth are moved. I appeal to your consciences,—who have a testimony from them, and they from the Spirit, that you are God's,—hath not His word, spoken by a silly man, made your hearts bleed within you for your sins? Yea, hath not Felix himself trembled like an aspen leaf, when Paul, even his prisoner, preached? What power hath stirred you, human or divine? Tertullus could not do it, whilst authority and credit with men seconded his eloquence. Peter, taken from his nets, shall catch a thousand and a thousand souls at a draught. What presumptuous folly in some is it, then, to loathe the word of eternal truth because such a man speaks it! God must not only give them meat, but such a cook as may dress it to their own fancies. Our weakness makes way for God's brighter glory: "That your faith should not stand in the wisdom of man, but in the power of God," Oftentimes the pillars of the Church move not him whom a weak leavener hath converted. It is a reason convincing the wicked, confirming the faithful, that Paul gives: "God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and the weak things to confound the mighty; that no flesh should glory in His presence." —Adams, 1653.

(2599.) Mind the word as the word of truth. Take it not upon the account of persons; value it for its own sake, as it is a word of truth. It is neither Paul nor Apollos, but God that gives the increase. Value it not by men; it is no matter what the pipe is, whether gold or lead, so the water be the water of life. —Charnock, 1628-1680.

(2600.) When men refuse to hear the Gospel from the lips of a gracious but uneducated preacher, they remind us of the Spaniard in South America, who suffered severely from the gout, but refused to be cured by an Indian. "I know," said he, "that he is a famous man, and would certainly cure me, but he is an Indian, and would expect to be treated with attentions which I cannot pay to a man of colour, and therefore I prefer remaining as I am."

—Spurgeon.

7. Necessity of effort on their part.

(2601.) Let us remember that we do not go to church to be amused, but to be instructed and edified. Instruction is rarely a pleasing thing. To get instruction is almost always hard work. All learning implies an effort: God has made the universe in such a fashion that to do anything good and profitable, it is needful to make a push and an effort; whereas to do what is idle and useless takes no effort at all. A schoolboy must work to learn his lessons; but it needs no effort, and no labour, to play at balls or marbles. It needs no self-denial to do that. To take amusement is almost the only thing we can do that needs no effort. Religious instruction cannot be made so interesting,—cannot be made so as to be listened to without an effort,—in the same way as some amusing or romantic story, or some lively disquisition upon worldly matters. It is right and proper for the preacher to do as he can to make his sermons interesting; to make them such that they will keep up people's attention whether they are trying to attend or not; but in the nature of things, there is a limit to what he can do. In the nature of things, it is impossible to make serious instruction as attractive as light amusement. —Boyd.

8. Should apply to themselves what they hear.

(2602.) In a feast we are glad to have the best morsels carved to us, and let the coarser dishes pass by; but in hearing of the word, when the best counsel is offered us, we are so mannerly as to commend it to our neighbours. —Adams, 1653.

(2604.) "Make it your work with diligence to apply the word as you are hearing it, and to work your own hearts to those suitable resolutions and affections which it bespeaketh." Cast not all upon the minister, as those that will go no further than they are carried as by force; this is fitter for the dead than for the living. You have work to do as well as the preacher, and should all the while be as busy as he; as helpless as the infant is, he must suck when the mother offereth him the breast. If you must be fed, yet you must open your mouths and digest it, for another cannot digest it for you; nor can the holiest, wisest, most powerful minister, convert or save you without yourselves, nor deliver a people from sin and hell that will not stir for their own deliverance. Therefore, be all the while at work; abhor an idle heart in hearing, as well as an idle minister. —Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2605.) What a mistake to imagine that, by hearing first one preacher and then another, we can derive benefit to our souls! More is wanted than such hearing. A raven may fly from cage to cage, but it is not thereby changed into a dove. Go from room to room of the royal feast, and the sight of the tables will never stay thy hunger. Reader, the main thing is to have and hold the truth personally and inwardly; if this be not seen to, thou wilt die in thy sins, though ten thousand voices should direct thee to the way of salvation. Pity indeed it is that the bulk of hearers are hearers only, and are no more likely to go to heaven than the seats they sit on in the assembly of the saints. —Spurgeon.

9. The folly of resenting faithful preaching.

(2607.) Whence is it but from selfishness, that plain and close application in our sermons is taken to be an injury to those that think themselves concerned in it? If a minister will speak alike to all, and take heed of meddling with their sores, they will patiently hear him; but if he make them know that he meaneth them in particular, and deal closely with them about their miserable state, or against any special, disgraceful sin, they fall a-railling at him and reproaching him behind his back; and perhaps they will say they will hear him no more. "Oh," saith the selfish, ungodly wretch, "I know he meant me to-day; had he nobody but me to speak against?" As if a sick man should be angry with the physician for giving directions and medicines to him in particular, and say, "Had he nobody to give physic to but me? Were there not sick men enough in the town besides me?"

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2608.) Verily, sirs, a sinner under the curse of the law, unsanctified and unpardoned, is not in a state to be jested and dallied with, unless you can play in the flames of hell; it is plain dealing that he needs. A quibbling, toyish, flashy sermon is not the proper medicine for a lethargic, miserable soul, nor fit to break a stony heart, nor to bind up a heart that is kindly broken. Heaven and hell should not be talked of in a canting, jingling, pedantic strain. A Seneca can tell you that it is a physician that is skilful, and not one that is eloquent, that we need. If he have also fine and neat expressions, we will not despise them, nor overmuch value them. It is a cure that we need; and the means are best, be they never so sharp, that will accomplish it. Serious, reverent gravity best suiteth with matters of such incomprehensible concernment. You set not a schoolboy to make an oration, to give an assaulted city an alarm, or to call men out to quench a common fire. You may play with words when the case will bear it; but as dropping of beads is too ludicrous for one that is praying to be saved from the flames of hell, so a sleepy, or a histrionical starched speech, is too light and unlikely a means to call back a sinner that is posting to perdition, and must be humbled and renewed by the Spirit, or be for ever damned. This is your case, sirs: and do you think the playing of a part upon a stage doth fit your case? Oh no! So great business requireth all the serious earnestness in the speaker that he can see. I am sure you will think so ere long yourselves; and you will then think well of the preachers that faithfully acquainted you with your case; and (if they succeed to your perdition) you will curse those that smoothed you up in your presumption, and hid your danger, by false doctrine, or misapplication, or, seeming to discover it, indeed did hide it, by an hypocritical light, or not serious mention of it. God can make use of clay and spittle to open the eyes of men born blind, and of rams' horns to bring down the walls of Jericho; but usually He fitteth the means unto the end, and works on man agreeably to his nature: and, therefore, if a blind understanding must be enlightened, you cannot expect that it should be done by squibs and glowworms, but by bringing into your souls the powerful celestial truth, which shall show you the hidden corners of your hearts, and the hidden mysteries of the Gospel, and the unseen things of the other world. If a hardened heart be to be broken, it is not stroking but striking that must do it. It is not the sounding brass, the tinkling cymbal, the carnal mind puffed up with superficial knowledge that is the instrument fitted to the renewing of men's souls; but it is he that can acquaint you with what he himself hath been savingly acquainted; the heart is not melted into godly sorrow, nor raised to the life of faith and love by the bubbles of a frothy wit, or by a game at words, or useless notions, but by the illuminating beams of sacred truth, and the attraction of Divine-displayed goodness, communicated from a mind that by faith hath seen the glory of God, and by experience found that He is good, and liveth in the love of God ; such an one is fitted to assist you first in the knowledge of yourselves, and then in the knowledge of God in Christ.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2609.) Its folly is apparent from the consideration that no concealment of the sinner can alter his condition in the sight of God, or change the relation in which he stands to eternity. This, whatever pains he may take to delude himself, or whatever solicitude he may feel that others should join him in the delusion, remains the same. Like the ostrich, which is said when closely pursued to put her head beneath her wing, as if to blind herself to impending destruction, he may refuse to see or hear his true situation unfolded, but the case is unaltered. Is it wise in the man who has nearly ruined his constitution by intemperance, to ask the physician to tell him that he is in good health ; and is carrying on a harmless course of indulgence ? Is it wise in the man who is wasting his property by neglect or extravagance, to persuade his friends to hush their reproving voice, and flatter him that his prosperity is secure ? Would the deceit in the former case change the condition of the patient ? or the falsehood in the latter repair the fortunes of the spendthrift ? How much greater is the folly of the sinner, who, instead of turning from sin to God, through faith in Christ, and thus getting rid of his alarms by abandoning his course of sin, refuses to change his conduct, and asks for a false representation of his condition. He is walking to the edge of a precipice, and solicits those who see danger to tell him that he is safe.

—James.

10. Folly of their craving for "comforting" preaching.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2611.) Plain truth is unwelcome to them because it is rough, and grates upon the quick, and tells them of that which is troublesome to know, though they must know their sin, and danger, and misery, or else they can never escape it ; yet they had rather venture on hell than hear the danger. And, as a sottish patient, they love that physician better that will tell them there is no danger, and let them die, than he that will tell them, " Your disease is dangerous ; you must bleed, or vomit, or purge, or you will die ! " Oh, what a wrong they take it to be told thus ! If a minister tell one of them that hath the death-marks of ungodliness in the face of his conversation, " Neighbour, I must deal plainly with you ; your state is sad ; you are unsanctified, and unjustified, and in the slavery of the devil, and will be lost for ever ; if you die before you are converted and made a new creature ; and therefore, turn presently, as you love your soul," it is ten to one but he should have a reproachful answer instead of thanks and obedience. —Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2612.) Are there not many who are dissatisfied with everything but words of comfort and statements of privilege ? They object to everything of a searching and practical tendency. Their incessant demand is for doctrine and consolation. Everything besides this is legality. This disposition is, though in a modified sense of the text, a demanding of smooth things, and is, in a measure, asking for deceit, and requesting that the Holy One of Israel may cease from before His people. Such persons value themselves as being believers of greater eminence, children in the family of God, of taller stature and greater strength than others ; but reasoning from analogy, one should be led to suppose that the oldest and best children would be most anxious to hear their Father's command, and do their duty by fulfilling His will ; for in the families of men, it is the younger and more ignorant and petulant that quarrel with commands, and cry after luscious sweets. The strongest mark of great grace is to delight more than others in knowing and doing the will of God, and yet to think least of what we do. Many who boast of their high attainments in religion, would have the ministers of God leave out more than half their message ; and what is this but to do the work of the Lord deceitfully ? Upon their principles, all parts of God's Word but the promises are unnecessary ; they are useless to believers, for they are above them by privilege ; useless to sinners, for they are below them in respect to obligation.

—James.

(2613.) Instead of wishing to know the real state of the case, their only wish is to be deceived ; instead of running to the physician, their aim is to persuade themselves that they do not need him ; instead of anxiously inquiring, " What shall I do to be saved ? " they do not see their danger of being lost ; instead of fleeing from the wrath to come, they covet to be let alone. It is only by a faithful disclosure of their situation that they can escape, but they will not hear it. Like the man whose home is on fire over his head, and who is angry with neighbours who have disturbed his slumbers and alarmed his fears, they entreat that nothing may be said to them about the quenchless fire, although it is kindling around them. They take pains to be lost, and are offended with the persons who would save them.

—James.

11. Are not to regard as useless what is profitable to themselves personally.

(2614.) God directs the tongue of His ministers as He does His showers of rain : they fall upon the face of a large compass of earth, when all that earth did not need that rain. For the refreshing of one span of ground, God lets fall a whole shower of rain ; for the rectifying of one soul, God pours out the meditations of the preacher into such a subject as, perchance, little concerns the rest of the congregation.

If thou remember not all that was presented to thy faith, all the citations of places of Scriptures : nor all that was presented to thy spiritual delight, all the sentences of ornament produced out of the fathers; yet if thou remember that which concerned thy sin and thy soul, if thou meditate upon that, apply that, thou hast brought away all the sermon, all that was intended by the Holy Ghost to be preached to thee.

And if thou have done so, as at a donative, at a coronation, or other solemnity, when money is thrown among the people, though thou light but upon one shilling of that money, thou canst not think that all the rest is lost, but that some others are the richer for it, though thou beest not: so if thou remember, or apply, or understand, but one part of the sermon, do not think all the rest to have been idly, or unnecessarily, or impertinently spoken, for thou broughtest a fever, and hast had thy juleps, and another brought a fainting and a diffident spirit, and must have his cordials.

—Donne, 1573-1631.

12. Should discriminate between truth and error.

(2615.) As a sponge gathereth up all liquor, whether it be good or bad, even so some hearers of sermons receive all that is spoken, good and evil.

—Cawdray, 1609.

—Cawdray, 1609.

13. Must test what they are taught by the Word of God.

(2617.) Too much to blame, then, are our overcredulous multitude, who, hand over head, admit and receive for orthodox whatsoever is propounded unto them by their teachers; and think this is a sufficient warrant for any point they hold. Our minister said it, or such a preacher delivered it in a pulpit, as if there were not some who run before they are sent, and publish the visions of their own brain, prophesying that which God never spake. In matters civil we are more cautious and wary; no gold, almost, we take before we have tried it by the touch, or weighed it in the balance; and what is the reason? because there is much of it light and laugh. yea, hardly we will take a groat without bowing, bending, rubbing it, and the like, being therein oftentimes over-curious; but in religious matters, which concern our faith and soul's salvation, we are over-careless, albeit we are forewarned of many false prophets that are gone into the world, and therefore willed not to believe every spirit, but to try the spirits whether they be of God. This is a great yet common fault among us. Were he an angel from heaven that preaches to thee, yet art thou bound to look into his doctrine and examine it, and not to take it upon credit without he bring sufficient proof and warrant for it (Gal. i. 8). Like good Bereans, see you search the Scriptures whether these things be so.

—N. Rogers, 1594-1660.

14. "Be ye doers of the Word, and not hearers only."

(2618.) Idle auditors are like idle gods, which have members not for use but show; like glass windows upon stone walls, to give ornament, but not to receive light.

—Adams, 1653.

(2619.) Many men are as those that travel by water, and see buildings ashore, and praise them as they pass by, but never enter into them, never look after them more.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(2620.) It is an aphorism in physic, that they who in the beginning of sickness eat much, and mend not, fall at last to a general loathing of food. The moral is true in divinity. He that has a sick conscience, and lives a hearer under a fruitful ministry, if he grows not sound, he will learn to despise the word.

Condemned blessings leave room for curses. He that neglects the good he may have, shall find the evil he would not have. Justly he sits in darkness, that would not light his candle when the fire burned clearly.

He that needs counsel, and will not hear it, destines himself to misery, and is the willing author of his own woe. Continue at a stay he cannot long: if he could, not to proceed is backward. And this is as dangerous to the soul as the other to the body. Pitiful is his estate that hates the thing that should help him; if ever you see a drowning man refuse help, conclude him a willful murderer. When God affords me plentiful means, woe be to me if they prove not profitable! I had better have a deaf ear than hear to neglect or hate; to the burying of such treasures there belongs a curse; to their misspending, judgments.

—Felltham, 1668.

(2621.) Nothing can be more fatal than a habit of indolent hearing. Like one who glances into a mirror, and sees disorder in his attire, or dust on his face, and says, "I must attend to this," but forthwith forgets it, and hurries out on his journey; or who, in the time of plague, sees the livid marks on his countenance, and says, I must take advice for this, and thinks no more about it till he drops death-stricken on the pavement; so there are languid or luxurious listeners to the word of God. At the moment, they say Very true, or Very good, and they resolve to take some action; but just as the mirror is not medicine,—as even the glassy pool does not remove from the countenance the specks which it reveals, if merely looked into, so a self-survey in the clearest sermon will neither erase the blemishes from your character, nor expel the sin-plague from your soul. (James i. 19-25.)

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

15. Should exemplify the Gospel.

(2622.) As it is the minister's task to make known the mystery of the Gospel in his pulpit, so it is your duty to do the same in your lives. The Christian's life should put his minister's sermon in print; he should preach that mystery every day to the eyes of his neighbours, which the minister preacheth once or twice a week to their ears. As a true-made dial agrees with the sun in its motion, and as a well-drawn picture resembles the face from which it is taken, so should thy conversation resemble that Gospel which thou professest.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2623.) The pulpit should be like the key-board of an organ, and the church like the pipes. It is my business to press down the keys here, and it is yours to respond out there. Christian life ought to be so exhibitory that when you look at a Christian you will know what God's truth is. If one comes to me and asks the meaning of faith, and humility, and charity, I ought to be able to point to one man and say, "There is faith," and to another, "There is humility," and so on through all the church and all the graces. Christ's kingdom will not come until His disciples are such "living epistles, known and read of all men."

—Becker.

16. Should endeavour to retain what they hear.

(2624.) Thou must be a retentive hearer; without this the work will ever be to begin again. Truths to a forgetful hearer are as a seal set on water, the impression lasts no longer than the seal is on; the sermon once done, all is undone.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

—Watson, 1696.

(2626.) "Let these sayings (saith Christ) sink down into your ears." In the original it is, Put these sayings into your ears, as a man that would hide a jewel from being stolen locks it up safe in his chest. Let them sink; the word must not only fall as dew that wets the leaf, but as rain which soaks to the root of the tree, and makes it fructify.

—Watson, 1696.

(2627.) If you would hear the word aright, be not only attentive, but retentive. Lay the word up in your memories and hearts. "The seed on the ground are they, who, having heard the word, keep it." The Greek word for "to keep," signifies "to hold the word fast, that it do not run from us." If the seed be not kept in the ground, but is presently washed away, it is sown to little purpose: so if the word preached be not kept in your memories and hearts, it is preached in vain. Many people have memories like leaky vessels, the word goes out as fast as it comes in, how can it profit? If a treasure be put into a chest and the chest not locked, it may easily be taken out: a bad memory is like a chest without a lock, the devil can easily take out all the treasure. "Then comes the devil and takes away the word out of their hearts." Labour to keep in memory the truths you hear: the things we esteem we are not so apt to forget. "Will a bride forget her jewels?" "Can a maid forget her ornaments?" Did we prize the word more, we should not soon forget it.

—Watson, 1696.

17. Consolations for discouraged hearers.

(1.) In hearing the word, however imperfectly, we at least obey God's command.

ing these glad tidings with such drowsy dulness and spiritual deadness, such hardness of heart, and loathing weariness, that they are so far from profiting by these holy exercises, as that they are fully persuaded all they do is turned into sin; and therefore it were much better for them utterly to neglect and omit these religious duties, than by performing them to increase the number of their sins, and the fearful measure of their just condemnation. To which I answer,—

To hear the word of God is not a thing arbitrary and indifferent, but a part of that service which God necessarily requires to be performed by us. And, therefore, though we grievously sin in the doing of it, yet we must do it still, seeing we cannot so heinously sin in the hearing of the word, if we endeavour to hear it as reverently and profitably as we can; as we shall if we neglect it altogether. For it is a less sin to fail in the manner of doing, than to omit the main duty itself; to sin of infirmity because we can do no better; than of wilfulness and negligence by not doing what we can. For what father would not take it better at his child's hand, if he perform the duty which he has enjoined, though it be never so ill and imperfectly done, if he knows that he has used his best endeavour, than that he should utterly neglect it, and excuse his negligence by his inability to do it: in such perfection as his father required?

—Downname, 1644.

(2.) Our imperfect hearing prepares us for a more perfect service of God.

(2629.) We know that the cunning scribe requires his scholar should exercise his hand, though for the present he do but blot paper and spoil pens, because this small loss is recompensed by a greater gain, and by practice he is brought from bungling to perfect skill. And so the Lord will have His young novices to exercise themselves in the art of hearing, though at first their loss seems to exceed their gain, because in time it will turn to their greater advantage, as being the means to bring them to more perfection, and is content that they should by showing their infirmities and corruptions displease Him for a while, that they may learn the way to please Him for ever.

The sick man who has lost his appetite and loathes the sight of meat, if he eat thereof is made more sick and weak in his present sense and feeling, but yet afterwards he finds by experience that it was the means whereby he recovered his health and strength. And so being sick in sin, we have no desire to feed on this spiritual food, but through the hardness of our hearts loathe this heavenly manna, and if we taste thereof (judging according to our present sense and feeling) we are ready to cry out that our sickness of sin and gross corruptions are rather increased than abated; and yet this is the food whereby presently we live, and for the time to come wax healthy and strong in virtue and godliness.

—Downname, 1644.

(3.) In hearing, our sinfulness is not created, but revealed.

(2630.) Some complain that the more they hear the greater are their sins and rebellion against God. In this they much deceive themselves. For the word of God does not make them more sinful; but whereas heretofore they lived in carnal security and hardness of heart, having their understandings darkened, and their consciences seared so that they could neither see nor feel their sins, though they were manifold and grievous; now the word of God made effectual by the inward operation of His Holy Spirit, like a glorious light having dispelled the dark foggy mists of ignorance, and illuminated their understandings with the knowledge of God's law, they better discern their sins and miserable estate than in former times. And this the Apostle Paul shows unto us in his own example (Rom. vii. 9, 10, 13). The preaching of the law does not make us more sinful, but reveals those sins unto us which before we discerned not; as the sun shining upon some filthy place does not make it so filthy, but only makes it manifest which was not seen in the dark.

(4.) Our sense of imperfection should make us more constant in hearing.

(2631.) When Satan objects our unfitness to hear, because our ears are dull, our eyes blind, our hearts hard, and our wills, affections, and all the powers and faculties of our bodies and souls wholly corrupted and disordered, this must not move us to neglect the hearing of God's word, but to become hearers thereof with more care and diligence. For it is the two-edged sword of the Spirit, which will pierce and make way for itself to enter, and will build a lodging for itself to dwell in. It is not only a guide to those that see, but a precious eye-salve to give sight unto those born blind. It is not only the heavenly dew which makes God's graces to spring in us, but also that divine seed which gives them being and rooting in our hearts. It is not only the food of our souls to preserve and increase that strength which we already have, but also that immortal seed by which we are first begotten unto God and born again, who before were dead in our sins; and that excellent physic of our souls by which they are purged from their corruptions and restored to health, who before were deadly sick in sin. It makes us first to will that which is good, and then further to desire it. It gives us life who before were dead in our sins, and then preserves this life. It begets and begins faith and sanctification and all other graces in us; and being begotten and begun it strengthens and increases them. And therefore, let not Satan dissuade us from the hearing of God's word because of our sins, unworthiness, and unfitness. For as it is a notable means ordained of God for the increasing of grace where it already is, so it is no less effectual for the begetting of graces where it never was.

—Downname, 1644.

(2632.) There is no wise man that will neglect his trade because he is poor, but rather this will move him to be more painful therein, as being the means whereby he may become rich. Neither do men refuse all nourishment, because they have empty and hungry stomachs, but do more earnestly desire meats that they may be filled and satisfied. Yea, even those whose stomachs are weak do not altogether refuse their food, but eat something to sharpen their appetite, and so by little and little in using their stomachs they get stomachs. Let us follow the like practice, and when we perceive our beggariness in God's graces, let us more earnestly labour after this heavenly treasure and precious pearl, that we may be made rich. When we feel our emptiness of all virtue and goodness, let us more eagerly hunger after this spiritual manna that we may be filled and satisfied. When we find our appetite weak and our stomachs indisposed to eat of this heavenly food, let us a little force ourselves against the appetite, or use all good means to strengthen it: and so we shall find that the oftener we eat, the oftener we shall desire, the more we hear the word of God, the more we shall desire to hear, and the greater benefit we shall receive by it. Whereas neglect of hearing will make us every day more unfit to hear, even as long abstinence doth quite spoil the stomach.

—Downname, 1644.

(5.) Our very weakness may render our service more acceptable to God.

(2633.) If a soldier being strong and valiant do in all encounters go away with victory and triumph, it is no great wonder if at his captain's command he hazard the combat, because his success whets his courage and heartens him to any attempt. But if another, who being weak and feeble, has continually in every fight received wounds and foils, doth willingly as often as his captain appoints him enter the field, and stand to it in all encounters, having no confidence in his own strength or hope of good success, only in obedience to his captain's command, surely such an one is no less to be admired for his love and duty in attempting, than to be pitied for his weakness and inability in performing; and exceeding the other as much in submissive obedience, as he is exceeded by him in strength and power, his weak endeavours must needs please his commander. And so it is no great wonder if those who are strong in God's graces do willingly perform unto Him that service He requires, and resist Satan after they have often put him to flight. But if one who is by reason of his weakness continually foiled, and overcome of sin in all his services wherein he is employed, be, notwithstanding, still ready at God's command to attempt the performance of any duty, and, as it were, wounded and maimed, doth endure the conflict only in love and obedience to the Lord of hosts, surely this service must needs be acceptable to God, and in the end He will so rescue him with the power of His Spirit, that he shall obtain the victory, and make him as commendable in the time to come for his strength and abilities, as he was before for his obedience and duty.

—Downname, 1644.

18. Where all seems lost, much really may be gained.

(2634.) We know that the seed does not presently bring forth fruit when it is cast into the ground, but first it seems to rot and perish, and then it sprouts up in a green blade, and then it bears an ear, and a great increase and much fruit. And so it fares sometimes in hearing the word of God. For at first it seems quite lost and perished, being sown in some grounds, and yet afterwards it brings forth not only a fair green blade of an outward profession, but also a great increase of the ripe fruits of true godliness.

So also the sick patient, taking sovereign physic, is not presently cured, nay, instead of feeling any ease thereby he is made much more sick in his own sense and feeling; and yet after the physic has a little while wrought with him, and purged him of some superfluous and hurtful humours, he finds some amendment, and so, by little and little, he is restored to his former health. And so it is also with the spiritually sick patient. He does not always presently find ease and quiet peace of conscience; nay, many times he is tormented and vexed after he has received the spiritual physic of the soul—the word of God, more than ever in former times. But yet, notwithstanding, in process of time, when this physic has effectually wrought with him, it purges him from his filthy corruptions, and strengthens him in all grace and godliness.

And, therefore, though we presently feel no profitable fruits of hearing, let not this discourage us from hearing; nay, rather let it serve as a sharp spur to prick us forward with more diligence, and let us join therewith hearty prayer, desiring the Lord to water the seed of His word sown in our hearts with the dew of His Holy Spirit; and then undoubtedly in the end the Lord will hear us, and to our exceeding comfort show unto us the plentiful fruits of all our labours. —Deuoname, 1644.

(2635.) Even when the Christian through weakness of memory cannot remember the very words he hears, to repeat them; yet then he keeps the power and savour of them in his spirit, as when sugar is dissolved in wine, you cannot see it, but you may taste it. What meat is eaten and digested, it is not to be found as it was received, but the man is cheered and strengthened by it, more able to walk and work than before, by which you may know it is not lost; so you may taste the truths the Christian heard, in his spirit, see them in his life. Perhaps if you ask him what the particulars were the minister had about faith, mortification, repentance, and the like, he cannot tell you; yet this you may find, his heart is more broken for sin, more enabled to rely on the promises, and now weaned from the world. As that good woman answered one that, coming from sermon, asked her what she remembered of the sermon? said, She could not at present recall much, but she heard that which should make her reform some things as soon as she came home. —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2636.) "I should be most thankful were I like you," said the Funnel to the Bottle; "you keep all that is poured into you; but, as for me, I can hold nothing! All goes out again as fast as it comes in."

"And, what of it?" said the Bottle.

"Therefore, of course, all is lost on me!" answered the Funnel.

"That cannot be, assuredly, my dear friend, whatever you suppose," replied the Bottle, "for, whilst you are moistened by what you receive—which also refreshes you at the time, and the savour is left behind on you afterwards—you gain the benefit of what is conveyed, although the fulness cannot possibly be retained, as you desire."

"Oh, that I could retain the sermon I heard! but it always goes from my memory as fast as the words enter my ears!" is often the lamentation of a desiring soul; who therefore argues most unfavourably by itself spiritually. But, as the water passing through the wool cleanses it, while the wool retains not the water, so the spiritual mind may be refreshed and purified when the memory cannot bring home the recollection of the word.

—Bowden.

(2637.) Bishop Hoskyns of old time thus encourages those readers and hearers of the word who, though earnest in their desires, yet sometimes fail in their efforts to keep in memory the lively oracles: "I have heard of one who, returning from an affecting sermon, highly commended it to some,

and being demanded what he remembered of it, answered: "Truly I remember nothing at all; but only while I heard it, it made me resolve to live better; and so, by God's grace, I will."

There is a story to the same purpose of one who complained to a holy, aged man, that he was discouraged from reading the Scriptures, because he could fasten nothing upon his memory. The old hermit bade him take an earthen pitcher and fill it with water. He then bade him empty it again and wipe it clean, that nothing should remain in it. This being done, "Now," said he, "though there being nothing of the water remaining in it, yet the pitcher is cleaner than it was before; so though thy memory retain nothing of the word thou readest, yet thy heart is cleaner for its very passage through."

HEARING.

1. Is a natural instinct of the new life.

(2638.) The hearts of believers are carried out to desire the word of communion with God from instinct, and not from any outward inducement. The cause of the natural appetite is not persuasion and discourse, but inclination; not argument, but nature. Appetite is an effect of life. As new-born babes desire the milk, not by instruction but instinct, without a teacher; as all creatures desire to preserve that life which they have, and therefore run by a natural propension to the teats of their dams; as trees that receive life from the earth and sun stretch out their branches to receive the sun, and strike deep their roots into the earth which brought them forth; and as the chicken is no sooner out of the shell, but it shrouds itself under the feathers of the hen; and the little lamb runs to its dam though there may be a thousand sheep of the same wool and colour, as if it said, Here I received what I have, and here I'll seek what I want—so by such a native, inbred desire do the saints run to God's word, and seek a supply of strength and nourishment; and the desire is very strong and vehement—"One thing have I desired of the Lord, that will I seek after," &c. What is the reason of this? You may as well ask what teacheth the young lambs to suck, and what teacheth the chicken to run under the wing of the hen, as who taught the regenerate to long for the word. It is the instinct of a spiritual nature. And it shows that all who do not "desire the sincere milk of the word," and have no such kindly appetite for the ordinances, who can relish nothing but meats and drinks, business, wealth, vanities—were never acquainted with the new nature. —Salter, 1840.

2. Its importance.

(2639.) There is more hope of the worst professor that hears the word, and attends unto it, than of the best of civil [moral] men that in profaneness of heart refuse it. . . . If thou seest two men most dangerously sick of divers diseases, and all mortal except they be cured, and one of them putting himself under the physician's hand, the other rejecting both physic and the physician; whether of these is more likely to be restored and live? Is not he that takes the receipt and medicine that is ministered? So is it in the sickness of the soul. If we hearken to the word, which is a spiritual medicine to heal every malady, we may be reclaimed.

—Attersol, 1618.

(2640.) "Despise not prophecy, quench not the Spirit." The coupling of these things together shows that if we despise prophecy, we quench the Spirit; as fire goes out not only by pouring on water, but by neglecting to stir and blow it up. To expect help from God when we are sluggish, is to tempt Christ, and put Him still upon a miraculous way to heal and cure our distempers. Who will bring bread and meat to a sluggard's bed who will not arise to labour for it, or will not rise at least to fetch it? Therefore, if we will not attend upon God in the means of grace, He will not bring us that help, comfort, and support that otherwise we might have.

—Alanton, 1620-1667.

(2641.) Some have indeed been converted by reading, as Luther, Augustine, Junius, and others confess they were; but most commonly it is by hearing that men's souls come to live (Rom. x. 14). There is a blessing for readers; and there may be a fish or two caught in the net that is let down in a heap, but that is rare; it is not the net lapped up together, but haled out at length and spread all abroad, that bringeth in the draught: so it is the spreading out the word, the dilating on the matter in hand, which usually catcheth souls.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(2642.) If thou wouldst attain to divine knowledge, wait on the ministry of the word. As for those who neglect this, and come not where the word is preached, they do like one that should turn his back on the sun, that he may see it; if thou wouldst know God, come where He hath appointed thee to learn. Indeed, where the means are not, God hath extraordinary ways; as a father, if no school in town, will teach his child at home; but if there be a public school, thither he sends him. "God makes manifest, saith Paul, the savour of His knowledge by us in every place." Let men talk of the Spirit what they please: he will at last be found a quencher of the Spirit that is a despiser of prophecy; they both stand close together. "Quench not the Spirit, despise not prophesying."

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

Answer. What foolish pretences are these against the plain command of God and our own necessary duty! When God hath appointed you your duty, will He allow you to forsake it upon your own reason, as if you were wiser than God, and knew what will profit you better than He? If your physician give you a medicine, and bid you take it for the cure of your disease, will you be wiser than he, and say, Why may not such and such a thing serve my turn as well, or better? If you will needs be your own physician, and forsake God's direction, and cure yourselves, do it as well as you can, and what will become of it? It is a strange thing that a sottish sinner should think himself wiser than God, and take upon him to mend His word, and find out a better way to heaven than He hath prescribed him. . . .

Is it not horrible pride in you to think that you are able to understand the word of God as well without a teacher as with one? The cumach said to Philip, when he asked him whether he understood what he read, "How can I except some man should guide me?" And yet you think you can read the word at home as profitably without a guide; as if your children that go to school should say, "We have the same books at home, and therefore we will not go to school; our master doth but teach us grammar, and other books, and these we can read at home." You are wise men, that know no more of your own ignorance; and humble men, that think you have no need of teaching; as if God had appointed His ministers and ordinances in vain.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

3. Should be practised constantly.

(2644.) The apostle exhorts, "Let the word of Christ dwell in you," because it must not take up a night's lodging and so be gone, but it must have a continual residence and abode in our hearts. Though the ground be good, yet it must have the former and the latter rain to make it fertile: and yet many of us think to grow green with one shower, and to go unto heaven with one sermon.

—Henry Smith, 1593.

(2645.) It is the glory of God's word, not that it is come, but that it shall remain for ever: it is the glory of a Christian, not that he has heard, but that he desires to hear still. Are the angels weary of looking on that face of God which they looked on yesterday? Or are the saints wearying of singing that song which they sung to God's glory yesterday? And is not that Hallelujah, that song which is their morning and evening sacrifice, and which shall be their song world without end, called still "a new song"?

Do not you be weary of hearing those things which you have heard from others before.

—Donne, 1573-1631.

(2646.) A bucket may, for want of use and by standing dry, be so full of slits and rifts that all the water you take up with it runneth out; yet the often dipping it into the well, and filling it with water, will make it moister than otherwise it would have been, and more retentive. Thus it is with our memories in the things concerning God and the good of our souls, being very brittle and pertuse, they will hold very little or nothing at all; this must, therefore, be matter of great necessity to hear often, that the frequent inculcation of the same things may imprint that in our mind by often hearing, which others of more happy memories have got at the first.

—Gouge, 1575-1653.

(2647.) Children cannot suck long at a time, nor digest much; and therefore they need the more frequent returns of their meals. Such children are as believers in this world. "Precept must be upon precept, line upon line." The breast of the word must be often drawn, or else they cannot be nourished.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

you that it is my duty to eat every day? Or than a sick man will say, How prove you that I am bound to seek to the physician, to go or send to his house, and to look after him? As there is much in the very new nature, and health, and relish of a gracious soul, to decide such controversies as these without any subtlety of argument, so a Christian's prudence and care of his salvation will tell him, that when Christ hath a voice to speak to him, it becometh him to have an ear to hear; and that the sermon telleth the hearer the season of his duty, and the offer of a mercy telleth when it is our duty to accept it, without any other more particular obligation; unless when we can truly say as before God, that some duty that at that time is greater hindereth us. These are easy questions to those that savour the things of the Spirit. When Christ is speaking, Mary will be hearing; and lesser things shall not call her off.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

4. Should be preceded by appropriate preparation.

(2649.) A man will not keep the Sabbath in his working apparel, but will put on his richest jewels, and array himself in his best attire; and yet we make no scruple at all to come unto the Sabbath's exercise with a profane, and a wicked, and our working-day heart.

—Henry Smith, 1593.

(2650.) If we preach to hard hearts, it is like shooting against a brazen wall, the word doth not enter; it is like setting a gold seal upon marble which takes no impression. Oh, come to the word preached with a melting frame of heart! it is the melting wax receives the stamp of the seal; when the heart is in a melting frame, it will better receive the stamp of the word preached. When Paul's heart was melted and broken for sin, then "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" Come not hither with hard hearts; who can expect a crop when the seed is sown upon stony ground?

—Watson, 1696.

(2651.) Be acquainted with the failings of your hearts and lives, and come on purpose to get directions and helps against those particular failings. You will not know what medicine you need, much less how to use it, if you know not what aileth you. Know what duties you omit or carelessly perform, and know what sins you are most guilty of, and say when you go out of doors, I go to Christ for physic for my own disease. I hope to hear something before I come back which may help me more against this sin, and fit me better for my duty, or provoke me more effectually. Are those men like to practise Christ's direction that either know not their disease, or love it and would not have it cured?

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2652.) There is a great difference between a person who comes to church on Sunday morning with his heart hard from the world, and full of worldly cares, and running on his business or his pleasure all the time of service, and another who comes from his sacred devotion, from his reading of the Bible, from his solemn meditation on its truths, from his earnest prayer that God would bless the worship of His house. Now, how differently will these two engage in the worship of our Lord! The one comes with his soul ready warmed (as it were) to offer sacrifice; the fire is already burning on the altar. The other comes with his soul cold and hard; and, instead of beginning at once to worship, he needs first to try and begin to get ready to do so. What wonder, then, if the very same words which seem weary and heartless to the unprepared worshipper, should be full of interest and life to the prepared one? I wish heartily, my friends, that we were all more earnestly set to prepare before coming to God's house! It is curious, that with the needfulness of preparation so plain and so pressing, it should be so much neglected. Really the thing is too plain.

You know it would never do to bring out a locomotive engine without any fire in its furnace, and without any steam in its boiler, and fasten it to a train, and expect it to draw it away. No; the engine can draw the train when it has been prepared to do so; it cannot when it is not. And in like manner, unless a man gets up the fire, as it were, in his heart, before going to God's house, he cannot start off at once, so to speak, in God's worship. Would that we could always be sure, when we take our accustomed places here on the morning of each Lord's day, that hundreds of earnest prayers have gone up that morning already for a blessing in our worship; and that when we blend our supplications in one, and send them up in the sanctuary with a single voice, we are only continuing a pleasant work of communion with our God and Saviour, begun already in our own chambers and by our own firesides!

—Boyd.

(2653.) If privileged and professing hearers of the Gospel come short of the kingdom, the fault lies not in the seed—the fault lies not often or to a great extent even in the sower, although his work may have been feebly and unskillfully done. If the seed is good, and the ground well prepared, a very poor and awkward kind of sowing will suffice. Seed flung in any fashion into the soft ground will grow; whereas, if it fall on the wayside, it will bear no fruit, however artfully it may have been spread. My father was a practical and skilful agriculturist. I was wont, when very young, to follow his footsteps into the field, further and oftener than was convenient for him, or comfortable for myself. Knowing well how much a child is gratified by being permitted to imitate a man's work, he sometimes hung the seed-bag, with a few handfuls in it, upon my shoulder, and sent me into the field to sow. I contrived in some way to throw the grain away, and it fell among the clods. But the seed that fell from an infant's hands, when it fell in the right place, grew as well and ripened as fully as that which had been scattered by a strong and skilful man. In like manner, in the spiritual department, the skill of the sower, although important in its own place, is, in view of the final result, a subordinate thing. The cardinal points are the seed and the soil. In point of fact, throughout the history of the Church, while the Lord abundantly honoured His own ordinance of a standing ministry, He has never ceased to show, by granting signal success to feeble instruments, that results in His work are not necessarily proportionate to the number of talents employed.

Nor does that of failure, in the last resort, lie in the soil. The man who receives the Gospel only on the hard surface of a careless life, is of the same flesh and blood, endowed with the same understanding mind and immortal spirit, with his neighbour who has already become a new creature in Christ. Believers and unbelievers are possessed of the same nature and faculties. As the ground which has been trodden into the footpath is in all its essential qualities the same as that which has been broken small by the plough and harrow : so the human constitution and faculties of one who lives without God in the world, are substantially the same as those which belong to the redeemed of the Lord. It was the breaking of the ground which caused the difference between the fruitful field and the barren wayside. So those minds and hearts that now bear the fruits of faith were barren till they were broken ; and those on which the good seed has often been thrown, only to be thrown away, may yet yield an increase of a hundredfold to their owner, when conviction and repentance shall have rent them open to admit the word of life.

5. Should have for its end personal profit.

(2654.) As the little birds perk up their heads when their dam comes with meat, and prepare their beaks to take it, striving who shall catch most—now this looks to be served, and now that looks for a bit, and every mouth is open till it be filled : so you are here like birds, and we the dam, and the word the food. Therefore, you must prepare a mouth to take it. They who are hungry will strive for the bread which is cast among them, and think, "This is spoken to me," "This is spoken to me," "I have need of this," "And I have need of this." "Comfort, go thou to my fear!" "Promise, go thou to my distrust!" "Threatening, go thou to my security!" And the word shall be like a perfume, which has an odour for every one.

—Henry Smith, 1593.

(2655.) Many men take no pleasure in flowers, or care any further for them than to look upon them, to smell them, and have them in their hands ; but the bees draw from them both honey and wax, and the skilful apothecary maketh many medicines of them against divers and sundry diseases. Thus, many hear sermons only for their pleasure, for the elegancy of the style, delicacy of the words, smoothness of the language, and gracefulness of the delivery : this is but to make a nosegay to smell for a while, and cast it anon after into a corner—to hear the word gladly, but in time of temptation to fall away.

—Fonseca.

(2656.) In waiting on the ministry, attend to the doctrine as well as the precept ; the former is required to make thee a solid Christian, as the latter to make thee a warm and obedient one. Planting goes before watering, and so should teaching before exhorting.

—Gurnall, 1617-1619.

(2657.) If any of you are troubled with the itch of curiosity, and love to be wise above what is written, and delight to scan the choice mysteries of religion by carnal reason, and affect elegant expressions and seraphical notions, and the flowers of rhetoric, more than sound and wholesome truths, then you may ease yourselves, if you please, of the trouble of reading this following treatise ; only remember this, that the prudent husbandman looks more and delights more in the ripeness and soundness and goodness of the corn that is in his field, than he does at the beauty of the cockle ; and remember that no man can live more miserably than he that lives altogether upon sauces ; and he that looks more at the handsomeness than he does at the wholesomeness of the dishes of meat that are set before him, may well pass for a fool.

—Brooks, 1608-1680.

(2658.) It is a strange folly in multitudes of us to set ourselves no mark, to propound no end in the hearing of the Gospel.

The merchant sails not only that he may sail, but for traffic, and traffics that he may be rich.

The husbandman ploughs not only to keep himself busy with no further end, but ploughs that he may sow, and sows that he may reap with advantage.

And shall we do the most excellent and fruitful work fruitlessly? hear only to hear and look no further?

—Leighton, 1611-1684.

6. Wandering thoughts.

(2659.) Wandering thoughts in hearing rise out of the heart. These sparks come out of our own furnace. Vain thoughts are the mud which the heart, as a troubled sea, casts up. "For, from within, out of the heart of men, proceed evil thoughts."

—Watson, 1696.

7. Profitless hearing injurious.

—Cawdray, 1609.

8. Should be followed by meditation.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(2662.) Meditate often of it. "Mary kept all these things ;" how did she keep them? She "pondered them in her heart." Musing makes the fire to burn, and deep and constant thoughts are operative, not a glance or a slight view. The hen which straggles from her nest when she sits abroad producing nothing ; it is a constant incubation which hatches the young. So when we have only a few straggling thoughts, and do not set abroad upon a truth, when we have flashes only, like a little glance of a sunbeam upon a wall, it does nothing ; but serious and inculcative thoughts (through the Lord's blessing) will do the work.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(2663.) When you have heard the word, remember what you hear, and apply it to yourselves by serious inculcative thoughts. So when you read the word, do not only understand it, but think of it again and again. "Set your hearts to all the words which I testify among you this day," says Moses to the Israelites. So Christ says, "Let these sayings sink down into your ears." Truths never go to the quick of the affections but by their serious and ponderous thoughts. You will not lift up your hands till the truth sink into the heart. You read chapters, hear sermon after sermon ; they do not stir you, or it is but a little, for a fit, like a man that has been a little warming himself by the fire, and goes away, and is colder than he was before. O Christian, this means is not to be neglected, no more than reading and hearing, because of its great use, both for first conversion and for continual quickening.

(2664.) Meditation to the sermon is what the harrow is to the seed, it covers those truths which else might have been picked or washed away. I am afraid there are many proofs turned down at a sermon that are hardly turned up, and looked on any more when the sermon is done; and if so, you make others believe you are greater traders for your soul than you are indeed; as if one should come to a shop and lay by a great deal of rich ware, and when he hath done, goes away and never calls for it.
—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2665.) Press the word much upon your hearts after hearing. How great is the neglect of this application of the word of truth! Men will spend hours in hearing and not one minute in serious reflections; as if the word in their ears, or a receipt in their pockets, could cure the disease in the heart. This is the worm at the root of all our spiritual advantages. What is only dashed upon the fancy or lightly coloured, may be soon washed off. The soil must be made tenacious of the seed by the harrow of meditation, which hides it in the heart and covers it with earth; for want of being laid deep, and banded by serious meditation, the seed takes no root, because there is not much earth about it (Mark iv. 5, 6, 16). How can food nourish your body, unless it be concocted by natural heat? or spiritual food enliven you, unless concocted by meditation?
—Charnock, 1628-1680.

9. How the impressions produced by it are to be retained.

—Henry Smith, 1593.

(2667.) As market-folk returning from the market, will be talking of their markets as they go by the way, and be casting up of their pennyworths when they come home, reckon what they have taken and what they have laid out, and how much they have gotten; so should we, after we have heard the word publicly, confer privately of it with others, at least meditate on it by ourselves, and be sure to take an account of ourselves, how we have profited that day by the word that hath been spoken to us, and also by other religious exercises that have been used of us. And as the marketman counteth that but an ill market-day that he hath not gained somewhat more or less, so may we well account it an ill Sabbath day to us wherein we have not profited somewhat, wherein we have not increased our knowledge or been bettered in our affection, wherein we have not been either informed in judgment or reformed in practice, wherein we have added nothing to our talent.

—Gataker, 1574-1654.

(2668.) If ever you should be converted, use to consider frequently and seriously of those truths of God that must do the work. The word of God is pure and powerful to convert the soul, but can you look it should convert you, if you will not so much as soberly look upon it? How can that work upon your hearts which is out of your mind? It is you that must join with us for your own conversion, and do the rest of the work, when you come home; and not think that a sermon can do it; when you forget it and never mind it more. If you seek to the ablest physician for your body, he can but give you physic; it is you that must take it and keep it, and observe directions till it work. If you will presently cast it up again, how can it do you good? We tell you of those truths that are most useful to your conversion, and if you will take them home, and keep them and ponder of them when you are alone till they sink into your hearts, you may be happy men; but if you will cast them all up again, and will not be persuaded to bestow now and then a few of your deepest serious thoughts for the further entertainment of them, how should they do you saving good? If I could prevail with this congregation to be but considerate, and now and then to bestow some time to get the truth to their hearts, I should have great hopes of the conversion of you all; for light is stronger than darkness: if you would but open the window by consideration, and let it in, you should find the darkness presently dispelled, and it would be day with you that have sat in the shadow of death.
—Baxter, 1615-1691.

HEART, THE.

1. Is naturally corrupt.

(2669.) Because we see not this corruption work out in the strength of it, therefore we can hardly be persuaded of it; but all poisoned bodies die not presently. As wood-worms eat the heart of a board, when no hole appears in the top, so it is with lust, all outwardly seems well when corruption has taken deep hold of us.
—Bayne, 1616.

(2670.) That which Æsop said to his master, when he came into his garden and saw so many weeds in it, is applicable to the heart. His master asked him what was the reason that the weeds grew up so fast and the herbs thrived not? He answered, The ground is natural mother to the weeds, but a stepmother to the herbs. So the heart of man is natural mother to sin and corruption, but a stepmother to grace and goodness; and further than it is watered from heaven, and followed with a great deal of care and pains, it grows not.
—Goodwin, 1600-1679.

(2671.) Sometimes, indeed, there appears a scuffle between Satan and a carnal heart; but it is a mere cheat, like the fighting of two fencers on a stage. You would think at first they were in earnest; but observing how wary they are where they hit one another, you may soon know they do not mean to kill; and that which puts all out of doubt when the guise is done, you shall see them making merry together with what they have got of their spectators, which was all they fought for. When a carnal heart makes the greatest bustle against sin, by complaining of it, or praying against it, follow him but off the stage of duty (where he had gained the reputation of a saint, the prize he fights for), and you shall see them sit as friendly in a corner as ever.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2672.) Actions are a greater discovery of a principle than words. The testimony of works is louder and clearer than that of words, and the frame of men's hearts must be measured rather by what they do than by what they say. There may be a mighty distance between the tongue and the heart, but a course of action is as little guilty of lying as interest is, according to our common saying. All outward impieties are the branches of an atheism at the root of our nature, as all pestilential sores are expressions of the contagion in the blood. Sin is therefore frequently called ungodliness in our English dialect. Men's practices are the best indexes of their principles. The current of a man's life is the counterpart of the frame of his heart; who can deny an error in the spring or wheels when he perceives an error in the hand of the dial? Who can deny atheism in the heart when so much is visible in the life? The taste of the water discovers what mineral it is strained through.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(2673.) Our corrupted hearts are the factories of the devil, which may be at work without his presence; for when that circumventing spirit has drawn malice, envy, and all unrighteousness unto well-rooted habits in his disciples, iniquity then goes upon its own legs; and if the gates of hell were shut up for a time, vice would still be fertile and produce the fruits of hell. Thus, when God forsakes us, Satan also leaves us; for such offenders he looks upon as sure and sealed up, and his temptations then needless unto them.

—Sir Thomas Browne, 1605-1682.

—Erskine, 1685-1752.

(2675.) It is a mere fallacy to talk of the sins of a short life. The sinner is always a sinner. Put a pump into a river, you may throw out some water, but the river remains.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(2676.) Here is a piece of iron laid upon the anvil. The hammers are plied upon it lustily. A thousand sparks are scattered on every side. Suppose it possible to count each spark as it falls from the anvil; yet who could guess the number of the unborn sparks that still lie latent and hidden in the mass of iron? Now, brethren, your sinful nature may be compared to that heated bar of iron. Temptations are the hammers; your sins are the sparks. If you could count them (which you cannot do), yet who could tell the multitude of unborn iniquities—eggs of sin that lie slumbering in your souls? You must know this before you know the sinfulness of your nature. Our open sins are like the farmer's little sample which he brings to market.

There are granaries full at home. The iniquities that we see are like the weeds upon the surface soil; but I have been told, and indeed have seen the truth of it, that if you dig six feet into the earth and turn up fresh soil, there will be found in that soil six feet deep the seeds of the weeds indigenous to the land. And so we are not to think merely of the sins that grow on the surface, but if we could turn our heart up to its core and centre, we should find it is fully permeated with sin as every piece of putridity is with worms and rottenness.

—Spurgeon.

2. The carnal mind is enmity against God.

(2677.) The carnal mind is enmity against God. For was there ever a man who underwent a saving change that did not feel when he was converted that he was conquered, when he is sanctified that he is subdued? This enmity does not lie, as some fancy, in bad habits, education, or other such accidental and extraneous circumstances. It has its source in the mind itself. Regarded as a disease, it is not like a cold which any one may take, but a consumption which is constitutional and hereditary; and what are all these sins and crimes which the apostle describes as works of the flesh, but, like the flushed cheek, and languid eye, and throbbing temples, and bounding pulse of fever, the symptoms of an enmity that lies lurking in every heart? The temptations and circumstances that call out the enmity in so many different ways, and to so many different degrees, no more create it than the showers and sunshine create the deadly hemlock which has its seed in the soil.

Nor is this all the truth. Consumption, fell and deadly as it is, usually threatens and attacks but one organ. The constitution may be otherwise hale and sound. The best things, it may indeed be said, have their defects—there are spots in the sun, for instance; there is more or less of alloy in all gold; and weeds spring up to deform the fairest gardens. But, as is proved, whenever circumstances occur to call it out, this enmity affects the whole man; so that he is as much under its influence as every sail, yard, mast, and timber of a ship, are under the government of her helm. True, that does not always appear; but no more does the fire that sleeps in the cold flint, until there be a collision with steel; ah, see how it flashes out then—fire in every chip of the flint, in the whole texture and fabric of the stone. The carnal mind, according to Paul, not only has, but is, enmity against God. Enmity is of its very nature, as it is of the nature of grass to be green, or sugar to be sweet, or vinegar to be sour. If it were not so, man would not need to be born again, to get a new heart; like a watch that had but started a jewel, or lost the tooth of a wheel, it were enough to be repaired without being renewed.

—Guthrie.

(2678.) What a plain and affecting proof of this have we in that history of our blessed Lord, which is not more a beautiful exhibition of love on God's part, than a hateful one of hatred on man's. Here is the thing so put to the proof that there is no occasion for speculation, nor any room for dispute. Here is God incarnate; here is God in Christ; in the most favourable of all circumstances for man—God in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself, coming not to condemn the world, but that the world by Him might be saved. And did He find in men friends or foes? I once saw the poor, pale, cold corpse of a beautiful little girl taken out of the roaring flood in which her father—he was a drunkard—when drowning himself, drowned her; monster, and slave of vice, he was seen to raise his hand in the black swirling pool, and lay it on her young head, pressing it down till he and she both sank together. But fancy a drowning man raising himself before he sank, and putting forth his dying strength to wound a hand stretched out to save him—to plunge a knife into the heart of a kind man who had perilled his own life to save his. What hatred were that, which could prompt to so black a deed! Yet, when they dragged Him to the rock of Nazareth to cast Him over, when the kiss of Judas was on His cheek, when the cry of “Crucify Him” was in His ear, when the thorns pierced His brows, and the iron nailed Him to the cross, did not God in Christ feel that He had come not to save His friends, but to save His enemies? I would hold any man my enemy that would kill my son; and if men by nature were not God’s enemies, why did they kill His Son? why do they still reject Him? The letters did not burn so bright on the plaster of Belshazzar’s wall, nor does the sun shine brighter in the heavens, than these words on the cross—he that runneth may read them—“Herein is love, indeed, not that we loved God, but that He loved us, and sent His Son to be the propitiation for our sins.” —Guthrie.

(2679.) Men say, “It is impossible that I should have an emotion of hatred towards God, and never know it. Do you suppose I should not know fire if it touched me? Do you suppose that if a man were to put caustic on me I should not know it? And do you suppose I could have a feeling of hatred towards God and never be conscious of it?” There is such a thing as latent hatred, that must be inflamed before it will manifest itself. Men say, “Do you suppose I could carry fire in my bosom and not know it? I have felt myself a hundred times, and I am not hot.” But there may be fire raked up as well as fire in full glow. There may be a susceptibility of heart that stands prepared, like powder in magazines, to be ignited. A man may be like a military fortification, with implements of war of every kind, ready to be brought into requisition the moment the signal gun is fired. But it is a military fortification, though the signal gun may never have been fired, and though not one of these implements have ever been brought into requisition. It is a military fortification, though a particle of powder may never have been exploded in it. It was built for war from foundation to turret, and all the implements it contains were made for war, and they are in readiness to be applied to the purposes of war when the proper time shall come.

Now look at the soul—castellated, fortified, provisioned, armed. Though the day may not have come when its mighty implements have been used, yet they are ready to be used at any moment when the proper circumstances arise. A man may have qualities of mind which do not manifest themselves in his life, because the circumstances necessary to bring them into action do not exist.

It is charged, not that every man has come to a flagrant outbreak in opposition to the Divine Being, but that every man has elements that are opposed to the Divine Being, which, the moment he is brought to a realisation of God’s authority, will develop their real character. You are not obliged, in order to be at enmity with God, to say to Him in so many words, “I will not have Thee to reign over me.” Whether spoken or not, that is the natural language of the unconverted human heart. —Becher.

3. The difficulty of knowing it.

(2680.) The heart is deep, and, like Ezekiel’s vision, presents so many chambers of imagery, one within another, that it requires time to get a considerable acquaintance with it, and we shall never know it thoroughly. It is now more than twenty-eight years since the Lord began to open mine to my own view; and from that time to this almost every day has discovered to me something which till then was unobserved; and the farther I go, the more I seem convinced that I have entered but a little way. A person that travels in some parts of Derbyshire may easily be satisfied that the country is cavernous; but how large, how deep, how numerous the caverns may be, which are hidden from us by the surface of the ground, and what is contained in them, are questions which our picest inquiries cannot fully answer. Thus I judge of my heart, that it is very deep and dark, and full of evil; but as to particulars, I know not one of a thousand. —Newton, 1725–1807.

4. It is known to God.

(2681.) He who makes a watch or engine, knows all the workmanship in it. God, that made the heart, knows all the motions and fallacies of it.

—Watson, 1696.

(2682.) God sees hearts as we see faces.

—George Herbert.

(2683.) Before men we stand as opaque bee-hives. They can see the thoughts go in and out of us, but what work they do inside of a man they cannot tell. Before God we are as glass bee-hives, and all that our thoughts are doing within us He perfectly sees and understands. —Becher.

5. It is tested by temptation.

(2684.) The force of gunpowder is not known until some spark light on it; and oftentimes the stillest natures, if crossed, discover the deepest corruptions. —Sibbes, 1577–1635.

(2685.) As dust settles, and lies as quietly as if it had no existence, but is stirred and raised by the slightest breath of wind, so it sometimes seems as if sin no longer dwelt within us, but was vanquished and annihilated, and we freed from all restraint to serve God in a pure and blameless life; and yet no sooner does opportunity occur, than sin makes its appearance, and we discover that we have much more of the world in our hearts than we had ever supposed. —Scriven, 1629–1693.

(2686.) In a vessel filled with muddy water, the thickness visibly subsides to the bottom, and leaves the water purer and clearer, until at last it seems perfectly limpid. The slightest motion, however, brings the sediment again to the top, and makes the water thick and turbid as before. Here we have an emblem of the human heart. The heart is full of the mud of sinful lusts and carnal desires; and the consequence is, that no pure water—that is, good and holy thoughts—can flow from it. It is, in truth, a miry pit and slough of sin, in which all sorts of ugly reptiles are bred and crawl. Many a one, however, is deceived by it, and never imagines his heart half so wicked as it really is, because at times its lusts are at rest, and sink, as it were, to the bottom. On such occasions his thoughts appear to be holy and devout, his desires pure and temperate, his words charitable and edifying, and his works useful and Christian. But this lasts only so long as he is not moved; I mean so long as he is without opportunity or incitement to sin. Let that occur, and worldly lusts rise so thick that his whole thoughts, words, and works show no trace of anything but slime and impurity. This man is meek as long as he is not thwarted; but cross him, and he is like powder, ignited by the smallest spark, and blazing up with a loud report and destructive force. Another is temperate so long as he has no social companions; a third chaste while the eyes of men are upon him.

—Scriber, 1629-1693.

(2687.) Temptation is the fire that brings up the scum of the heart. The corrupt heart resembles an ant's nest, on which, while the stone lies, none of them appear. But take off that, and stir them with only the point of a straw, what a swarm is there, and how lively they are! Just such a sight, O man, would thy heart afford thee, did the Lord but withdraw the restraint He has laid upon it, and suffer Satan to stir it up by temptation.

—Boston, 1676-1732.

6. Its suitors.

(2688.) Man, as soon as he was made, had two great suitors for his life and soul: Virtue, Vice. They both travelled the world with trains, harbingers, and large attendance.

Virtue had before her Truth running naked, valiant, but inelegant; then Labour, Cold, Hunger, Thirst, Care, Vigilance, and these but poorly arrayed, and she in plain though clean attire. But looking near, she was of such a self-perfection, that she might very well emblem whatsoever Omnipotency could make most rare. Modest she was; and so lovely that whosoever looked but steadfastly upon her could not but insoul himself in her. After her followed Content, full of jewels, coin, perfumes, and all the massy riches of the world. Then Joy, with maskers, mirth, revelling, and all essential pleasures. Next Honour, with all the ancient orders of nobility, sceptres, thrones, and crowns imperial. Lastly, Glory, shaking such a brightness from her many tresses, that, I have heard, no man could ever come so near as to describe her truly. And behind all these came Eternity, casting a ring about them, which, like a strong enchantment, made them for ever the same. Thus Virtue.

Vice thus: Before her, first went Lying, a smooth painted housewife, clad in all in changeable, but, under her garments, full of scabs and ugly ulcers; she spoke pleasingly, and promised whatsoever could be wished for, in behalf of her mistress, Vice. Upon her Wit waited, a conceited fellow, and one that much took man with his pretty tricks and gambols. Next, Sloth and Luxury, so full that they were after choked with their own fat. Then (because she could not have the true ones, for they follow Virtue) she gets impostors to personate Content, Joy, Honour, in all their wealth and royalties. After these she comes herself, sumptuously apparelled, but a nasty surfeited slut; whereby, if any kissed her, they were sure by her breath to perish. After her, followed on a sudden, like enemies in ambush, Guilt, Horror, Shame, Loss, Want, Sorrow, Torment; these charmed with Eternity's ring as the other.

And thus they wooed fond man.

—Felltham, 1668.

7. The determining power of the life.

(2689.) As the sun rises first, and then the beasts arise from their dens, the fowls from their nests, and men from their beds; so when the heart sets forward to God, all the members will follow after it—the tongue will praise Him, the foot will follow Him, the ear will attend Him, the eye will watch Him, the hand will serve Him, nothing will stay after the heart, but every one goes like handmaids after their mistress.

Therefore Solomon, picking out the heart for God (Prov. xxiii. 26), spake as though he would set out the pleasantest, and fairest, and easiest way to serve Him, without any grudging, or toil, or weariness. Touch but the first link, and all the rest will follow. So set the heart agoing, and it is like the poise of a clock, which turns all the wheels one way. Such an oil is upon the heart which makes all nimble and current about it. Therefore it is almost as easy to speak well and do well, as to think well. If the heart indite a good matter, no marvel though the tongue be the pen of a ready writer. But if the heart be dull, all is like a left hand so inapt and untoward that it cannot turn itself to any good.

—Henry Smith, 1593.

(2690.) When the citadel of the heart is won, the turret of the understanding will not long hold out.

—Adams, 1653.

—Sanderson, 1587-1662.

(2692.) The bowl runs as the bias inclines it; the ship moves as the rudder steers it; and the mind thinks according to the predominancy of vice or virtue in it.

The heart of man is like the spring of the clock, which causes the wheels to move right or wrong, well or ill. If the heart once set forward for God, all the members will follow after; all the parts, like dutiful handmaids, in their places, will wait on their mistress.

The heart is the great workhouse where all sin is wrought before it is exposed to open view. It is the mint where evil thoughts are coined, before they are current in our words or actions. It is the forge where all our evil works as well as words are hammered out. There is no sin but is dressed in the withdrawing room of the heart, before it appears on the stage of life.

It is vain to go about an holy life, till the heart be made holy. The pulse of the hand beats well or ill, according to the state of the heart. If the links of the ship are unstopped, it will be to no purpose to labour at the pump. When the water is foul at the bottom, no wonder that scum and filth appear at the top. There is no way to stop the issue of sin, but by drying up the matter that feeds it.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(2693.) If we desire a true reformation, let us begin on reforming our hearts and lives, in keeping Christ's commandments. All outward forms and models of reformation, though they be never so good in their kind, yet they are of little worth to us without this inward reformation of the heart. Tin, or lead, or any baser metal, if it be cast into never so good a mould and made up into never so elegant a figure, yet it is but tin or lead still; it is the same metal that it was before. If adulterate silver, that has much alloy or dross in it, have never so current a stamp put upon it, yet it will not pass when the touchstone tries it. We must be reformed within, with a spirit of fire and a spirit of burning, to purge us from the dross and corruption of our hearts, and refine us as gold and silver, and then we shall be reformed truly, and not before.

—Cudworth, 1617-1688.

8. Its strength for evil.

(2694.) This weak heart is strong in passions, violent in desires, irresistible in its appetites, impatient in its lusts, furious in anger: here are strengths enough, one should think. But so have I seen a man in a fever, sick and distempered, unable to walk, less able to speak sense, or to do an act of counsel; and yet, when his fever had boiled up to a delirium, he was strong enough to beat his nurse-keeper and his doctor too, and to resist the loving violence of all his friends, who would fain bind him down to reason and his bed; and yet we still say, he is weak, and sick unto death. For these strengths of madness are not health, but furiousness and disease; it is weakness another way. And so are the strengths of a man's heart; they are fetters and manacles; strong, but they are the cordage of imprisonment; so strong, that the heart is not able to stir.

—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

9. Must be kept with all diligence.

(2695.) Our heart is like a mill, ever grinding, which a certain lord gave in charge to his servant, enjoining that he should only grind in it his master's grain, whether wheat, barley, or oats, and telling him that he must subsist on the produce. But that servant has an enemy who is always playing tricks on the mill. If any moment he finds it unwatched, he throws in gravel to keep the stones from acting, or pitch to clog them, or dirt and chaff to mix with the meal. If the servant is careful in tending his mill, there flows forth a beautiful flour, which is at once a service to his master and a subsistence to himself; but if he plays the truant, and allows his enemy to tamper with the machinery, the bad outcome tells the tale, his lord is angry, and he himself is starved.

This mill ever grinding is the heart ever thinking. God has given one to each man to guard and tend, and bids him grind in it only those thoughts which He Himself supplies. Some of these thoughts are fine wheat—meditations concerning God Himself. Others are like barley—for instance, when the soul strives to ascend from one virtue to another. And others still are like oats—desires, for example, to break off bad habits, which desires are good thoughts, although not of the highest order. These thoughts God would have us keep continually revolving in our minds. But the devil is man's adversary, and if at any moment he finds the heart empty of good thoughts, he instantly throws in some bad ones. Some of these bad thoughts—such as wrath and envy—dissipate the mind; others—such as sensuality and luxury—clog its action; and others—such as vain imaginations—fill up the place of better thoughts. But if a man carefully watch over his heart, and keep holy thoughts revolving in it, then through the aperture of the mill—the mouth—come wholesome and profitable words, and his very seeing, hearing, smelling, and tasting, take the complexion of his inward thoughts, and become pure and holy also (Matt. xv. 18-20; xii. 34, 35). By such meditations he fulfils the will of God, and builds up his own everlasting life. But if he allows the devil to tamper with his heart, and corrupt it, the vicious produce of his evil thoughts comes forth to view; and whilst the Most High is exceedingly displeased, the fruit to the man himself is not life but death.

—Anselm, 1093.

—Cawdray, 1609.

(2697.) Our hearts, like the plummets of a clock, draw us with the weight of their corruption downward, till they pitch themselves and rest upon earthly vanities, unless every day, yea, many times a day, we pull them up, and give spiritual motion to them by Christian exercises.

—Downham, 1644.

(2698.) This heart of ours is the best or the worst ground that lies between heaven and earth. The worst, if it be thorny, weedy, miry; but if fair, pleasant, fruitful, it is the best. There be two that lay claim to it; and howsoever the property be God's, for He made it, yet Satan will try His title, and sues to have it.

First, let us weed this ground, and that betimes, for old weeds will hardly be destroyed. Sins are weeds, the weeding-hook is repentance: let not a weed appear, but presently by contrition cut it down. God indeed said of another field, and in another sense, "Let both grow together until the harvest;" but it must not be so here, for then the weeds will eat out the corn.

Secondly, keep it in heart; for if the soul have not her cheerings, she will grow faint and barren. The way to keep thy heart in heart, is by devout prayers, meditation, hearing the word, and receiving that which is the food of the soul, the blessed sacrament.

Thirdly, look to the expiration of thy farm, and be sure to leave it in good case ; that when the great Landlord shall call the tenant out of the tenement, the soul from the body, it may be entertained into His own house, the glorious court of heaven.

Fourthly and lastly, be sure to pay thy rent always, and that is thankfulness.

(2699.) Keep a constant watch over your hearts. David desires God to "set a watch before the doors of his lips," much more should we desire that God would keep the door of our hearts. We should have grace stand there as sentinel especially, for words have an outward bridle : they may disgrace a man and impair his interest and credit, but thoughts are unknown if undiscovered by words. If a man know what time the thief would come to rob him, he would watch. We know we have thieves within us to steal away our hearts ; therefore, when they are so near us, we should watch against a surprise, and the more carefully, because they are so extraordinarily sudden in their rise and quick in their motion. Our minds are like idle schoolboys that will be frisking from one place to another if the master's back be turned, and playing instead of learning. Let a strict hand be kept over our affections, those wild beasts within us, because they many times force the understanding to pass a judgment according to their pleasure, not its own sentiment.

—Charnock, 1620-1680.

(2700.) He that will keep water in a sieve, must use more than ordinary diligence. Our heart is a leaky vessel ; and therefore we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard, lest at any time we should let them slip.

—Bunyan, 1628-1688.

(2701.) Gotthold ordered a pasture in his garden to be dressed afresh, and planted with all varieties of bulbs. The work, when finished, suggested to him the following reflections. Although the gardener has exercised his skill upon this plot of ground, and given it a form, which adds greatly to its beauty, nevertheless like other earth, it still retains the wilderness of its nature, and unless carefully kept, would, ere long, be overgrown with weeds. It is the same with the hearts of God's children. No doubt they have experienced a blessed regeneration, have become other men, and by the grace, word, and Spirit of their heavenly Father, have had their hearts transformed and renewed. Still innate sinfulness continues lurking within them, and must daily be kept under, by repentance and prayer, struggles and holy resolutions. They who are sincerely pious, do indeed forsake sin, but sin does not forsake them.

—Scriven, 1629-1693.

(2702.) A lute is made of common and soft timber, and has not itself, but the hand of the workman, to thank for fashioning it into what it is. In like manner a Christian has no distinction above other men, save that the hand of a merciful God has made him a vessel of grace. As a lute requires to be strung and skillfully tuned and touched, so must the finger of God furnish the heart with good thoughts, and then adjust them to the honour of His Name. However beautiful a lute may be, it is easily put out of tune, and therefore needs continual care. And so does our Christianity. Disattuned by the devil, the wicked world, and our own perverse will, it would sound harshly, did not the gracious hand of the Most High daily regulate and correct it.

At the same time, let us remember what duties are ours. If we labour to tune a lute, that its sound may not grate upon human ears, why do we not take equal pains to harmonise and regulate our thoughts, words, and works, that they may not offend the sharp eyes and ears of the Most High ! We hear at once if but a single string is out of tune ; and yet we often neither mark nor care for the discord between our life and walk and God's holy commandments. Men instantly tell us of the false note in our music ; and let us also, my friend, admonish each other, when we perceive a flaw or discord in our Christianity.

Lord Jesus ! tune, regulate, and mould my life, to make it consonant with Thine. It is true that my strings are weak, and cannot sustain so high a pitch as Thy perfection. I console myself, however, with the thought, that as in this lute there are higher and lower clefs, so among Christians there are both the strong and the weak ; and Thou art satisfied with both, provided only they are not false.

—Scriven, 1629-1693.

(2703.) We must shut our heart against pride, against sensuality, and all the other passions, as one shuts the doors and windows that nobody may be able to get in.

—Vianney.

(2704.) It is in the motions of a tempted soul to sin, as in the motions of a stone falling from the brow of a hill ; it is easily stopped at first, but when once it is set a going, who shall stay it ? And therefore, it is the greatest wisdom in the world to observe the first motions of the heart, to check and stop sin there. The motions of sin are weakest at first : a little care and watchfulness may prevent much mischief now, which the careless heart, not heeding, is presently brought within the power of temptation, as the Syrians were brought blindfold into the midst of Samaria before they knew where they were.

—Salter, 1840.

(2705.) "Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life." Keep it in the daily, hourly tempers, habits, musings, and imaginations. I sometimes think that we Protestants are under some heavy disadvantages here. We make so much of sin in the gross, and confess in general terms so abjectly, that we pass over the minor faults, defects, slips of temper, or conduct, which make so much of the present pain or pleasure of life, and are busily building beneath the surface, like the coral insects, the edifice of the future, shaping thereby the destinies of eternity. The confessional is a mighty instrument for dealing with these little sins. We have abolished it in stern indignation, and justly. But we can only afford to dispense with it, when we confess ourselves more humbly and examine ourselves more rigidly before God than before the priest. Watch the little sins narrowly, and handle them sternly ; it will spare you trouble with the great ones. Meet the tempter on the threshold and beat him back, you will escape a death struggle in the very citadel of your life.

—J. B. Brown.

10. Importance of keeping it well employed.

(2706.) The heart is like a mill : if the wind or water be violent, the mill will go whether the miller will or not; yet he may choose what kind of grain it shall grind, wheat or darnel. If the affections be strong and passionate, the heart may be working; yet the Christian, by grace, may keep out lust, and supply it with good thoughts. —Adams, 1654.

(2707.) Man's heart is like a millstone: pour in corn, and round it goes, bruising and grinding, and converting it into flour; whereas give it no corn, and then indeed the stone goes round, but only grinds itself away, and becomes ever thinner and smaller and narrower. Even so the heart of man requires to have always something to do; and happy is he who continually occupies it with good and holy thoughts, otherwise it may soon consume and waste itself by useless anxieties or wicked and carnal suggestions. When the millstones are not nicely adjusted, grain may indeed be poured in, but comes away only half ground or not ground at all. The same often happens with our heart, when our devotion is not sufficiently earnest. On such occasions we read the finest texts without knowing what we have read, and pray without hearing our own prayers. The eye flits over the sacred page, the mouth pours forth the words and clappers like a mill, but the heart meanwhile turns from one strange thought to another; and such reading and such prayer are more a useless form than a devotion acceptable to God. —Scriven, 1629-1693.

(2708.) Our minds are restless, and will be employed either upon what is good, or upon what is evil. The mind of man is as a mill-wheel, continually turning about, and drenching in the waters. Our hearts are as a stirring child, that cannot endure to sit still. No virgin has so many suitors for her love, as our minds for their thoughts. The sun may as soon be stopped from his race, as the heart from its thinking. We are all in this respect like the sea, which cannot rest, but is ever in motion. Is not he a foolish miller, that turns the water, which should grind his corn, into the highway, where it does no good? And is not he a foolish Christian, that employs those thoughts about needless toys, which should help to provide him spiritual food? As the natural heat will be ever working,—if it have not food to digest, it will prey upon the spirits, and destroy itself,—so the mind of man will be always busy; if not in thinking of the excellencies of God, or the love of Christ, or the beauty and necessity of holiness, then in speculative wantonness, or contemplative wickedness, in ambitious fancies, or revengeful desires. We are like a boat swimming against the tide: there is no standing still; if the oar be left that we go not forward, the tide will carry us strongly backward. If the ground be not sown with good seed, it will of itself bring forth evil seeds. —Swinnock, 1673.

11. When pure is a dwelling-place for God.

(2709.) "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." A pure heart is more precious in the sight of God than aught else on earth. A pure heart is a fair, fitly adorned chamber, the dwelling of the Holy Ghost, a golden temple of the God-head; a sanctuary of the only-begotten Son, in which He worships the Heavenly Father; an altar of the grand, Divine sacrifice, on which the Son is daily offered to the Heavenly Father. A pure heart is the throne of the Supreme Judge; the seat and secret chamber of the Holy Trinity; a lamp bearing the Eternal Light; a secret council-chamber of the Divine Persons; a treasury of divine riches; a storehouse of divine sweetness; a panoply of eternal wisdom; a cell of divine solitude; the reward of all the life and sufferings of Christ. A pure heart is a tabernacle of the Holy Father; a bride of Christ; a friend of the Holy Ghost; a delight to the eyes of all saints; a sister of the angels; a cause of joy to the heavenly hosts; a brother of all good men; a terror to the devil; a victory and conquest over all temptation; a weapon against all assaults; a reservoir of divine benefits; a treasury of all virtue; an example to all men; a restoration of all that has ever been lost. Now, what is a pure heart? It is, as we have said before, a heart which finds its whole and only satisfaction in God, which relishes and desires nothing but God, whose thoughts and intents are ever occupied with God, to which all that is not of God is strange and jarring, which keeps itself as far as possible apart from all unworthy images, and joys, and griefs, and all outward cares and anxieties, and makes all these work together for good; for to the pure all things are pure, and to the gentle is nothing bitter. —Tauler, 1340.

(2710.) Thy alms to the poor, thy counsel to the simple, thy inheritance to thy children, thy tribute to Caesar, but thy heart to God. He who is a spirit, requires the spirit, and delights to dwell in the hearts of men. Here God plants Himself as in a castle, which is always besieged with the world, the flesh, and the devil. If the enemy get a thought, or a word, or a work, yet he has but razed the walls. But if he take the heart, then the fortress is lost. For that time all our thoughts, words, and works are captive unto him: he bids them go, and they go; do, and they do it. —Henry Smith, 1593.

(2711.) My heart, when it is whole and at the best, is but a strait and unworthy lodging for God. If it were bigger and better, I would reserve it all for Him. Satan may look in at my doors by a temptation, but he shall not have so much as one chamber room set apart for him to sojourn in. —Hall, 1574-1656.

12. A picture of what the heart should be.

(2712.) Like those fair New England lakes, greened around with meadows, of translucent depth and silver sand, on whose surface armies of white lilies, golden-crowned, unfold to the sun, so the Christian's heart should be. All its feelings and affections should open into life like those white lilies, and deep amid the blossom petals should be seen the golden crown of love. —Becher.

HEAVEN.

1. A place as well as a state of being.

(2713.) Each man has a separate and individual, though, perhaps, an indistinct idea of his own of what heaven may be. To some it is merely a state. It is all within. We may carry it about with us wherever we go, in the perfect rest of a conscience washed in blood, a soul fully conscious of its acquittal from condemnation, the joy of spiritual fellowship with Christ and the Father, the love which ever gushes forth in the sublime language of praise, as we sing, "Whom having not seen we love; in whom though now we see Him not, yet believing, we rejoice with joy unspeakable, and full of glory." To others it is all associated with a place. There must be trees, rivers, golden pavements, jasper walls, harps of gold, bejewelled crowns, companies of angelic beings, all the insignia of a royal life, a grand tableau, in which they shall share, majestic spectacles in which they shall bear their part. Probably a combination of both ideas will furnish us with the most appropriate representation of those heavenly delights which we hope soon to share. Take two men of kindred purity of spirit. Let one dwell amid the gloom of dark ravines, where the chill atmosphere is never warmed by the genial rays of the sun, where overhanging rocks make perpetual gloom, where no music save that of the hoarse cataract is ever heard, where the song birds never come, the dew-drops never glint, flowers never shed perfume on the breeze, and the only vegetation is the loathsome fungi that finds its congenial home amid the darkness. Let another dwell in a sweet sylvan nook, a quiet cottage in the bosom of the laughing valley, whence he can see the heather bells, and smell the brier rose, or go forth and sit at the lake-side amid the shade of birch and pine and aspen, while the rich breezes from the mountains on either hand pour torrents of life through his veins. Can you doubt which will be the happier of the two? Surely he who possesses the purity within, and enjoys the heaven without. The state and the place combine together to make the happiness so far complete. —G. D. Evans.

2. Imperfectness of our knowledge concerning it.

(2714.) If one should come from a strange country, never known and discovered before, and should only tell us, in general, that it was a most pleasant and delightful place, and the inhabitants, a brave, and generous, and wealthy people, under the government of a wise and great king, ruling by excellent laws; and that the particular delights and advantages of it were not to be imagined by anything he knew in our own country, and should say no more of it: if we gave credit to the person that brought this relation, it would create in us a great admiration of the country described to us, and a mighty concern to see it, and live in it. But it would be a vain curiosity to reason and conjecture about the particular conveniences of it; because it would be impossible, by any discourse, to arrive at the certain knowledge of any more than he who only knew it was pleased to tell us.

This is the case as to our heavenly country. Our blessed Saviour, who "came down from heaven," from "the bosom of His Father," hath revealed to us a state of happiness and glory in general, that there is such "a kingdom prepared for us;" and when He was leaving the world, He told us, that He was going thither by the way of the grave; and when He was risen again from the dead, and was ascended into heaven, He promised to come again at the end of the world, and to raise us out of the grave, and to carry us into those celestial mansions, "where we shall be for ever with the Lord." And beyond this He hath made no particular discovery to us of the felicity of that place; He hath given us no punctual representation of the glory of it; He hath not declared to us, in a special manner, what our work and employment shall be, in what way God will communicate Himself to us, nor what kind of conversation we shall have with the blessed angels, and with one another, and how far we shall know, or be known, to one another; or whether we shall stand affected in any particular manner to those who were our friends, and relations, and acquaintance in this world. These and perhaps a thousand things more, which may concern the glories of that state, and the happiness and employment of the "spirits of just men made perfect," our Saviour hath told us nothing of, but only in general; and it is impossible for us with any certainty to make out the rest, any more than children can make a conjecture of the designs and reasonings of a wise man; not only because it would be of no great use to us, but because the imperfection of human nature, and of our faculties in this state of mortality, is not able to bear a full and clear representation of so great glory. —Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(2715.) Reflect, how little of the future and the unseen can be known by mere description; how faint and imperfect a view you can get of anything by a mere statement; how little you know of a landscape, a waterfall, a picture, by any description that can be given. Especially must this be so of objects which have no resemblance to anything that we have seen. Who ever obtained any idea of Niagara by a description? Who, say to the most polished Greek and Roman mind, could have conveyed by mere description any idea of the printing-press, of a locomotive engine, of the magnetic telegraph? Who could convey to one born blind an idea of the prismatic colours; or to the deaf an idea of sounds? And when you think how meagre in the Bible is the description of heaven; when you think how easy it would have been to furnish a more minute description; are you certain that human language could have communicated to you the great and bright conception; or that, if words could have been found, they would have conveyed to you an exact idea of a state so different from what is our condition here?

—Barnes, 1798-1870.

(2716.) Of mankind in glory, thus perfected, what shall be the employ? For I need hardly press it on you that it is impossible to conceive of man in a high and happy estate, without an employment worthy of that estate, and in fact constituting its dignity and happiness.

Now some light is thrown on this inquiry by Holy Scripture, but it must be confessed that it is very scanty. It is true that all our meditations on, and descriptions of, heaven want balance, and are, so to speak, pictures ill composed. We first build up our glorified human nature by such hints as are furnished us in Scripture; we place it in an abode worthy of it; and then after all we give it an unending existence with nothing to do. It was not ill said by a great preacher, that most people's idea of heaven was that it is to sit on a cloud and sing psalms. And others again strive to fill this out with the bliss of recognising and holding intercourse with those from whom we have been severed on earth. And beyond all doubt such recognition and intercourse shall be, and shall constitute, one of the most blessed accessories of the heavenly employment; but it can no more be that employment itself than similar intercourse on earth was the employment of life itself here. To read some descriptions of heaven, one would imagine that it were only an endless prolongation of some social meeting; walking and talking in some blessed country with those whom we love. It is clear that we have not thus provided the renewed energies and enlarged powers of perfected man with food for eternity. Nor if we look in another direction, that of the absence of sickness and care and sorrow, shall we find any more satisfactory answer to our question. Nay, rather shall we find it made more difficult and beset with more complication. For let us think how much of employment for our present energies is occasioned by, and finds its very field of action in, the anxieties and vicissitudes of life. They are, so to speak, the winds which fill the sail and carry us onward. By their action, hope and enthusiasm are excited. But suppose a state where they are not, and life would become a dead calm; the sail would flap idly, and the spirit would cease to look onward at all. So that unless we can supply something over and above the mere absence of anxiety and pain, we have not attained to, nay, we are farther than ever from, a sufficient employment for the life eternal. Now, before we seek for it in another direction, let us think for a moment in this way. Are we likely to know much of it? We have before in these sermons adopted St. Paul's comparison by analogy, and have likened ourselves here to children and that blessed state to our full development as men. Now ask yourselves, what does the child at its play know of the employments of the man? Such portions of them as are merely external and material he may take in, and represent in his sport; but the work and anxiety of the student at his book, or the man of business at his desk, these are of necessity entirely hidden from the child. And so it is onward through the advancing stages of life. Of each of them it may be said, "We know not with what we must serve the Lord, until we come thither."

So that we need not be utterly disappointed, if our picture of heaven be at present ill composed: if it seem to be little else than a gorgeous mist after all. We cannot fill in the members of the landscape at present. If we could, we should be in heaven.

—Alford, 1810-1871.

(2717.) Does it not sometimes seem strange to you, that we know so very little of the country beyond the grave? Sometimes this is borne in upon us with a startling clearness; how little distinct idea we have of what kind of place it is; its scenery, its homes, its occupations. The veil between this world and that is so thick; so impossible for us to see through. And yet we ourselves in a little, perhaps a very little, must go there; that is certain. If it were only a distant place in this world we were going to; if we knew that in a little something would come that would make it necessary that we should leave our present homes, our children and friends, and these scenes we know, and go away, all alone, to a distant and unknown land,—how anxious we should be to learn all we could about it,—the place, the people, the occupations, the kind of life? Surely we should not be less anxious now, because in a little we are going, not to another place in this world, where we could be sure that many things would be much as they are here;—where a sun would rise and a sun would set,—where we should live in some kind of dwelling, on some kind of food,—see human faces,—work, grow weary, rest, sleep, wake again,—but into a new and unknown world, where everything may be strange, where many things must be so! We, ourselves, will some day go away from this place, we know not how, passing away from human sight and knowledge,—and enter into another world; we shall waken up from death, and find ourselves there. Strange, to know so little of a place which we shall see so surely; which we may see so soon!

But there is something even stranger to think of. It is future, our going to that unknown place; and we are able to put away from us, more than is good for us, the thought of things in what we think the far future. But think that at this very time, in this very moment, some who were the dearest to us in this world are in that distant land; have been for time longer or shorter. The father and mother are there, of most who have reached middle age; brothers and sisters, once so united: little children, whom Jesus, as of old, called to Himself. We went with them to the furthest edge of this life; but as they crossed the threshold of the other world they became unseen by us; there was no further trace of them: there is no communication from them, no word of what they are doing there. You know how anxious you are when your child has gone out from your home to some distant place, to know all about the way in which he arranges his life; every little thing, nothing to a stranger, is so precious to you. Tell us everything, you write; whom you see, what you do; every little homely detail of life; where you take your walk; everything! But when the child goes to the other world, the parent is in blank ignorance of all details of his life; when the father goes, whose ways we knew so thoroughly, we are in utter darkness as to his life there. What is he thinking about? We knew so well what he used to think about here! We knew the chair in which he sat; the table at which he wrote; how he divided out his day. How about these things there? What scenes do they live among that left us; what are they like: what change has passed upon their affections, likings, ways; what are they doing just this afternoon; what were they doing when we sunk into sleep last night, when we awoke this morning? Are they thinking there of those they loved so much here? It is strange, when we think of it, very strange, that we know so little of the new heavens and the new earth for which we look; of the country which strangers and pilgrims on earth have sought through all past ages; of the Golden City, the New Jerusalem, which gives this life its great motive, which is the central fact in all our religious faith!

Now it is plain that it is God's purpose we should know little of the future life and the unseen world; nothing about the details of these. —Boyd.

3. How curious questions concerning it are to be answered.

(2718.) John Bunyan was once asked a question about heaven which he could not answer, because the matter was not revealed in the Scriptures; and he thereupon advised the inquirer to live a holy life and go and see.

4. The references of Scripture to it.

(2719.) These scattered and brief allusions acquire, sometimes, even from their indefiniteness, a peculiar and surpassing interest. We gaze upon them as on the uprooted sea-weed, or the shivered pine, wafted by storms across the waste of waters, revealing the existence and the productions of a yet unknown world.

—M^{all}.

5. Its supreme glory, the Presence of Christ.

(2720.) When Cyrus took the king of Armenia and his son Tigranes and their wives and children prisoners, and upon their humble submission, beyond all hope, gave them their liberty and their lives, in their return home, as they all fell a-commending Cyrus, some for his personage, some for his puissance, some for his clemency, Tigranes asked his wife, "What thinkest thou of Cyrus? is he not a comely and a proper man, of a majestic presence?" "Truly," said she, "I know not what manner of man he is; I never looked on him." "Why," quoth he, "where were thy eyes all the while? Upon whom didst thou look?" "I fixed my eyes," saith she, "all the while upon him (meaning her husband) who, in my hearing, offered to Cyrus to lay down his life for my ransom." And thus, if any question the devout soul, whether she be not enamoured with the beauty of cherubim, seraphim, angels, and saints, with the pomp and splendour of that heavenly court, her answer will be that of Tigranes' wife, that she never did so much as cast a look upon them, because her eyes were never off Him who not only offered to lay, but did lay down His life for her, and ransomed her with His own blood. Whom should she have in heaven but Him who hath none on earth but her?
—Feathly, 1582-1644.

6. Its delights are inexhaustible, and its joys eternal.

(2721.) Eternity makes heaven to be heaven; 'tis the diamond in the ring: O blessed day, that shall have no night! the sunlight of glory shall rise upon the soul and never set! O blessed spring, that shall have no autumn, or fall of the leaf!

—Watson, 1696.

(2722.) The enjoyments above, and the treasures proposed to us by our Saviour, are indefectible in their nature, and endless in their duration. They are still full, fresh, and entire, like the stars and orbs above, which shine with the same undiminished lustre, and move with the same unwearied motion, with which they did from the first date of their creation. Nay, the joys of heaven will abide when these lights of heaven shall be put out; and when sun and moon, and nature itself, shall be discharged their stations, and be employed by Providence no more, the righteous shall then appear in their full glory; and, being fixed in the Divine presence, enjoy one perpetual and everlasting day; a day commensurate to the unlimited eternity of God Himself, the great Sun of righteousness, who is always rising, and never sets.

—South, 1633-1716.

(2723.) Think how completely all the griefs of this mortal life will be compensated by one age, for instance, of the felicities beyond the grave, and then think that one age multiplied ten thousand times is not so much to eternity as one grain of sand is to the whole material universe. Think what a state it will be to be growing happier and happier still as ages pass away, and yet leave something still happier to come!

—John Foster, 1770-1843.

(2724.) The declaration that "there shall be no night there" is doubtless true even in its literal sense; and is to be understood as teaching that in the material economy of heaven there is nothing which corresponds to the interchange of light and darkness existing on earth. In that supernal clime reigns one eternal day. Its skies are never shadowed; its sun never goes down. By what law of celestial physics, by what constitution and action of the elements, a condition of being so unlike our own is created and maintained, Inspiration has not informed us; nor would our present faculties be equal to the knowledge. Dismissing all such unfruitful speculations, we rest in the Divine announcement, that the gloom of night never visits the realms above.

The absence of night from heaven is, however, to be regarded chiefly in its moral significations. Though a real fact, it has the intent and import of a symbol, adumbrating the spiritual features of the city of God, and embracing the whole range of its blessedness. Night is associated with the idea of weariness, and is the symbol of ignorance, sin, danger, want, and death: but in heaven none of these things is known.
—Id.

(2725.) Many good people suppose that we shall see heaven the first day we get there. No! you cannot see London in two weeks. You cannot see Rome in six weeks. You cannot see Venice in a month. You cannot see the great city of the New Jerusalem in a day. No: it will take all eternity to see heaven, to count the towers, to examine the trophies, to gaze upon the thrones, to see the hierarchies. Ages on ages roll, and yet heaven is new. The streets new! The temple new! The joy new! The song new!

I stayed a week at Niagara Falls, hoping thoroughly to understand and appreciate them. But, on the last day, they seemed newer and more incomprehensible than on the first day. Gazing on the infinite rush of celestial splendours, where the oceans of delight meet, and pour themselves into the great heart of God—how soon will we exhaust the song? "Never! never!"
—Talmage.

(2726.) Almost nothing remains in this world. Nations do not remain; they have been ground up again and again. Cities do not; they have been overturned till their very sites are questionable. The most triumphant monuments of art have been crumbled and wasted. Things that once were centres of the world's admiration and worship are gone. Who can tell where Minerva is, that took the sun first and took the sun last on the Acropolis? Who can tell what became of it, or who destroyed it? Who can tell where the stateliest temples are? The pomp of those days in which these things existed is gone, and only rude fragments and heaps of stone remain to tell the story of their greatness. Castles are wasted. Even the mountains are gradually wearing away. The earth itself seems to be changing, changing all the time. But there is a rest that remaineth—a rest that time only fortifies, and preserves undiminished, unmarred, undiminished, anchored in the eternal sphere firmer than the island in the ocean that the waves beat upon—a rest that remaineth for the people of God.

—Becher.

(2727.) You will observe that this is not the whole statement, that we are to have glory in heaven. As applied to a heavenly state, we should, of course, construe glory according to the scale of excellence which is supposed to belong to heaven. If you go into an Indian's wigwam, a few eagles' feathers, some wampum, and two or three strings of glittering beads, are about all that you will see. But these are glorious for an Indian. Now, take them into the cottage of a poor shepherd or a farmer. He smiles at them, and calls them silly trinkets. They are not glorious there. But there are other things that the husbandman thinks to be glorious. But that which is glorious in a plain cottage ceases to be glorious when you carry it into the mansion, where there is wealth, and culture, and refinement. The rich man has things that are glorious, according to his standard. His furniture of the table, his furniture of the room, his pictures, and the very apartments themselves, for size and dignity, are glorious in their way. But if you take those things up into a king's palace, where are gathered the treasures of an empire, and where the art of successive ages has done what it could to add grace and beauty to these treasures, then they cease to be glorious. But a king's palace lifted up and placed in the centre of God's heavenly realm would be a dark spot. It is nothing as compared with the glory of the highest point of creative intelligence, taste, and skill. When heavenly glory is spoken of, we are to have a sense of what must be the exaltation of a man's thinking power, of his sentiments, of his motives, of his whole active state, in that upper sphere; we are to measure, not according to the pattern of the highest school on earth, but according to what a thing must be where God and His angels dwell. How transcendent is the idea when carried up thus!

But it is not enough to think of glory as applied to heaven. We are to add the thought of weight (2 Cor. iv. 17). It is weight of glory. Now, weight does not signify really the original meaning of the figure. The term in the apostle's time was used to signify magnitude; and in the text it is employed in connection with glory to convey the impression of a glory comprehensive, widespread, vast. It was not a fugitive, filmy cloud of glory. It was a glory orbicular, eternal, and so inimitable that it must be spoken of in terms such as those that measure and characterise mountains or continents.

It is not weight alone. It is exceeding weight; that is to say, surpassing weight—a weight that goes beyond bounds for excellence and eminence.

And that is not all. It is eternal. We see the compound blow-pipe concentrating its might for a moment on a single point. It glows; it is intense; but it very soon spends its force, and goes out. We see the calcium light. It glows while it burns, but it soon wastes itself. Now, in distinction from these quick made and quick perishing glories, which are the result of concentrated forces, and which are speedily wasted in the concentration, the apostle speaks of the glory of the other life as one that is past all measuring; past all ordinary experience; and past all thought. It is exceeding, excessive upon excessive, and eternal. —Bacher.

7. The rest that remaineth for the people of God.

(2728.) One night, years ago, a fire broke out in an American wilderness. A spark dropped on dry leaves, the lighted leaves flew before the wind, the flames raced along the grass, and glanced from tree to tree, till all the forest was ablaze, and night was turned into a terrible day. Certain Indians, driven out of their hunting grounds by the red storm, fled for their lives; hour after hour they ran and ran on, until, half dead with fatigue, they reached a noble river: they forded it, and, after scaling the opposite bank, their chief struck his tent-pole into the ground, threw himself on the cool turf, and cried, Alabama!—"here we may rest."

But that chief was no prophet. The land was claimed by hostile tribes. The fugitives reached no resting-place there. They were soon beset by foes more relentless than the elements; having escaped the fury of the fire, they perished from the cruelty of man, and where they looked for the still delight of a home, found but the quiet of a grave.

Let this tradition serve as a parable. Earth has no Alabama for the soul. In flight from year to year, chased from refuge to refuge in which they set their hearts, the fugitives from trouble often say, as they reach the shelter of wealth, or the shadow of domestic affection, or the shrine of some false worship, or the realisation of some cherished hope, "Here we may rest;" but God says "No" to that, and again and again, when they are on the point of sinking into deceptive repose, does He send the stern angels of calamity to wake them up with the cry, "Arise, depart, for this is not your rest!"

It is true that even in this world there is rest for those who have gathered themselves to Shiloh; rest through reconciliation with God, rest through union with reconciled men. Yet, in our relation to God, the joy of faith is often broken by unbelief, and in our relation to each other discordance of thought is often allowed to break the fellowship of love. When we have enjoyed an hour of the soul's calm sunshine, sin soon breaks our tranquillity; infirmity breaks it, human unkindness breaks it, or it is broken by some storm of sorrow. On earth our rest is at least imperfect, but there is rest in heaven, for Shiloh is there; there in full and visible manifestation, the brightness of its glory and the secret of its rest, and there at last to Him will the gathering of His people be. —Stanford.

(2729.) The rest of inaction is but the quiet of a stone, or the stillness of the grave, or the exhaustion of a spent and feeble nature. But there is a nobler rest than this. There is rest in health; there is rest in the musical repose of exquisitely balanced powers; there is rest to the desiring faculties when they find the thing desired; there is rest in the rapture of congenial employment; rest in the flow of joyful strength; rest in the swift glide of the stream when it meets with no impediment. Such is the rest of the glorified. Perfect beings in a perfect world, rejoicing in their native element, having no weakness within, and no resisting force without, to check the outflow and expression of their loving natures; their activity therefore being easy, natural, and necessary, as light is to the sun, and fragrance to the flowers of spring—activity to them is rest. Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord, for they rest, not from their works, but only from their labours. It would be a labour for them not to work. To hush their music, and to stop their action, would be to them intolerable toil; they would be "weary with forbearing and could not stay." So they "rest," yet they rest not day nor night. —Stanford.

8. Is strictly reserved for God's people.

(2730.) We often make narrow entrances, through which but one at a time can pass, that we may examine his ticket, and see whether he has a right to pass. And, be sure, though we may look respectable on the fashionable Broadway of World or Church, we cannot enter heaven as those who pass in a crowd. God deals with souls as men deal with sovereigns, which they examine and weigh one by one.

9. Necessity of preparation for it.

(2731.) Holiness does not only fit us for heaven, so that without it we can have no entrance or admittance there; but it also fits us, that if it were possible for us to enter into heaven void of it, heaven would be no place of happiness to us in that condition, but a place of trouble, torment, and vexation. As, for instance, it is impossible for a beggar in his rags to be admitted to the society and converse of princes and noblemen; but put the case that he were, yet his beggarly condition would never suffer him to enjoy himself in that company, in which he could be nothing but a mock and a derision. In like manner, heaven bears no suitableness to an impure, unsanctified person. For a sinful heart must have sinful delights and sinful company, and where it meets not with such, in the very midst of comforts and company, it finds a solitude and a dissatisfaction.

—South, 1633-1716.

(2732.) The last use which I shall make of this remarkable property in human nature, of being delighted with those actions to which it is accustomed, is to show how absolutely necessary it is for us to gain habits of virtue in this life, if we would enjoy the pleasures of the next. The state of bliss we call heaven will not be capable of affecting those minds which are not thus qualified for it: we must in this world gain a relish of truth and virtue, if we would be able to taste that knowledge and perfection which are to make us happy in the next. The seeds of those spiritual joys and raptures, which are to rise up and flourish in the soul to all eternity, must be planted in her during this her present state of probation. In short, heaven is not to be looked upon only as the reward, but as the natural effect, of a religious life.

—Addison, 1672-1719.

(2733.) If you ask me what the preparation is, I have two words for you which will describe it, common as household words, taking in the whole of preparation—justification, sanctification: that is all. Justification: you must get the robe on, the best robe, the robe of righteousness; you must be justified by grace through faith. You will not be allowed to go into heaven if you are a rebel, steeped in all the guilt of rebellion. The sovereign does not allow the criminal to go to court, and walk the royal galleries, and sit at the royal table, and look on the royal face. The man that goes there must, at least, have his character cleared. "Be it known unto you, men and brethren, that, through this man, Christ Jesus, is preached unto you the forgiveness of sin." I have not time to open that; and as, I presume, it is the burden of much of the ministrations among you regularly, it is not necessary that I should trench upon your time now. But besides the meetness of justification for that great event of Christ's coming in the clouds, there is the meetness of sanctification. A man may in a fit of passion strike his fellow; he commits a crime by doing so; he is punishable, and may be thrown into prison for that breach of law. He has remained there a certain time, and the prison doors are opened before him; he walks out and there is no more in the law to detain him; he has satisfied the law; but when the man comes out from prison, he is not a whit better fitted for society than before he went in; he brings out all the bad passions with him that he took in; the man is justified, but he wants sanctifying. I can imagine some one going into hell itself, and putting out the flames of hell fire; but would that make the persons in hell happy? No; there is a fire within that must be put out; and, "without holiness, no man shall see the Lord."

—Beaumont.

(2734.) Heaven must be begun below in all those who shall enjoy its perfection above. Heaven is a place of character; the full development of those principles and dispositions which are received and cherished upon earth, by the knowledge of Jesus, and the teaching of His Spirit. No child on its first introduction to a school is placed in the highest class, but in one or other of the lower, where the first elements of a future education are imparted, and the necessary ground-work is laid for the more matured instructions which successively follow: the one must precede the other; there is an unalterable connection between them: as much so, and as absolutely essential, as between the bud and blossom of a tree, and the fruit which is to follow; or between the state of infancy and that of full-grown manhood: the first of necessity goes before the other. As well, therefore, might we look for the state of manhood without the previous stages of infancy, childhood, and youth; as well might we expect to reach the fruit from any tree where no buds and blossoms were previously formed, as expect admission into heaven without being "created anew in Christ Jesus unto good works," and made to possess the tempers, learn the principles, and imbibed the dispositions, of its blessed inhabitants, while, like them, we seek our happiness from "that river of joy" which "waters the city of our God."

—Salter.

(2735.) Even supposing a man of unholy life were suffered to enter heaven, he would not be happy there; so that it would be no mercy to permit him to enter. For heaven, it is plain from Scripture, is not a place where many different and discordant pursuits can be carried on at once, as is the case in this world. Here every man can do his own pleasure, but there he must do God's pleasure. It would be presumption to attempt to determine the employments of that eternal life which good men are to pass in God's presence, or to deny that that state which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor mind conceived, may comprise an infinite variety of pursuits and occupations. Still so far we are distinctly told, that that future life will be spent in God's presence, in a sense which does not apply to our present life; so that it may be best described as an endless and uninterrupted worship.

Heaven, then, is not like this world; I will say what it is much more like,—a church. For in a place of public worship no language of this world is heard; there are no schemes brought forward for temporal objects, great or small; no information how to strengthen our worldly interests, extend our influence, or establish our credit. These things indeed, may be right in their way, so that we do not set our hearts upon them; still, I repeat, it is certain that we hear nothing of them in a church. Here we hear solely and entirely of God. We praise Him, worship Him, sing to Him, thank Him, confess to Him, give ourselves up to Him, and ask His blessing. And, therefore, a church is like heaven; viz., because both in the one and the other, there is one single sovereign subject—religion—brought before us.

Supposing, then, instead of it being said that no irreligious man could serve and attend on God in heaven (or see Him, as the text expresses it), we were told that no irreligious man could worship, or spiritually see Him in church, should we not at once perceive the meaning of the doctrine? viz., that, were a man to come hither, who had suffered his mind to grow up in its own way, as nature or chance determined, without any deliberate habitual effort after truth and purity, he would find no real pleasure here, but would soon get weary of the place; because, in this house of God, he would hear only of that one subject which he cared little or nothing about, and nothing at all of those things which excited his hopes and fears, his sympathies and energies. If then a man without religion (supposing it possible) were admitted into heaven, doubtless he would sustain a great disappointment. Before, indeed, he fancied that he could be happy there; but when he arrived there, he would find no discourse but that which he had shunned on earth, no pursuits but those he had disliked or despised, nothing which bound him to aught else in the universe, and made him feel at home, nothing which he could enter into and rest upon. He would perceive himself to be an isolated being, cut away by Supreme Power from those objects which were still entwined around his heart. Nay, he would be in the presence of that Supreme Power, whom he never on earth could bring himself steadily to think upon, and whom now he regarded only as the destroyer of all that was precious and dear to him. Ah! he could not bear the face of the Living God; the Holy God would be no object of joy to him. "Let us alone! What have we to do with Thee?" is the sole thought and desire of unclean souls, even while they acknowledge His majesty. None but the holy can look upon the Holy One; without holiness no man can endure to see the Lord.

—Newman.

(2736.) When we think to take part in the joys of heaven without holiness, we are as inconsiderate as if we supposed we could take an interest in the worship of Christians here below without possessing it in our measure. A careless, a sensual, an unbelieving mind, a mind destitute of the love and fear of God, with narrow views and earthly aims, a low standard of duty, and a benighted conscience, a mind contented with itself, and unresigned to God's will, would feel as little pleasure, at the last day, at the words, "Enter into the joy of thy Lord," as it does now at the words, "Let us pray." Nay, much less, because, while we are in a church, we may turn our thoughts to other subjects, and contrive to forget that God is looking on us; but that will not be possible in heaven.

We see, then, that holiness, or inward separation from the world, is necessary to our admission into heaven, because heaven is not heaven, is not a place of happiness, except to the holy. There are bodily indispositions which affect the taste, so that the sweetest flavours become ungrateful to the palate; and indispositions which impair the sight, tinging the fair face of nature with some sickly hue. In like manner, there is a moral malady which disorders the inward sight and taste; and no man labouring under it is in a condition to enjoy what Scripture calls "the fulness of joy in God's presence, and pleasures at His right hand for evermore."

—Newman.

(2737.) If we wished to imagine a punishment for an unholy, reprobate soul, we perhaps could not fancy a greater than to summon it to heaven. Heaven would be hell to an irreligious man. We know how unhappy we are apt to feel at present, when alone in the midst of strangers, or of men of different tastes and habits from ourselves. How miserable, for example, would it be to have to live in a foreign land, among a people whose faces we never saw before, and whose language we could not learn. And this is but a faint illustration of the loneliness of a man of earthly dispositions and tastes, thrust into the society of saints and angels. How forlorn would he wander through the courts of heaven! He would find no one like himself; he would see in every direction the marks of God's holiness, and these would make him shudder. He would feel himself always in His presence. He could no longer turn his thoughts another way, as he does now, when conscience reproaches him. He would know that the Eternal Eye was ever upon him; and that eye of holiness, which is joy and life to holy creatures, would seem to him an eye of wrath and punishment. God cannot change His nature. Holy He must ever be. But while He is holy, no unholy soul can be happy in heaven. Fire does not inflame iron, but it inflames straw. It would cease to be fire if it did not. And so heaven itself would be fire to those who would fain escape across the great gulf from the torments of hell. The finger of Lazarus would but increase their thirst. The very "heaven that is over their head" will be "brass" to them.

Newman.

(2738.) The unfitness of unrenewed souls for heaven may be illustrated by the incapacity of certain uneducated and coarse-minded persons for elevated thoughts and intellectual pursuits. When a little child, I lived some years in my grandfather's house. In his garden there was a fine old hedge of yew of considerable length, which was clipped and trimmed till it made quite a wall of verdure. Behind it was a wide grass walk, which looked upon the fields, and afforded a quiet outlook. The grass was kept mown, so as to make pleasant walking. Here, ever since the old Puritanic chapel was built, godly divines had walked and prayed and meditated. My grandfather was wont to use it as his study. Up and down it he would walk when preparing his sermons, and always on Sabbath-days when it was fair, he had half-an-hour there before preaching. To me it seemed to be a perfect paradise, and being forbidden to stay there when grandfather was meditating, I viewed it with no small degree of awe. I love to think of the green and quiet walk at this moment, and could wish for just such a study. But I was once shocked and even horrified by hearing a farming man remark concerning this sanctum sanctorum, "It 'ud grow a many 'turs if it wor ploughed up." What cared he for holy memories? What were meditation and contemplation to him? Is it not the chief end of man to grow potatoes and eat them? Such, on a larger scale, would be an unconverted man's estimate of joys so elevated and refined as those of heaven, could be by any possibility be permitted to gaze upon them.

—Spurgeon.

10. Familiarised to us by the death of our beloved ones.

(2739.) Our views of heaven, during the present life, are like those presented to us at the close of day, relating to the splendour of the nightly firmament. We look up where all was blank before, and see here and there a star casting a faint and feeble radiance amidst the gloom of deepening twilight; and from these, dimly discovered and spoiled of their glory by the remaining light of evening, we gather the existence of some far distant region, beyond that canopy that seems to encircle by day the whole visible creation; and we begin to judge more wisely of the magnitude of nature. But little could we learn, from such a spectacle, of the overwhelming majesty of the midnight sky;—of the constellations that beam so effulgently upon us, with increasing characters of greatness and of beauty, as the reign of darkness advances, and while night, invisible herself, draws aside the curtain which concealed the wondrous whole. Little could we know of those fields of light and glory, immeasurable and untrodden, which stretch beyond the boundaries of human vision;—those realms of varied life and intelligence which lie embosomed in the deep blue heavens, like islands floating in the ocean of immensity. Little could we guess, from that imperfect revelation, of the amplitude of space and being; of the order and arrangement beaming on the instructed eye of science, in the many systems of that starry sphere which glitters so silently above. Still less could we conjecture from the solitary glimmering of those fires, so pale and distant, what is the garniture, and what the boundless magnificence, with which the eternal Architect has adorned the temple of the universe. Now, it is one of the highest benefits derivable from the death of such men as we have here revered and loved, that it diminishes the sensible remoteness of that happier world to which we hope hereafter to ascend. The strangeness and impalpable spirituality of its whole being seems abated in equal measure with our familiarity with the names and character of its inhabitants.
—M'Al.

11. The realm where character is perfect.

(2740.) See here that which may make us long to be in heaven; then we shall do God's will perfectly, as the angels do. Alas! how defective are we in our obedience here! How far do we fall short! We cannot write a copy of holiness without blotting; our holy things are blemished, like the moon, which when it shines brightest hath a dark spot in it: but in heaven we shall do God's will perfectly, as the angels in glory.
—Watson, 1696.

(2741.) There are many good men whom here on earth it is arduous to love. They are whimsical, they are taciturn, they are opinionative and dogmatical; they are imperious and self-indulgent; they are severe and satirical; they are beset with strong prejudices of evil tempers; and their excellence is as inaccessible as the fragrance of a thorny rose or the nectar inside an adamant shell. But in that genial region the spirits of the just are perfect. Jacob is not wily, Thomas is not obstinate, Peter is not precipitate; but, like those plants which grow tall enough to leave all their youthful spines behind them,—like those wines which grow old enough to outlive their original austerity,—the flaws, the failures of earthly piety, all have vanished in that perfect world.

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

12. Varieties of character in heaven.

(2742.) God has given to each his talent and his temperament, and in the Church below He has made this diversity of gifts not a discord but a symphony—a source not of confusion and disorder, but of beauty and stable symmetry. And so doubtless, will it continue on high. The lily, when you rescue it from among the thorns, or when from the windy storm and the tempest you take it into the sunny shelter, does not become a palm or a cedar, but only a fairer, sweeter lily than before. And a topaz or a sapphire of earth, if taken to build the walls of the New Jerusalem, does not become an emerald or an amethyst, but remains a topaz or a sapphire still. And translated from the tarnish and attrition of time, it is easy to understand how each glorified nature will retain in a higher sphere its original fitness and inherent affinities; and how for the many mansions there will not only be many occupants, but every occupant may have his own office even there. It is easy to imagine that Isaac still will meditate, and that the sweet singer of Israel shall neither be at a loss for a golden harp nor good matter in a song. It is easy to imagine that Paul will find some outlet for his eloquence, and Peter for his energy; and not easy to conceive that John the Divine will be the same as Philip or Matthew, or Martha the busy housekeeper the same as Mary the adoring listener. To every precious stone there remains its several tint; to every star its own glory; to every denizen of the Church above his own office; and to every member of the heavenly family his own mansion.
—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

(2743.) The blessed God delights in variety. In all His works, along with perfect order, there is eternal change. There is no mountain exactly like another mountain; there are no two trees whose boughs bend into the same network of interlacing lines; no two leaves alike; no two clouds alike; no two waves alike; but the face of nature is infinitely diversified. So also is the Church. You see no two men with the like endowments; no two spheres marked by exact similarity. Each one has his own peculiar gift for his own peculiar station; some have to serve their Lord with the power of the pen, others with the power of the tongue; some by their poverty, others by their wealth; and each one has a distinct individuality of power and place and opportunity. We see Aaron with his eloquence, and Moses with his stammering speech. "There is a Jeremy to give the prophecy, and a Baruch to read it," a Paul to plant, and an Apollos to water. One man is a "son of consolation," another a "son of thunder." One servant has five talents, another two, and another one. As the Church in heaven is but the consummation of the Church on earth, we may infer that the law of variety, which shines in this earthly exhibition of Christianity, and which prevails all over this region of existence, sheds its fascinations over Paradise, and lends its zest to the services of heaven.
—Stanford.

12. The vastness of its population.

—Talmage.

(2745.) Gather together all the pencils that were ever manufactured, and all the paper ever made, in some large place, and call together all the men who are fleet in calculations, and let them, for the rest of their lives, give themselves to estimating what shall be the number of the saved; and when the pencils are all worn out, and the paper is all filled with columns of figures, and the scribes and the mathematicians of all the earth give up the work from exhaustion, the numbers they have calculated, compared with the numbers of the glorified, will be as your five fingers compared with the stars of heaven.

On some parade-day you have taken your position at the corner of the street to see a procession pass. For hours you have watched them, and it seemed as if there would be no end to the passing regiments. But if you should take your position in a street of the Celestial City, and watch the passage of the hosts of the Redeemed, you might stand in that one place for a thousand years, and at the close of it know that there had not yet passed before you more than one regiment of the great army of banners. A general, expecting an attack from the enemy, stands on a hill and looks through a field-glass, and sees, in the great distance, multitudes approaching, but has no idea of their numbers. He says, "I cannot tell anything about them; I merely know that there are a great number." And so John, without attempting to count, says, "A great multitude, that no man can number."

—Talmage.

14. Recognition of friends in heaven.

(2746.) If the mere conception of the reunion of good men in a future state infused a momentary rapture into the mind of Tully,—if an airy speculation, for there is reason to fear it had little hold on his convictions, could inspire him with such delight,—what may we be expected to feel who are assured of such an event by the true sayings of God! How should we rejoice in the prospect, the certainty rather, of spending a blissful eternity with those whom we loved on earth; of seeing them emerge from the ruins of the tomb and the deeper ruins of the fall, not only uninjured, but refined and perfected, "with every tear wiped from their eyes," standing before the throne of God and the Lamb in white robes and palms in their hands, crying with a loud voice, Salvation to God that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb for ever and ever! What delight will it afford to renew the sweet counsel we have taken together, to recount the toils of combat and the labour of the way, and to approach, not the house, but the throne, of God in company, in order to join in the symphonies of heavenly voices, and lose ourselves amid the splendour and fruitions of the beatific vision!

—Robert Hall, 1764-1831.

(2747.) What matters it if thou art not happy on earth provided thou art so in heaven? Heaven may have happiness as utterly unknown to us as the gift of vision would be to a man born blind. If we consider the inlets of pleasure from five senses only, we may be sure that the same Being who created us could have given us five hundred if He pleased. Mutual love, pure and exalted, founded on charms both mental and corporeal, as it constitutes the highest happiness on earth, may, for anything we know to the contrary, also form the lowest happiness of heaven. And it would appear consonant with the administration of Providence in other matters that there should be a link between heaven and earth; for in all cases a chasm seems to be purposely avoided; "prudento Deo." Thus the material world has its links, by which it is made to shake hands, as it were, with the vegetable—the vegetable with the animal—the animal with the intellectual—and the intellectual with what we may be allowed to hope of the angelic.

—Colton, 1832.

—Spurgeon.

(2749.) I look and wait and long for that day when all Christians shall recognise each other.

I think that people in the church are like persons riding in a stage at night. For hours they sit side by side and shoulder to shoulder, not being able, in the darkness, to distinguish one another; but at last, when day breaks, and they look at each other, behold, they discover that they are friends, and, it may be, near relations!

So we are riding, I think, in the chariot of salvation, and do not know that we are brethren, though we sit shoulder to shoulder; but as the millennial dawn comes on, we shall find it out. I have great comfort and consolation in this thought.

—Becher.

15. The memories of heaven.

(2750.) The "new song" is a commemorative song. We are distinctly told that it makes reference to past deliverances. Oh! how much they have to sing about. They sing of the darkness through which, on earth, they passed, and it is a night song.

That one was killed in the seven days' fight before Richmond, and with him it is a battle song. That one was starved to death at Belle Isle, and with him it is a prison song. That was a Christian sailor-boy that had his back broken on the ship's halcyards, and with him it is a sailor's song. That one was burned at Smithfield, and with him it is a fire song. Oh! how they will sing of floods waded, of fires endured, of persecution suffered, of grace extended. Song of hail! song of sword! song of hot lead! song of axe! As when the organ-pipes peal out some great harmony there comes occasionally the sound of the tremolante, weeping through the cadences, adding exquisiteness to the performance; so, amidst the stupendous acclaim of the heavenly worshippers, shall come tremulous remembrances of past endurance, adding a sweetness and glory to the triumphal strain. So the glorified mother will sing of the cradle that death robbed; and the enthroned spirit from the almshouse will sing of a life-time of want. God may wipe away all tears, but not the memory of the grief that started them.

—Talmage.

16. Degrees of glory.

(2751.) Like as sundry vessels, whereof some are bigger and some less, if they all be cast into the sea, some will receive more water and some less, and yet all shall be full and no want in any: so likewise, among the saints of God in heaven, some shall have more glory, some less, and yet all, without exception, full of glory.

—Cawdray, 1598-1664.

(2752.) In heaven we cannot suppose the condition of any one saint to be wanting in the measure of its happiness. Such a supposition is opposed to the idea of that perfection to which all shall attain. Nevertheless, as with two luminous bodies, each may shine in perfection, though with a different splendour and intensity; so the image of God will shine with fuller orb'd splendour in some than in others. In like manner, the little stream and the river may both fill their channel, while the one glides in simple beauty, and the other rolls its majestic waves attracting the eyes of all beholders. And so the spirits of the just made perfect shall all be beautiful, but some shall delight with the perfection of beauty.

—Saller.

(2753.) "There is a great difference in our capacities," observed the small jug to the large Flagon beside it.

"A good deal of difference in our measurement," answered the Flagon.

"I suppose that all I can contain, if poured into you, would appear very little," said the jug.

"And what I am capable of holding would overwhelm you for certain," replied the other.

"Truly I could hold but a small measure of your fulness," said the jug. "But I have this to satisfy me, that when I am full I have all I want; and you yourself when filled can hold no more."

God's spiritual temple contains vessels of various dimensions; but all are filled with the same Spirit from the communicable fulness of Christ; as the prophet describes, "Vessels of small quantity, from the vessels of cups even to all vessels of flagons." "To be filled with all the fulness of God," is all that saints desire; and the Lord blesses His people with the experience of His love, "both small and great." There will undoubtedly be degrees in glory; but all shall be full of joy; and he that possesses greatest capacity will not be more full of God than he that left the world a babe in Christ.

—Bowden.

17. Is despised by the ungodly.

(2754.) As a man that comes into America, and sees the natives regard more a piece of glass, or an old knife, than a piece of gold, may think, Surely these people never heard of the worth of gold, or else they would not exchange it for toys; so a man that looked only upon the lives of most men, and did not hear their contrary confessions, would think either these men never heard of heaven, or else they never heard of its excellency and glory: when, alas! they hear of it till they are weary of hearing; and it is offered to them so commonly, that they are tired with the tidings, and cry out as the Israelites, "Our soul is dried away, because there is nothing but this manna before our eyes," and as the Indians, who live among the golden mines, do little regard it, but are weary of the daily toil of getting it, when other nations will compass the world, and venture their lives, to get it; so we that live where the Gospel groweth, where heaven is urged upon us at our doors, and the manna falls upon our tents, do little regard it, and wish these mines of gold were farther from us, that we might not be put upon the toil of getting it, when some that want it would be glad of it upon harder terms. Surely, though the resurrection of the body and life everlasting be the last article in their creed, it is not the least, nor therefore put last, that it should be last in their desires and endeavours.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

18. Is forfeited voluntarily.

(2755.) A man may lose the good things of this life against his will; but if he loses eternal blessings, he does so with his own consent.

—Augustine, 354-430.

19. The difficulty with which God brings us to it.

(2756.) We are like little children strayed from home, and God is now fetching us home; and we are ready to turn into any house, stay and play with everything in our way, and sit down on every green bank, and much ado there is to get us home.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

20. It is not enough merely to desire to reach it.

(2757.) We have depending on us both sides of the alternative; both falling into hell and obtaining the kingdom. "If ye be willing, and will hearken unto Me, ye shall eat the good of the land." But perhaps one will say, "I am willing (and no one is so void of understanding as not to be willing); but to will is not sufficient for me." Nay, but it is sufficient, if thou be duly willing, and do the deeds of one that is willing. But as it is, thou art not greatly willing. And let us try this in other things, if it seem good. For tell me: He that would marry a wife, is he content with wishing? By no means; but he looks out for women to advance his suit, and requests friends to keep watch with him, and gets together money.

Again: The merchant is not content with sitting at home and wishing, but he first hires a vessel, then selects sailors and rowers, then takes up money on interest, and is inquisitive about a market and a place of merchandise.

Is it not, then, strange for men to show themselves so much in earnest about earthly things, but that when they are to make a venture for heaven, they should be content with wishing only? Rather, I should say, not even in this do they show themselves properly in earnest. For he that wills a thing properly as he ought, puts also his hand unto the means which lead to the object of his desire. Thus, because hunger compels thee to take nourishment, thou waitest not for the viands to come unto thee of their own accord, but omittest nothing to gather victuals together. So in thirst and cold, and all other such things, thou art industrious, and in thy station, to take care of the body. Now do this in respect of God's kingdom, and surely thou shalt obtain it.

21. It should be the supreme object of our life to secure it.

—Adams, 1653.

(2760.) Let HOLINESS TO THE LORD be written upon your hearts in all that you do. Do no work which you cannot entitle God to, and truly say He set you about; and do nothing in the world for any other ultimate end than to please and glorify and enjoy Him. And remember that whatever you do must be done as a means to these, and as by one that is that way going on to heaven. All your labour must be the labour of a traveller, which is all for his journey's end; and all your respect of affection to place or thing in your way, must be in respect to your attainment of the end; as a traveller loveth a good way, a good horse, a good inn, a dry cloak, or good company; but nothing must be loved here as your end or home.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2761.) We may rest on earth, as the Ark is said to have rested in the midst of Jordan (Josh. iii. 13). A short and small rest, no question! or as the angels of heaven are desired to turn in and rest them on earth (Gen. xviii. 4). They would have been loth to have taken up their dwelling there.

Should Israel have settled his rest in the wilderness among serpents and enemies and weariness and famine? Should Noah have made the ark his home, and have been loth to come forth when the waters were fallen? Should the mariner choose his dwelling on the sea, and settle his rest in the midst of rocks and sands and raging tempests? Though he may adventure through all these for a commodity of worth, yet I think he takes it not for his rest. Should a soldier rest in the midst of fight, when he is in the very thickest of his enemies and the instruments of death compass him about? I think he cares not how soon the battle is over. And though he may adventure upon war for the obtaining of peace, yet I hope he is not so mad as to take that instead of peace. And are not Christians such travellers, such mariners, such soldiers? Have you not fears within and troubles without? Are we not in the thickest of continual dangers? We cannot eat, drink, sleep, labour, pray, hear, confer, &c., but in the midst of snares and perils, and shall we sit down and rest here? O Christian, follow thy work, look to thy danger, hold on to the end; win the field and come off the ground, before thou think of a settling rest.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2762.) Love puts a man upon the use of all means to enjoy the thing loved. He that loves the world, how active is he! He will break his peace and sleep for it. He that loves honour, what hazards will he run! He will swim to the throne in blood. Jacob loved Rachel, and what would not he do, though it were serving a long apprenticeship for obtaining her? Love is like wings to the bird, like sails to the ship; it carries a Christian full sail to heaven. Heaven is a place of rest and joy; it is a paradise, and will you not love it? Love heaven, and you cannot miss it; love breaks through all opposition,—it takes heaven by storm. Love, though it labour, is never weary.

—Watson, 1696.

22. This is not inconsistent with strict attention to the ordinary duties of life.

(2763.) A stranger has his prime intention home to his country, and what he does in the way is in virtue of his prime intention, though he does not, in every particular action, think of it. A traveller when he rides on the way does not think of home in every step. Ay, but he does that he does in virtue of his prime intention when he first set out, and calls to remembrance oftentimes as he goes; he thinks of his journey's end. And, by the way, I observe this note of some weak Christians that think they are not heavenly-minded, except they do nothing but think of heaven and heavenly things. This is but a weak and silly conceit. It should be our thought in the morning. Our thoughts should open with that. It should be the key to open the morning; the thought of this course what will become of us ere long in heaven. But then all that we do should be in virtue and strength of that prime intention to please God, and to go to heaven. Though we think not alway of the present business, yet it is good as much as may be to quicken our endeavour.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(2764.) The sea-birds which followed our vessel taught an important lesson. I watched their beautiful motions—now gently floating on the wind with no apparent exertion, now flapping their wings in upward flight, now descending to catch from the crest of a wave the food thrown from the ship, now outstripping the wind to recover the distance lost, now wheeling with graceful curve to the right and left, and ever crossing and recrossing each other as if in harmonious and joyful dance. Watching them one forgot that they had any other motion. Yet all the while they were travelling onwards with the ship at the rate of fourteen knots an hour. Those motions amongst themselves did not for a moment suspend their steady progressive flight across the deep, nor did that progressive flight with the ship prevent those lesser activities of their own. True type of the Christian. There are objects of the present life which we should seek, pleasures which we should enjoy, and duties to ourselves and one another which we should discharge. True religion does not require us to abnegate any part of our nature, nor does the pursuit of the future demand the neglect of the present. The flight of a bird straight across the ocean in one unvarying line would not have been so beautiful, would not have displayed so much activity or required so much strength, as the varied motions of those sea-gulls. The life of the monk or nun who retires from the secular duties of the present life is not so beautiful, is not so Christian, does not require so much grace, does not indicate so high a degree of piety, as that of the man or woman, diligent in the duties of the state, of the exchange, of the workshop, of the family,—with cares of business, cares of children, claims of neighbourhood and friends—who yet, amidst all, is making steady progress heavenward; now stooping for food, now soaring in thankfulness, now sweeping hither and thither in the exercise of God-given faculties, and ever with friendly heart mingling in beautiful harmony with the kindred flight of others—yet in every one of these motions, regulated by the concurrent and all-controlling flight onwards, ever onwards to the desired haven. Some there are whose lives resemble the flight of birds around a ship at anchor. They go up and down, and round and round, yet their locality is unchanged. Their lives may be active and beautiful, but they make no progress heavenward. They are no nearer port. The Christian abstains from all that is sinful and vain in this world; but in diligent exercise of his varied faculties, the performance of earthly duties, and the enjoyment of social and domestic delights, he resembles others. But here is the difference—he is all the while speeding his flight onwards towards God, while they are ever circling round themselves. Oh for grace to be thus, “in the world and not of the world,”—to be performing diligently and cheerfully our part in the present life—yet ever pressing towards our eternal rest.

Newman Hall.

23. Shut out at last !

(2765.) Several years ago we heard an old minister relate the following incident :—“He had preached the word for many a year in a wood hard by a beautiful village in the Inverness-shire Highlands, and it was his invariable custom, on dismissing his own congregation, to repair to the Baptist Chapel in this village to partake of the Lord’s Supper with his people assembled there. It was then usual to shut the gates during this service, in order that communicants might not be exposed to any disturbance through persons going out or coming in. On one occasion the burden of the Lord pressed upon His servant with more than ordinary severity, and, anxious to deliver it and clear his soul, he detained his hearers a little beyond the time, and consequently had to hurry to the chapel. As he drew near he noticed the doorkeeper retire from the outer gate, after having shut it. He called to him, quickening his pace at the same time, but his cry was not heard, the attendant retreated inside and the minister came up ‘just in time’ to see the door put to, and hear it fastened from within. He walked round the chapel looking up at the windows, but could gain no admittance; there was only one door, and that door was shut. He listened and heard the singing, and thought how happy God’s people were inside, while he himself was shut out. The circumstance made an impression upon him at the time which he could never afterwards forget, and he was led to ask himself the question, ‘Shall it be so at the last? Shall I come up to the gate of heaven only in time to be too late, to find the last admitted one admitted, and the door everlastingly shut?’”

—Spurgeon.

24. To be made a topic of frequent meditation.

(2766.) A heavenly mind is a joyful mind : this is the nearest and the truest way to live a life of comfort. And without this, you must needs be uncomfortable. Can a man be at the fire, and not be warm; or in the sunshine, and not have light? Can your heart be in heaven, and not have comfort? The countries of Norway, Iceland, and all the northward are cold and frozen, because they are farther from the power of the sun; but in Egypt, Arabia, and the southern parts it is far otherwise, where they live more near its powerful rays. What could make such frozen, uncomfortable Christians, but living so far as they do from heaven? And what makes some few others so warm in comforts, but their living higher than others do, and their frequent access so near to God? When the sun in the spring draws near our part of the earth, how do all things congratulate its approach! The earth looks green, and casteth off her mourning habit : the trees shoot forth ; the plants revive ; the pretty birds, how sweetly do they sing ! The face of all things smiles upon us, and all the creatures below rejoice. Beloved friends, if we would but try this life with God, and would but keep these hearts above, what a spring of joy would be within us ; and all our graces be fresh and green ! How would the face of our souls be changed, and all that is within us rejoice ! How should we forget our winter sorrows, and withdraw our souls from our sad retirements ! How early should we rise (as those birds in the spring) to sing the praise of our great Creator ! O Christian ! get above ; believe it, that region is warmer than this below.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2767.) The honouring of God and our Redeemer doth require that we daily converse with the saints in heaven ; because it is in them that God is seen, in the greatest glory of His love ; and it is in them that the power and efficacy and love of our dear Redeemer most appeareth. You judge now of the father by his children, and of the physician by his patients, and of the builder by the house, and of the captain by his victories. And if you see no better children of God than such childish, crying, feeble, froward, diseased, burdensome ones as we are, you will rob Him of the chief of this His honour. And if you look at none of the patients of our Saviour but such lame and languid, pained, groaning, diseased, half-cured ones as we, you will rob Him of the glory of His skill and cures. And if you look but to such an imperfect broken fabric as the Church on earth, you will dishonour the builder. And if you look to no other victories of Christ and His Spirit, but what is made in this confused, dark, and bedlam world, you will be tempted to dishonour His conduct and His conquests. But if you will look to His children in heaven, who are perfected in His love and likeness, and to Christ's patients which are there perfectly cured, and to His building in the heavenly unity and glory, and to all His victories as there complete; then you will give Him the glory which is His due.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2768.) Another help to sweeten thy soul with the foretastes of rest, is this labour to apprehend how near it is; think seriously of its speedy approach. That which we think is near at hand, we are more sensible of than that which we behold at a distance. When we hear of war or famine in another country, it troubleth us not so much; or if we hear it prophesied of a long time hence: so if we hear of plenty a great way off, or of a golden age that shall fall out who knows when, this never rejoiceth us. But if judgments or mercies begin to draw near, then they affect us. If we were sure we should see the golden age, then it would take with us. When the plague is in a town but twenty miles off, we do not fear it; nor much, perhaps, if it be in another street: but if once it come to the next door, or if it seize on one in our own family, then we begin to think on it more feelingly. It is so with mercies as well as judgments. When they are far off, we talk of them as marvels; but when they draw close to us, we rejoice in them as truths.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2769.) A true saint every day takes a turn in heaven, his thoughts and desires are like cherubims flying up to paradise. Can men of the world so delight in looking upon their bags of gold, and fields of corn, and shall not the heirs of heaven take more delight in contemplating their glory in reversion? Could we send forth Faith as a spy, and every day view the glory of the Jerusalem above, how would it rejoice us, as it doth the heir to think of the inheritance which is to come into his hand shortly.

—Watson, 1696.

(2770.) I have noticed, when watching artists at their work, that they are sometimes accustomed to put coloured pebble-stones on their easel, and once in a while to take them up and look at them; and I said, "What is that for?" They said, "In working paints into tints, the eye gets down, and it is necessary to have some colour at hand to tone it up with, in order to be able to distinguish nice shades."

Now, heaven is that place which we have been accustomed to regard as the centre of all that is perfect; and we have day by day and month by month, been remitting there our ideal conceptions of everything that is beautiful and true and honourable and noble and loving; and we have gained a standard, at least of what character ought to be; and we bring that down to tone up our eye with in this world. Every day we are among people that are highly temptable, that are lax, that are stumbling, that are sometimes hateful, and that are but just lovely at the best of times; and we become worn, weakened, jaded, and depraved by this commerce with the world. We want to lift the mind up, so that we may get a conception of the possibilities of being and character higher than we have found in this world; and we are to get it by setting our affections on things above.

Heaven answers with us the same purpose that the tuning-fork does with the musician. Our affections, the whole orchestra of them, are apt to get below the concert-pitch; and we take heaven to tune our hearts by. In this way, instead of making the heavenly state a romance-ground, we are every day framing it by the imagination, and ascribing to it all our higher and nobler and finer ideals, and then taking this state and bringing it down to measure our daily life by. And so, instead of taking us away from the duties of life, it brings us back to them with renewed strength, with better moral discriminations, with more patience, more gentleness, and more hope.

—Becher.

35. The Influence of the hope of heaven.

(2771.) The slaves that serve the Turks in their galleys, if they could but think that, at seven years' end, some Christian would come and redeem them, would be better affected and tug at the oar with more cheerfulness, especially if they could be assured of their delivery. If Jacob serve the churl Laban seven years longer, if he think he shall have Rachel at the end of it, it will be but as seven days, and he goes on with comfort and is content that God shall use him to His hand as it pleaseth Him. Thus it is that the hope of better things sweeteneth the present sadness of any outward condition. There is no grief so heavy but, if a man tie heaven at the end of it, it will become light; but put them together, and the one will be swallowed up in the other. If the times be bad, hope for better, the expectation whereof will be an excellent lenitive to allay the smart of present calamity.

—Alphonsus ab Avendano, 1590.

(2772.) As a man passing through a very swift flood, doth not look down to the water, lest it should make him giddy, and so he be in danger of falling, but he hath his eyes fixed on the bank or shore that he goeth over unto: even so a Christian, passing through the waves of the troubles of this world, lifteth up his eyes to heaven, and beholding there, with a spiritual regard, the quiet bank that he shall come to by Christ, respecteth not the troubles that he is in, which troubles the wicked do respect, and that is it that casteth them into desperation.

—Cawdray, 1609.

(2773.) Travellers tell us that they that are on the top of the Alps may see great showers of rain fall under them, which they overlook, but not one drop of it comes at them. And he that is on the top of some high tower mindeth not the croaking of frogs and toads, the hissing of serpents, adders, and the like venomous creatures that are below. Thus, a heavenly-minded man, who dwells in heaven on earth, looks through and beyond all troubles and afflictions, rides triumphantly through the storm of disparagements—nay, he boldly stares Death in the face, though never so ugly disguised. As Anaxarchus said to the tyrant, "Tunde, tunde, Anaxarchum non tundis." beat him and bruise him and kill him it may, but he will keep up his soul in the very ruins of his body. —Spencer, 1658.

(2774.) Especially dwell by faith in heaven where love is perfect, and there you will learn more of the work of love. To think believingly that mutual love is heaven itself, and that this is our union with God and Christ and all the holy ones, and that love will be an everlasting felicity, this will breed in us a desire to begin that happy life on earth. And as he that heareth excellent music will long to draw near, and join in the concert or the pleasure; so he that by faith doth dwell much in heaven, and hear how angels and blessed souls do there praise God in the highest fervours of rejoicing love, will be inclined to imitate them, and long to partake of their felicity. —Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2775.) The believer's feelings are those of an exile, who, amidst various comforts, still thinks of his home, his country, and his friends. The hope of his return gilds the intermediate hours of his existence; he fulfils his duty, he refreshes his spirit, by the objects of beauty or of interest which are around him, but his affections cling around his native shores. To that forgotten scene the needle of his heart turns hourly. Thus it is with the Christian on whom the mercy of God is exerting its sacred and purifying influence. Religion is to him, not the cold balance of certain restrictions and certain comforts, but the warm acknowledgments of infinite obligations and infinite love. It is the blessed and refreshing conviction that yet a little while, and the veil which hides him from his true happiness will be withdrawn; that yet a little while, and the Saviour, into whose hands he has confided the great interests of his soul, will return. —Salter.

(2776.) The fact respecting a strong though rational direction in the mind of man toward heavenly things, however it may raise suspicion in those who have not felt it, is unquestionable among such as have. To illustrate the subject:—I see a small bar of steel in the lid of a box now before me. I see it tremble, as if undetermined, yet keep a certain direction. I can cause it to deviate from its point by impulse; but, though I can disturb its natural direction, I cannot give it a new one. Nay, this very disturbance will still more fully discover its inclination; it will put it upon labouring to recover its point: if I cease to agitate, it will soon cease to vibrate, and will return to its proper rest. Of this I am clearly conscious; but I am not more conscious of this fact than I am of another, of which the former may stand as an emblem. Thousands, as well as myself, know that the polar direction of the steel is not more a matter of fact in the natural world than the heavenly direction they feel is a fact in the moral world, and that a disposition often observed in men who were once the most reprobate—to “live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world,” is the proper effect of this influence. —Cecil, 1748-1810.

(2777.) Enough of heaven is known to make the confident hope of it one of the greatest purifying powers that you can bring to bear upon our polluted natures. Heaven is far away, but not too far away to make its power felt. All of us here have seen the ebb and flow of the tide. We know what a wondrous provision that is in nature, what a service that tide renders to commerce, how it keeps the great bed of the waters of the sea from stagnation and corruption. At one time we see the waters rolling seaward and westward, bearing on its bosom all who wish to go in that direction, and presently we see it turning round and flowing eastward and seaward, bearing all who wish to go in that direction. If you and I had power to stop the tidal motion of the waters, and were to exercise that power, we cannot tell the mischief we should inflict on thousands of cities, whilst we should ruin not a few. And I ask you where is the power that produces this tidal motion? The winds do not accomplish it; the earth nowhere carries the power in her own bosom; the power is far away. A quarter of a million of miles away the moon walks across the sky in her unsullied brightness. There is the first depository of the great power by which God makes this tidal motion in the waters. Farther away the sun burns in his brightness and splendour, and there is the second great depository that makes this useful and wondrous tidal motion. These heavenly bodies seem to reach through the intervening space, and with a hand of gravitating power take hold of the waters on the face of the earth and lift them up towards themselves. This teaches us that in God's universe one world is made to tell with practical power upon another world. The work, the blessed work, may be done here, and the power that does it may be as far away as the third heaven. And what we see in nature is what our text tells us is to take place in the kingdom of His grace. Heaven is far away, but the life we are to have in heaven is to be telling with daily power upon the life we live upon the earth. What I am to be there, is to influence me every day in what I do here; what you are to be there, is to influence you every day in what you are here. —Vince.

(2778.) Paul had established in his mind such a clear conviction of the invisible world, of the state of the redeemed beyond this life, that it had become a refuge to him (2 Cor. iv. 16, v. 8). This world could not touch him. He had the power of losing himself in that other world. He had a spiritual antithesis of sleep. We, every day, know how to hide ourselves from care and trouble by sinking into sleep. Men are like a traveller in a wilderness pursued by wolves. He scares them, he kills some, he wounds others, he keeps them at bay; and yet they hang on and howl, and run in at chances with snapping and yelping, until at length he espies a cave whose mouth is narrow and easily barred; and, entering, he blocks the passage; and retiring far back, secure, beyond the sound of his enemies, he lies down in the cool and dry cavern, with full security from the pestering, dangerous pack. Every day we are hunted, and every night we find the cave of sleep, and all our cares are baffled, though they lie in ambush waiting for the morrow. But we know how to find the dark caves, and there we elude all our pursuers. But Paul had a cave for the day, as well as for the night. By faith he rose into the bright and heavenly sphere, and left troubles barking and bawled far down below. —Becher.

(2779.) A minister of the Gospel was one day visiting a pious old woman who was in the poor-house. While in conversation with her on the comforts, prospects, and rewards of religion, the minister saw an unusual lustre beaming from her countenance, and the calmness of Christian triumph glistening in her eye. Addressing her by name, he said :

"Will you tell me what thought it was that passed through your mind which was the cause of your appearing so joyful?"

The reply of the "old disciple" was, "Oh, sir, I was just thinking what a change it will be from the poorhouse to heaven!"

26. The ardour with which the Christian longs for it.

(2780.) Even as a little bird shut up in a cage, although the cage be very precious and costly, desireth to go out, and striveth to have her liberty, and in her eager desire to be gone doth oftentimes thrust her bill through the loops of the cage; so the soul of a virtuous man, inflamed with an unfeigned love of God; being shut up in the coop of his body, although he abound with all necessities fit for the preservation of this temporal life, doth most earnestly desire to depart hence and go to his country, which is heaven.

—Cawdray, 1609.

—Bayne, 1617.

(2782.) As the fire mounteth upwards to its proper place, and as the needle still trembleth till it stand at the north; so the soul once inflamed with the heavenly fire, and acquainted with her first original, cannot be at rest until it find itself in that comfortable way which certainly leads homewards.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(2783.) There is a great deal of difference between the desires of heaven in a sanctified man and an unsanctified. The believer prizeth it above earth, and had rather be with God than here (though death that stands in the way, may possibly have harder thoughts from him). But to the ungodly, there is nothing seemeth more desirable than this world; and therefore he only chooseth heaven before hell, but not before earth; and therefore shall not have it upon such a choice. We hear of gold and silver mines in the Indies: if you offer a golden mountain there to an Englishman that hath an estate and family here that are dear unto him, perhaps he will say, "I am uncertain whether their golden mountains be not mere fictitious to deceive men; and if it be true that there are such things, yet it is a great way thither, and the seas are perilous; and I am well enough already where I am, and therefore let who will go thither for me, I will stay at home as long as I can." But if this man must needs be banished out of England, and had his choice whether he would go to the golden islands, or to dig in a coal-pit, or live in a wilderness, he would rather choose the better than the worse. So it is with an ungodly man's desires, in respect to this world and that to come. If he could stay here, in fleshy pleasure for ever, he would; because he looks at heaven as uncertain and a great way off, and the passage seemeth to him more troublesome and dangerous than it is, and he is, where he would be already. But when he sees that there is no staying here for ever, but death will have him away, he had rather go to heaven than to hell, and therefore will be religious, as far as the flesh and the world will give him leave, lest he should be cast into hell when he is taken from the earth.

But take an Englishman that is in poverty and reproach, and hath neither house nor land, nor friend to comfort him, and let him have the offer of a golden island, and a person of unquestionable skillfulness and fidelity that will promise in short time to bring him safe thither; if he believe this person, and can put his trust in him, doubtless he will be gone and follow him over sea and land; and though the passage may somewhat daunt him, yet the promised possession will carry him through all. So it is with the true Christian: he is dead to this world, and sees nothing here in which he can be happy; he is burdened and wearied with sin and suffering; he is firmly persuaded of the truth of the Gospel, and seeth by faith the world that is to flesh invisible; and believeth in Jesus Christ who hath promised to convey him safely thither, and therefore he would go away; and though he love not death, the stormy passage, yet he will submit to it, having so sure a pilot, because he loves the life which through death he must pass into, and had rather be there than here.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2784.) Conceive the case of a man, who, having been cast upon a dreary inhospitable island, awaits the time for a vessel to come and bear him away. He paces its barren and desert sands, and looks up at the overcast sky, anxiously waiting for its arrival to carry him to a land of light and fertility. So the Christian, like the exile on a rock, feels that he is far from his natural home, and is looking for, and hasting unto the day of our Lord Jesus Christ. He knows that the vessel is prepared, and the convoy ready, which are to bear him hence from a barren wilderness to a happy land flowing with milk and honey.

—Salter.

(2785.) When on one occasion a crowd of crusaders approached the Holy City, and caught the first sight of its spires and turrets through the blue luminous tremors of the distance, some knelt in silent praise, some kissed the earth, some prayed and laughed and wept in wild emotion; and knight and palmer, old man and little child, joined to raise the cry, "Jerusalem, Jerusalem!" Ought not a sight of the "heavenly Jerusalem" to inspire within us a vehement heavenliness, and make us in greater earnest to be there?

—Stanford.

27. Longings for it strengthen with the spiritual life.

(2786.) None long for heaven more than those who enjoy most of heaven; all delays now are exceedingly tedious to such. Their continual moan is "Why is His chariot so long in coming? Why tarry the wheels of His chariot?" The last year is thought longer by the apprentice than all his time before, because now it is nearer out.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2787.) Hope begets in a Christian a holy impatience after further attainments, especially when it grows to some strength. The higher our hopes of salvation rise, the more will our hearts widen and distend themselves in holy desires; "Not only they, but we ourselves also, which have the first-fruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body." Methinks rejoicing would better become them for what they had already, than groaning for what they have not. Who may better stay long for their dinner, than they who have their stomachs stayed with a good breakfast? This would hold in bodily food, but not spiritual. No doubt, the sweetness which they tasted from their first-fruits in hard, did cheer their spirits; but the thoughts of what was behind, made them groan. Hope waits for all, and will not let the soul sit down contented, till all the dishes be on the board, till the whole harvest that stands on the field of the promise be reaped and well inned. Yea, the more the Christian hath received in partial payments, the deeper groans hope makes the soul fetch for what is behind; because these foretastes do acquaint the Christian more with the nature of those joys which are in heaven, and so enlarge his understanding to have more raised conceptions of the felicity those enjoy that are arrived there: and the increasing of his knowledge must needs enlarge his desires, and those desires break out into sad groans, to think what sweet wine is drunk in full bowls by glorified saints, and he live where only a sip is allowed, that doth not satisfy, but kindle his thirst. It is harder now for him to live on this side heaven, than before he knew so much. He is like one that stands at the door, within which is a company set at a rich feast; he hears them how merry they are; and through the key-hole he sees what variety they have; and by a little which he licks from the trenchers that are brought out, is sensible how delicious their fare is: Oh, how such a one's teeth would water after their cheer, which another misseeth not, that hears not of it, or only hears, and tastes not of their dainties!

Gurnall, 1617-1679.

28. Foretastes of its joys are granted here and now.

(2788.) How do the heavenly-minded welcome death, desiring to depart! What foretastes do they often have, as they approach the confines of Canaan! Land-birds of beautiful plumage greeted Columbus days before his eye caught a glimpse of the New World. A more southern voyager found himself in the fresh waters of the Amazon before discovering the continent whence they came. So, at the close of life's voyage, do birds of paradise come hitherward, careering on bright wings, and the river of life sends its refreshing current far out into the briny sea of this world.

—A. C. Thompson.

(2789.) If we really live under the hope of future happiness, we shall taste it by way of anticipation and forethought; an image of it will meet our minds often, and stay there, as all pleasing expectations do.

—Atterbury, 1662-1732.

29. The journey thither.

(1.) The difficulties of the way.

(2790.) Jonathan and his armour-bearer, being upon their march against the Philistines, were to pass betwixt two rocks, the one called Bozez, which signifies dirty; the other called Seneh, which signifies thorny—a hard passage. But on they went, as we say, through thick and thin, and at last gained the victory. The Israelites were first brought to the bitter waters of Marah before they might taste of the pleasant fountains or the milk and honey of Canaan. And in vain shall any man expect the river of God's pleasures before he hath pledged Christ in the cup of bitterness; when we have pledged Him in His gall and vinegar, then He will drink to us in the new wine of His kingdom. He that is the Door and the Way hath taught us that there is but one way, one door, one passage to heaven, and that a strait one, through which, though we do pass with much pressure and tugging, having our superfluous rags torn away from us here, in the crowd of this world, yet we shall be happy. He that will be knighted must kneel for it, and he that will enter in at the strait gate must crowd for it—a gate made so on purpose, narrow and hard in the entrance, yet, after we have entered, wide and glorious, that after our pain our joy may be the sweeter.

—Adams, 1653.

(2.) The difficulties of the way are not to turn us from it.

(2791.) In my course to heaven, almost all things are against me; but God is for me, and how happily still doth the work succeed! Do I set upon this work in my own strength, or rather in the strength of Christ my Lord; and cannot I do all things through Him that strengtheneth me? Was He ever foiled, or subdued by an enemy? He hath been assaulted indeed, but was He ever conquered? Can they take the sheep till they have overcome the shepherd? Why then doth my flesh lay open to me the difficulties, and urge me so much with the greatness and troubles of the work? It is Christ that must answer all these objections, and what are the difficulties that can stay His power? Is anything too hard for the omnipotent God? May not Peter boldly walk on the sea, if Christ do but give the word of command; and if he begin to sink, is it from the weakness of Christ, or the smallness of his faith? The water, indeed, is but a sinking ground to tread on, but if Christ be by, and countenance us in it; if He be ready to reach us His hand, who would draw back from fear of danger? Is not sea and land alike to Him? Shall I be driven from my God, and from my everlasting rest, as the silly birds are frightened from their food with a man of clouts, or a loud noise, when I know before there is no danger in it? How do I see men daily in these wars adventure upon armies, and forts, and cannons, and cast themselves upon the instruments of death; and have not I as fair a prize before me, and as much encouragement to adventure as they? What do I venture? My life at most; and in these prosperous times there is not one of many that ventures that. What do I venture on? Are they not unarmed foes? A great hazard, indeed, to venture on the hard thoughts of the world; or on the scorns and slanders of a wicked tongue! Surely, these serpent's teeth are out; these vipers are easily shaken into the fire; these adders have no stings;

these thorns have lost their prickles. As all things below are silly comforters, so are they silly, toothless enemies; bugbears to frighten fools and children, rather than powerful, dreadful foes.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(3.) At the end of the way there is a sufficient recompense for all that can befall us in it.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(2793.) The difficulty of obtaining shows the excellency; and, surely, if you consider but what it cost Christ to purchase it; what it costs God's Spirit to bring men's hearts to it; what it costs ministers to persuade to it; what it costs Christians, after all this, to obtain it; and what it costs many a half-Christian that, after all, goes without it; you will say, that here is difficulty, and therefore excellency. Trifles may be had at a trivial rate, and men may have damnation far more easily. It is but to lie still, and sleep out our days in careless laziness. It is but to take our pleasure, and mind the world, and cast away the thoughts of sin, and grace, and Christ, and heaven, and hell, out of our minds; and do as the most do, and never trouble ourselves about these high things, but venture our souls upon our presumptuous conceits and hopes, and let the vessel swim which way it will; and then stream, and wind, and tide, will all help us apace to the gulf of perdition. You may burn a hundred houses easier than build one; and kill a thousand men, than make one alive. The descent is easy, the ascent not so. To bring diseases is but to cherish sloth, please the appetite, and take what most delights us; but to cure them, will cost bitter pills, loathsome potions, tedious gripings, abstemious, accurate living; and perhaps all fall short too. He that made the way, and knows the way better than we, hath told us "it is narrow and strait," and requires striving; and they that have paced it more truly and observantly than we, do tell us it lies through many tribulations, and is with much ado passed through. Conclude, then, it is surely somewhat worth that must cost all this.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

HELL.

1. Its locality unknown.

(2794.) Some of the upper part of the earth is to us yet terra incognita, an unknown land; but all of the lowest part of hell is to us an unknown land. Many thousands have travelled thither, but none have returned thence, to make reports, or write books of their travels. That piece of geography is very imperfect. . . . When a curious inquisitor asked Austin what God did before He created the world, Austin told him He was making hell for such busy questionists, for such curious inquirers into God's secrets. Such handsome jerks are the best answers to men of curious minds. It concerns us but little to know where hell is. Certainly they are the best and wisest of men, who spend most thoughts, and time, and pains how to keep out of it, than to exercise themselves with disputes about it.

—Brooks, 1608-1680.

2. Reasonableness of belief in its existence.

(2795.) Hell is the infinite terror of the soul, whatever that may be. To one man it is pain. Rid him of that, he can bear all degradation. To another it is public shame. Save him from that, and he will creep and crawl before you to submit to any reptile meanness. "Honour me now, I pray thee, before the people," cries Saul, till Samuel turns from the abject thing in scorn. To others, the infinite terror is that compared with which all these would be a bed of roses. It is the hell of having done wrong—the hell of having had a spirit from God, pure, with high aspirations, and to be conscious of having dulled its delicacy, and degraded its desires—the hell of having quenched a light brighter than the sun's, of having done to another an injury that through time and through eternity never can be undone—infinite, maddening remorse—the hell of knowing that every chance of excellence, and every opportunity of good, has been lost for ever. This is the infinite terror; this is wrath to come.

You doubt that? Have you ever marked that striking fact, the connection of the successive stages of the soul? How sin can change the countenance, undermine the health, produce restlessness? Think you the grave will end all that? That by some magic change, the moral being shall be buried there, and the soul rise again so changed in every feeling that the very identity of being would be lost, and it would amount to the creation of a new soul? Say you that God is love? Oh! but look round this world. The aspect of things is stern; very stern. If they be ruled by love, it is a love which does not shrink from human agony. There is a law of infinite mercy here, but there is a law of boundless rigour too. Sin, and you will suffer—that law is not reversed. The young, and the gentle, and the tender, are inexorably subjected to it. We would shield them if we could; but there is that which says they shall not be shielded. They shall weep, and fade, and taste of mortal anguish, even as others. Carry that out into the next world, and you have "wrath to come."

—Robertson, 1816-1853.

3. The dungeon of the universe.

(2796.) I confess it greatly quicketh my mind against this great objection of the numbers that are damned and cast off for ever, to consider how small a part this earth is of God's creation, as well as how sinful and impenitent. Ask any astronomer that hath considered the innumerable numbers of the fixed stars and planets, with their distances and magnitude and glory, and the uncertainty that we have whether there be not as many more, or a hundred or thousand times as many, unseen to man as all those which we see (considering the defectiveness of man's sight), and the planets about Jupiter, with the innumerable stars in the milky way, which the tube hath lately discovered, which man's eyes without it could not see : I say, ask any man who knoweth these things, whether all this earth be any more in comparison of the whole creation than one prison is to a kingdom or empire, or the paring of one nail, or a little mole, or wart, or a hair in comparison of a whole body. And if God should cast off all this earth, and use all the sinners in it as they deserve, it is no more sign of a want of benignity, or mercy in Him, than it is for a king to cast one subject of a million into a gaol, to hang him for his murder or treason or rebellion ; or for a man to kill one louse which is but a molestation to the body that beareth it, or than it is to pare a man's nails, or to cut off a wart, or a hair, or to pull out an aching, rotten tooth. I know it is a thing uncertain and unrevealed to us, whether all these globes be inhabited or not. But he that considereth, that there is scarce any uninhabitable place on earth, or in the water, or air ; but men, or beasts, or birds, or fishes, or flies, or worms, and moles, do take up almost all ; will think it a probability so near a certainty as not to be much doubted of, that the vaster and more glorious parts of the creation are not uninhabited ; but that they have inhabitants answerable to their magnitude and glory, as palaces have other inhabitants than cottages ; and that there is a con-naturality and agreeableness there as well as here, between the region, or globe, and the inhabitants. But whether it be the globes themselves, or only the interspaces, or other parts, that are thus inhabited, no reason can doubt, but that those more vast and glorious spaces are proportionably possessed. And whether they are all to be called angels or spirits, or by what other name, is unrevealed to us : but whatever they are called, I make no question but our number to theirs, is not one to a million at the most. Now this being so, for aught we know, those glorious parts may have inhabitants without any sin or misery ; who are filled with their Maker's love and goodness, and so, fitter to be the demonstration of that love and goodness than this sinful molehill or dungeon of ignorance is. If I were sure that God would save all mankind, and only leave the devils in their damnation, and forsake no part of His creation but their hell, it would not be any great stumbling to my faith. Or if earth were all God's creation, and I were sure that He would condemn but one man of a hundred thousand, or a million, and that only for final impenitency in the contempt of the mercy which would have saved him, this would be no great difficulty to my faith ; why then should it be an offence to us, if God, for their final refusal of His grace, do for ever forsake and punish the far greater part of this little, dark, and sinful world, while He glorifieth His benignity and love abundantly upon innumerable angels, and blessed spirits, and inhabitants of those more large and glorious seats ? If you would judge of the beneficence of a king, will you go to the gaol and the gallows to discern it ; or to his palace, and all the rest of his kingdom ? And will you make a few condemned malefactors the measure of it ; or all the rest of his obedient prosperous subjects ? If hell be totally forsaken of God, as having totally forsaken Him ; and if earth have made itself next to hell, and be forsaken as to the far greater part, because that greater part hath forsaken Him ; as long as there may be millions of blessed ones above to one of these forsaken ones on earth, it should be no offence to any but the selfish, guilty sinner. I confess, I rather look upon it as a great demonstration of God's holiness and goodness in His justice, that He will punish the rebellious according to His laws ; and a great demonstration of His goodness in His mercy, that He will save any of such a rebellious world, and hath not forsaken it utterly, as hell. And when of all the thousands of globes or worlds which He hath made, we know of none forsaken by Him ; but hell, and part of the earth, all the devils, and most of men ; we should admire the glory of His bounty, and be thankful, with joy, that we are not of the forsaken number ; and that even among sinners, He will cast off none but those that finally reject His mercy.

But selfishness and sense do make men blind, and judge of good and evil only by self-interest and feeling : and the malefactor will hardly magnify justice, nor take it to be a sign of goodness : but God will be God, whether selfish rebels will or not.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2797.) The unseen bears to the seen world the same relation which the vast universe bears to a house or mansion. Every house, however sumptuous, is more or less dark, more or less confined, limits more or less the view of the surrounding country, defiles more or less, through its enclosures, the purity of the atmosphere. But go abroad from the midnight festival, where lamps shed an artificial glare, and the house reeks with the odours of the banquet,—go abroad into the still, solemn starlight, and catch the fresh breeze on thy brow, and look upwards into the vast expanse, lit up with the lamps of heaven. Or go forth from the close and darkened chamber of sleep, into the light and stir of the fair summer morning, when the woods and streams are vocal with melody, and every little insect is on the wing, and all nature teems with life and animation. Such is the passage from the sphere which is seen with the eye of flesh, to that which is not seen ; from the false artificial lights of time, to the solemn stillness of eternity ; from the noxious vapours of the world, to the pure breath of heaven's atmosphere ; from scenes where man's art and man's handicraft have on all sides set up their memorials, to scenes which man has never trodden. To that unseen realm whereof we speak, the Gehenna, so often confounded with it, bears the same relation, as the dungeon of a baronial castle bears to the entire domain of the feudal lord. The dungeon is the place of punishment and incarceration, where prisoners expiate, by slow degrees, their offences,—allowed to pine away in darkness and solitude, shut out from the blessed light of heaven, shut out from the hum and stir of human intercourse, from the joyous sound of the huntsman's bugle, and the gay minstrelsy of the banquetting-hall. And Gehenna is that spot of everlasting banishment from light, which forms, or will form, the prison-house of the impenitent, a small and insignificant nificant section of the vast domains of Him, of whom we read that He is Light, and that He is Love.

—Goulburn.

4. The wickedness of its inhabitants.

(2798.) How little you know what will be the effect of what you do when you cast that little black seed of a poisonous plant into the ground. It looks as fine as a seed of the most harmless flower; but how little do you know what it will come to. How little do you know what the plant will be from the seed. And so shall it be with the human soul that grows and grows in pride, in selfishness, and in hostility to the Divine will. Such a soul drops into death as the seed drops into the open furrow. Its roots shall come forth again, it shall lift up its trunk again, it shall grow again; but, oh! who can tell what that growth may come to? To what will the unregenerate man come when he grows in the soil of another life? If in all our developments here we are but seeds, to what states of wickedness shall we come in that land where all restraints are removed from men, and they are left to be swept on by the whole force and impetus of their depraved natures?
—Becher.

5. The misery of its inhabitants.

(1.) Its utterness.

(2799.) Hell is the centre in which all the lines of sin and of misery meet, the common shoal into which they all disgorge themselves, as rivers do their streams into the vast ocean; and as rivers, when they are fallen into the sea, lose their several names in one that comprehends them all—the ocean;—so all the evils of this life, when resolved into this, forget their private names—sickness, pains, poverty, &c.—and are called HELL; not that these are all formally and literally there, but virtually, in that the torment of the damned doth not only amount to, but beyond expression exceed them all. As in heaven there is no belly-cheer, yet a feast; no silks and satins worn, yet all in glorious robes; as silver is in gold, and gold in a jewel, so all these are in heaven, because that is of infinitely more value and worth than such things as are of highest reckoning on earth. Thus the great miseries of this life are incomparably less than the least torment of hell. Never can the creature say he is completely miserable till the devouring jaws of that infernal pit enclose him. Were the worst of his punishment what he feels here, he might in a manner bless himself; as Paul on the contrary saith, he should judge the saint miserable above others if all his hope were here. But there is the sinner's caseless endless state; there is not so much as one well day to release him a while from his pain, but he shall continue for ever in the height of his paroxysm; no change of weather or hope of clearing, but a perpetual storm set in to rain fire and brimstone upon him to all eternity, for so long it will be before the arm of the Almighty is weary of pouring out His wrath, or His heart be brought in love with sin, and reconciled to the sinner.
—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2800.) The lost soul will raise himself out of the fire only to fall back into it. He will always feel the desire of rising, because he was created for God, as a bird shut up in a room flies to the ceiling and falls down again; the justice of God is the ceiling which keeps down the lost.
—Vianney.

(2.) From what it arises.

(2801.) In hell it is sin that is the pitch in the barrel that makes it burn, it is sin in the conscience that makes the fire; God's wrath comes upon it, but it is that which burns.

—Goodwin, 1600-1679.

6. Its unquenchable fire.

—Chrysostom, 347-407.

(2803.) Oh, sirs, were all the water in the sea ink, and every pile of grass a pen, and every hair on all the men's heads in the world the hand of a ready writer, all would be too short graphically to delineate the nature of this dungeon, where all lost souls must lodge for ever. . . . If all the fires that ever were, or shall be in the world, were contracted into one fire, yet such a fire would be but as a painted fire upon the wall, to the fire of hell! . . . They that have seen the flames and heard the thunderings of Ætna, the flushing of Vesuvius, the thundering and burning flakes evaporating from those marine rocks, have not seen, no, not so much as the very glimmering of hell. A painted fire is a better shadow of these, than these can be of hell-torments, and the miseries of the damned therein. . . . Infernal fire is neither tolerable nor terminable. Impenitent sinners in hell shall have end without end, death without death, night without day, mourning without mirth, sorrow without solace, and bondage without liberty. The damned shall live as long in hell as God Himself shall live in heaven. Their imprisonment in that land of darkness, in that bottomless pit, is not an imprisonment during the King's pleasure, but an imprisonment during the everlasting displeasure of the King of kings.
—Brooks, 1608-1680.

(2804.) Unless under such miraculous circumstances as those in which the three Hebrew children walked unhurt in the furnace, or the mountain bush, as if bathed in dew, flowered amid the flames, life cannot exist in fire under any shape or form. No creature feeds, or breeds, or breathes in flames. What the winds fan, and the soil nourishes, and the dews refresh, fire kills. It scorches whatever it touches, and whatever breathes it, dies. Turning the stateliest tree, and sweetest flowers, and loveliest form of the daughters of Eve, into a heap of ashes, or a coal-black cinder, fire is the tomb of beauty, and the sepulchre of all life; the only region and realm within which death reigns, with none to dispute his sway. And thus the characteristic feature of this element—beside the pain it inflicts—is the death it works.

Suppose, then, that the fire that is never quenched is but a painted flame—grant that it is nothing but a symbol or figure of the punishment which awaits the impenitent and unbelieving, in what respects have they, who have persuaded themselves of that, improved their prospects? It is, "as if a man did flee from a lion, and a bear met him; or went into the house, and leaned his hand on the wall, and a serpent bit him." Although the language of Scripture were figurative, yet expressing as it does the utter consumption and death of all hope and happiness, it is not less madness for any one to reject the Saviour, and for the enjoyment of a passing pleasure to brave so terrible a doom. —Guthrie.

7. Its torments eternal.

(2805.) Wrath to come implies both the futurity and perpetuity of this wrath. It is wrath that shall certainly and inevitably come upon sinners. As sure as the night follows the day, as sure as the winter follows the summer; so shall wrath follow sin and the pleasures thereof. Yea, it is not only certainly future, but when it comes it will be abiding wrath, or wrath still coming. When millions of years and ages are past and gone, this will still be wrath to come. Ever coming as a river ever flowing. —Flavel, 1630-1691.

8. Voluntarily chosen by the wicked.

(2807.) You would not burn in hell, but you will kindle the fire by your sins, and cast yourselves into it; you would not be tormented with devils in hell, but you will do that which will certainly procure it in despite of all that can be said against it. It is just as if you would say, I will drink poison, but yet I will not die; I will cast myself headlong from the top of a steeple, but yet I will not kill myself; I will thrust my knife into my heart, but yet I will not take away my life; I will put this fire into the thatch of my house, but yet I will not burn it. Just so it is with wicked men; they will be wicked, and live after the flesh in the world, and yet they would not be damned. But do you not know that the means do lead unto the end? and that God has by His righteous law concluded that ye must repent or perish? He that will take poison may as well say, I will kill myself, for it will prove no better in the end; though perhaps he loved it for the sweetness of the sugar that was mixed with it, and would not be persuaded it was poison, but that he might take it and do well enough; but it is not his conceit and confidence that will save his life. So if you will be drunkards, or fornicators, or worldlings, or live after the flesh, you may as well say plainly, we will be damned; for so you shall be unless you turn. Would you not rebuke the folly of a thief or murderer that would say, "I will steal or kill, but I will not be hanged;" when he knows that if he do the one, the judge in justice will see that the other be done. If he says, "I will steal and murder," he may as well say plainly, "I will be hanged;" so if you go on a carnal life, you may as well say plainly, "We will go to hell."

Moreover, the wicked will not use those means without which there is no hope of their salvation. He that will not eat may as well say plainly he will not live, unless he can tell how to live without meat. He that will not go his journey may as well say plainly he will not come to the end. He that falls into the water, and will not come out, nor suffer another to help him out, may as well say plainly he will be drowned. So if you be carnal and ungodly, and will not be converted, but think it more ado than needs, you may as well say plainly you will be damned. For if you have found out a way to be saved without conversion, you have done that which was never done before. —Baxter, 1615-1691.

9. In what sense it is the doom of the rejectors of Christ.

(2808.) A man being sick and like to die, the physician, knowing his case, takes with him some preservative to comfort him, and coming to the door falls a-knocking. Now, if he either will not or be not able to let him in, he must of necessity perish, and the cause cannot properly lie at the physician's door, who was ready and willing to relieve him, but in himself, that is not willing to be relieved. Thus it is that sin is a disease whereof we are all sick. We have all sinned. Now, Christ is the great Physician of our souls; He came down formerly from heaven on purpose to heal us, and He comes down daily to the door of our hearts, and there He knocks. If we but open the door of our hearts He will come in and sup with us, as He did with Mary, and forgive all our sins; but if we will not let Him in, or, through long contagion of sin, be not able to let Him in, we must of necessity die in our sins; and the case is evident, not because He doth not offer grace, but because we receive it not when it is offered. —Inchiusus.

(2809.) It must not be forgotten that there is a broad distinction between a penalty and a consequence, as those terms are commonly understood. When Christ said, "He that believeth not shall be damned," He announced a consequence. He did not threaten a penalty in the usual acceptation of the term. A consequence is the direct and inevitable result of certain processes, partaking of their very nature, and inseparable from them; but a penalty may possibly be something different, something arbitrarily superadded, regardless of adaptation or measure. Being chilled is a consequence of exposure to cold air, but being flogged for such exposure is a penalty. Eternal punishment is the consequence of rejecting the Gospel, not a penalty (in the low sense of revenge) attached to a crime. —Parker.

10. Men should be warned against it.

(2810.) The thought of the future punishment for the wicked, which the Bible reveals, is enough to make an earthquake of terror in every man's soul. I do not accept the doctrine of eternal punishment because I delight in it. I would cast in doubts, if I could, till I had filled hell up to the brim. I would destroy all faith in it; but that would do me no good; I could not destroy the thing. Nor does it help me to take the word "everlasting," and put it into a rack like an inquisitor, until I make it shriek out some other meaning; I cannot alter the stern fact.

The exposition of future punishment in God's Word is not to be regarded as a threat, but as a merciful declaration. If, in the ocean of life, over which we are bound to eternity, there are these rocks and shoals, it is no cruelty to chart them down; it is an eminent and prominent mercy.

—Becker.

(2811.) I firmly believe that it is by the power of Christ that every man who shall touch the shore of heaven will be saved, but I am not authorised to say that God uses no other channels of grace than those that we know, and that in the sovereignty of His love He cannot make up to men who are in darkness that salvation which we reject, and give them a reflected light, at least, of that glory which shines full on us!

But, for all those who have been clearly taught, who have been moved by their wicked passions deliberately to set aside Him of whom the prophet spake, whom the apostles more clearly taught, whom the Holy Spirit, by the Divine power, makes known now to the world, through the Gospel—for them, if they reject their Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin. If they deliberately neglect, set aside, or reject their Saviour, He will as deliberately in the end reject them, and for ever set them apart from the glory of heaven.

Sometimes, in dark caves, men have gone to the edge of unspeaking precipices, and, wondering what was the depth, have cast down fragments of rock, and listened for the report of their fall, that they might judge how deep that blackness was; and, listening!—still listening!—no sound returns! no sullen splash, no clinking stroke as of rock against rock—nothing but silence, utter silence! And so I stand upon the precipice of life. I sound the depths of the other world with curious inquiries. But from it comes no echo, and no answer to my questions. No analogies can grapple and bring up from the depths of the darkness of the lost world the probable truths. No philosophy has line and plummet long enough to sound the depths. There remains for us only the few authoritative and solemn words of God. These declare that the bliss of the righteous is everlasting; and with equal directness and simplicity they declare that the doom of the wicked is everlasting.

The incorrigibly wicked, the deliberately impenitent, have nothing to hope in the future, if they set aside the light and the glory that shines in the face of Jesus Christ. And therefore it is that I make haste, with an inconceivable ardour, to persuade you to be reconciled to your God. I hold up before you that God who loves the sinners and abhors sin; who loves goodness with infinite fervour, and breathes it upon those who put their trust in Him; who makes all the elements His ministering servants; who sends years, and weeks, and days, and hours, all radiant with beneficence, and, if we would but hear their voice, all pleading the goodness of God as an argument of repentance and of obedience. And remember that it is this God who yet declares that He will at last by no means clear the guilty. Make your peace with Him now, or abandon all hopes of peace!

—Becher.

11. Inefficacy of unbelief in its existence.

(2812.) O my brother! your opinion about “for ever” can have no manner of effect upon the reality of that “for ever!” A party of boatmen on the Niagara river may have a very strong opinion when they are caught by the rapids that it is very pleasant rowing; but neither their shouts nor their merriment will alter the fact that the world’s cataclysm is close at hand.

You have a strong opinion that hell-fire is a delusion; that they are superstitious, and cruel, and ignorant who ask you to pause, and awake, and prepare for this coming, this continued retribution; but your opinion will not have the slightest, the remotest, the minutest influence on the tremendous fact.

—Reynolds.

HOLINESS.

1. Defined.

(2813.) I do not mean by holiness the mere performance of outward duties of religion, coldly acted over, as a task; not our habitual prayings, hearings, fastings, multiplied one upon another (though these be all good, as subservient to a higher end); but I mean an inward soul and principle of divine life (Romans viii. 1–5), that spiriteth all these. . . . The first, though it work in us some outward conformity to God’s commandments, and so hath a good effect upon the world, yet we are all this while but like dead instruments of music, that sound sweetly and harmoniously when they are only struck and played upon from without by the musician’s hand, who hath the theory and law of music living within himself; but the second, the living law of the Gospel, “the law of the Spirit of life” within us, is as if the soul of music should incorporate itself with the instrument, and live in the strings, and make them of their own accord, without any touch or impulse from without, dance up and down, and warble out their harmonies.

—Cudworth, 1617–1688.

2. As displayed in God and Man.

(2814.) If the stars, which appeared most brilliant during the night, lose their splendour on the rising of the sun, what can we suppose will be the case with the most excellent innocence of man, when compared with the purity of God?

—Calvin, 1509–1564.

(2815.) The holiness of a covenant soul is a resemblance of the holiness of God, and formed by it, as the picture of the sun in a cloud is a fruit of his beams, and an image of its author. The fulness of the perfection of holiness remains in the nature of God, as the fulness of the light does in the sun; yet there are transmissions from the sun to the moon, and it is a light of the same nature both in the one and in the other. The holiness of a creature is nothing else but the reflection of the Divine holiness upon it.

—Charnock, 1628–1680.

(2816.) There is as little proportion between the holiness of the Divine majesty and that of the most righteous creature, as there is between the nearness of a person that stands upon a mountain to the sun, and of him that beholds him in a vale; one is nearer than the other, but it is an advantage not to be boasted, in regard of the vast distance that is between the sun and the elevated spectator.

—Charnock, 1628–1680.

(2817.) No creature can be essentially holy but by participation from the chief fountain of holiness, but we must have the same kind of holiness, the same truth of holiness; as a short line may be as straight as another, though it parallel it not in the immense length of it; a copy may have the likeness of the original, though not the same perfection. We cannot be good without eyeing some exemplar of goodness as the pattern. No pattern is so suitable as that which is the highest goodness and purity. That limner that would draw the most excellent piece fixes his eye upon the most excellent pattern. He that would be a good orator, or poet, or artificer, considers some person most excellent in each kind as the object of his imitation. Who so fit as God to be viewed as the pattern of holiness in our intendment of, and endeavours after, holiness? The Stoics, one of the best sects of philosophers, advised their disciples to pitch upon some eminent example of virtue, according to which to form their lives, as Soerates, &c. But true holiness doth not only endeavour to live the life of a good man, but chooses to live a divine life. As before the man was "alienated from the life of God," so upon his return he aspires after the life of God. To endeavour to be like a good man is to make one image like another, to set our clocks by other clocks without regarding the sun; but true holiness consists in a likeness to the most exact sampler. God being the first purity, is the rule as well as the spring of all purity in the creature, the chief and first object of imitation.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

3. Is well-pleasing to God.

(2818.) God is essentially, originally, and efficiently holy: all the holiness in men and angels is but a crystal stream that runs from this glorious ocean. God loves holiness, because it is His own image. A king cannot but love to see his own effigies stamped on coin. God counts holiness His glory, and the most sparkling jewel of His crown. "Glorious in holiness."

—Watson, 1696.

(2819.) It must be a prospect pleasing to God Himself to see His creation for ever beautifying in His eyes, and drawing nearer to Him by greater degrees of resemblance. —Addison, 1672-1719.

4. Is absolutely necessary.

(1.) To our salvation.

(2820.) You may as well see without light, and be supported without earth, or live without food, as be saved without holiness, or happy without the one thing necessary (Heb. xii. 14; John iii. 3-5; Matt. xviii. 3). And when this is resolved of by God, and established as His standing law, and He hath told it you so oft and plainly, for any man now to say, "I will yet hope for better, I hope to be saved on easier terms, without all this ado," is no better than to set his face against the God of heaven, and instead of believing God, to believe the contradiction of his own ungodly heart; and to hope to be saved whether God will or not; and to give the lie to his Creator, under the pretence of trust and hope. It is indeed to hope for impossibilities. To be saved without holiness is to see without eyes, and to live without life. And who is so foolish as to hope for this? Few of you are so unreasonable as to hope for a crop at harvest, without ploughing or sowing; or for a house without building; or for strength without eating and drinking; or to sleep and play, when you have nothing to maintain your families, and say you hope that God will maintain both you and them. And yet this were a far wiser kind of hope, than to hope to be saved without the one thing necessary to salvation.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2821.) Holiness indeed is not the cause of our justification, but it is the concomitant; the heat is the sun is not the cause of its light, but it is the concomitant. It is absurd to imagine that God should justify a people, and they go on in sin. If God should justify a people and not sanctify them, He should justify a people whom He could not glorify. God, as He is an holy God, cannot lay a sinner in His bosom. The metal is first refined before the king's stamp is put upon it: first the soul is refined with holiness, before God puts the royal stamp of justification upon it.

—Watson, 1696.

(2.) To our acceptance with God.

(2822.) A mere existence or being is an indifferent thing (it is a rasa tabula), that may be coloured over with sin or holiness; and accordingly it receives its value from these; as a picture is esteemed not from the materials upon which it is drawn, but from the draught itself. Holiness elevates the worth of the being in which it is, and is of more value than the being itself. As in scarlet, the bare dye is of greater value than the cloth. Sin debases the being in which it is; and makes the soul more unlike God, in respect of its qualities, than it is like Him in respect of its substance. It is not the alliance of flesh and blood, but the resemblance of virtue, that makes the greatest likeness between the father and the son. Consanguinity and likeness of features will not so much incite him to love, as a dissimilitude, by reason of vice, will cause him to disinherit him. Better have no son, than a prodigal, profane, unclean son; better not to be a man, than an irreligious man; better an innocent nothing, than a sinful being. God has shed some of His perfections upon the natural fabric of the soul, in that He made it a spiritual, immaterial substance, refined from all the dross of body and matter; but the chief perfection of it consisted in this, that He did adorn it with holiness. As the temple of Solomon was glorious, because built with cedar; but its chief magnificence was the overlaying it with gold. But now, when this part of God's image is blotted out, He cannot read His likeness in the soul's other perfections. Be the soul ever so spiritual in its substance, yet if it be carnal in its affections; be it ever so purified from the grossness of body, yet if it be polluted with the corruption of sin; it has nothing to show why God should not disown it, even to its eternal perdition. If we meet with a letter drawn over with filthy, scurrilous, unbecoming lines, the fineness of the paper will not rescue it from the fire. It is not thy strength, thy wit, thy eloquence, that God so much regards; these indeed may adorn thee, but it is thy holiness that must save thee. A sinner appearing before God, adorned with the greatest confluence of natural endowments, is like Agag presenting himself to Samuel in his costly robes: the richness of his attire could not compound for the vileness of his person. When those glorious pleas shall be produced in the court of heaven, "We have prophesied, we have cast out devils, we have wrought wonders;" God shall answer them with one word, weightier than them all, but "ye have sinned." Howsoever we flatter ourselves, and misjudge of things, yet God will overlook all the natural perfections of the soul, and punish us for want of moral.

—South, 1633-1716.

(2823.) The outward forbearance of sin without toward purity can never commend us to the Divine acceptance. A rebel may be driven from the frontiers, but so long as he keeps the royal city he is unsubdued. So if a lust keeps possession of the heart, though the executive powers may be restrained or disabled from the outward acts, it still reigns.

(2824.) God abhors and man despises the fair colours of a religious profession that stand out, as it were, above the surface of the nature, like the appliqués of the embroiderer, instead of being interwoven with the stuff so as to become a part of it. Mere outward decorum and religious decency are not what God requires, though they are too often, alas ! what is presented to Him in lieu of the beauties of holiness. It is easy to assume the character of God's people, to imitate their manners, to use their language, to conform to their habits. It is easier to paint a flower than to grow one.

—Macmillan.

(3.) To our union with Christ.

(2825.) If God ordains a man to be in Christ, He ordains him to be a member of Christ, and the spouse of Christ. Now the head and members must be homogeneous, and husband and spouse must be of the same kind and image. When Adam was to have a wife, she must be of the same species, she must have the same image upon her. None of the beasts was fit to be a wife for Adam. So if God chooseth a man in Christ, he must necessarily be holy.

—Goodwin, 1600-1679.

(4.) To our safety in temptation.

(2826.) Pray not only against the power of sin, but for the power of holiness also. A naughty heart may pray against his sins, not out of any inward enmity to them, or love to holiness, but because they are troublesome guests to his conscience. His zeal is false that seems hot against sin, but is key-cold to holiness. A city is rebellious that keeps their rightful Prince out, though it receives not his enemy in. Nay, the devil needs not fear, but at last he shall make that soul his garrison again, out of which for a while he seems shut, so long as it stands empty, and is not filled with solid grace (Matt. xii. 44, 45). What indeed should hinder Satan's re-entry into that house which hath none in it to keep him out?

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(5.) To our usefulness here or hereafter.

(2827.) If I may so speak, God has no ultimate use for a man who is not holy, and such a man does not become what he was meant to be. A rose-tree that does not blossom is of no use in a garden. A vine that bears no grapes is of no use in a vineyard. The idiot has no place in the organisation of human life, for intellect is necessary for the fulfilment of the functions of humanity. A criminal has no place in the State; the State can do nothing with him except put him to death, or shut him up where he can do no harm. A vicious man must be cast out of reputable and decent society, because he does not fulfil the conditions which are necessary for a place in it. And in that Divine and everlasting kingdom in which the glory of God and the perfection of man will be at last fully revealed, there can be no place for those who have not an intense passion for holiness, and who do not themselves illustrate its dignity and beauty.

—R. W. Dale.

(6.) To our happiness.

(2828.) In all reasonable creatures there is a certain kind of temper that is essential to happiness, and that is holiness; which, as it is the perfection, so it is the great felicity of the Divine nature: and, on the contrary, this is one chief part of the misery of devils and of unholy men, that they are of a temper contrary to God, they are envious, malicious, and wicked; that is, of such a temper as is naturally a torment and disquiet to itself, and here the foundation of hell is laid in the evil disposition of our spirits; and till that be cured, which can only be done by holiness, it is as impossible for a wicked man to be happy in himself, as it is for a sick man to be at ease; and the external presence of God, and a local heaven, would signify no more to make a wicked man happy, than heaps of gold, and concerts of music, and a well-spread table, and a rich bed, would contribute to a man's ease in the paroxysms of a fever, or in a violent fit of the stone. If a sensual, or covetous, or ambitious man were in heaven, he would be like the rich man in hell, he would be tormented with a continual thirst; and burnt up in the flames of his own ardent desires, and would not meet a drop of suitable pleasure and delight to allay the heat; the reason is, because such a man hath that within him which torments him, and he cannot be at ease till that be removed.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(7.) To qualify us for heaven.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(2830.) Holiness is the image of God, and a likeness unto Him, which makes us capable of communion with Him. As likeness in one man unto another makes him sociable and fit to converse with another man his superior, so holiness for communion with the great God. As some colours are the groundwork to the laying on of others, and all colours to varnish, so is grace a groundwork unto glory and communion with Himself. As reason is the foundation of learning, no man being able to attain it unless he hath reason, so we cannot attain to the glory of heaven, which is meant by adoption, till such time as we have holiness, and perfect holiness. "Without holiness no man shall see God." So that holiness is the image of God which makes us like unto Him, and fit for communion with Him; and heaven is but communion with God.

—Goodwin, 1600-1679.

(2831.) Heaven is not like Noah's ark, where the clean beasts and the unclean entered; no unclean beast comes into the heavenly ark: though God suffer the wicked to live a while on the earth, He will never suffer heaven to be pestered with such vermin.

—Watson, 1696.

(2832.) Holiness leads to heaven: holiness is the King of heaven's highway. "An highway shall be there, and it shall be called The way of holiness." At Rome there was the temple of virtue and honour, and they were to go through the temple of virtue to the temple of honour: so we must go through the temple of holiness to the temple of heaven. Glory begins in virtue. "Who hath called us to glory and virtue." Happiness is nothing else but the quintessence of holiness; holiness is glory militant, and happiness holiness triumphant.

—Watson, 1696.

5. Is true happiness.

(2833.) Thou hast an art above God Himself, if thou canst fetch any true pleasure out of unholiness. It is not the lowest of blasphemies for thee to charge the way of holiness to be an enemy to true pleasure; for in that thou chargest God Himself to want true pleasure, who has no pleasure, if holiness will not yield it. "Thou shalt make them drink of the river of Thy pleasures." Mark that phrase, "The river of Thy pleasures." God hath His pleasures, and God gives His saints drink of His pleasures. This is the sweet accent of the saints' pleasures. When a prince bids his servants carry such a man down into the cellar, and let him drink of their beer or wine, this is a kindness from so great a personage to be valued highly. But for the prince to set him at his own table, and let him drink of his own wine, this, I hope, is far more. When God gives a man estate, corn, and wine, and oil, the comforts of the creature, He entertains the man but in the common cellar; such as have none but carnal enjoyments, they do but sit with the servants, and in some sensual pleasures; they are but fellow-commoners with the beasts. But when He bestows His grace, beautifies a soul with holiness, now He prefers the creature the highest it is capable of; He never sends this rich clothing to any, but he means to set such by Him, at His own table with Him, in heaven's glory.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2834.) Sensual good is but a nominal good, if it reach not higher. All that you hunt after so eagerly in the world, is nothing but real vanity and vexation, a shadow of good, a picture of profit, a dream of delight, which one frown of God will turn into astonishing horror and despair: like a tender flower that is nipped with one frosty night, or withered with one scorching day; but it is only this one thing that is the solid, substantial, and enduring good. The pleasure of the flesh is a good that is common to men with brutes; they can eat, and drink, and play, and satisfy their lusts, and master one another as well as you. But it is the spiritual good that is proper to a reasonable creature. The pleasure of the flesh may melt you into foolish mirth, and make you like drunken men, that are gallant fellows in their own eyes, while sober men are ashamed of them, or pity them, or they become a laughingstock to others. But it is this one thing only which is that good which wisdom itself will justify. A man that is tickled may laugh more than he that is possessed of a kingdom, or hath the desires of his heart; but he is not therefore to be accounted the happier man, nor will any wise man so account him.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2835.) Will you say that godliness is unpleasant, because it makes a man sorry for his ungodliness? If a man that hath killed his dearest friend, or his own father, be grieved for the fact when he cometh to repentance, will you blame his repentance or his murder for his grief? Will you say, What a hurtful thing is this repentance; or rather, What an odious crime was it that must be so repented of? Would you wish a man that hath lived so long in sin and misery, to have no sorrow for it in his return—especially when it is but a healing sorrow, preparing for remission, and not a sorrow joined with despair, as theirs will be that die impenitently? Observe the complaints of penitent souls, whether it be their present godliness, or their former ungodliness, which they lament! Will you hear a man lament his former sinful, careless life, and yet will you lay the blame on the contrary course of duty which now he hath undertaken?—You may as wisely accuse a man for landing in a safe harbour, because he there lamenteth his loss by shipwreck while he was at sea. Or as wisely may you blame a man for rising that complaineth how he hurt himself by his fall.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

6. How a knowledge of its blessedness is to be attained.

(2836.) If you see the motion of dancers afar off, and hear not the music, you will think they are frantic. But when you come near and hear the music, and observe their harmonical, orderly motion, you will take delight in it, and desire to join with them. So men that judge at a distance of the truth and holy ways of God, by the slanderous reports of malignant men, will think of the godly, as Festus of Paul, that they are beside themselves; but if they come among them, and search more impartially into the reasons of their course, and specially if they join with them in the inward and vital actions of religion, they will then be quickly of another mind, and not go back for all the pleasures or profits of the world.

—Peter Martyr.

(2837.) Come near and search into the inwards of a holy life, and try it a little while yourselves, if you would taste the pleasure of it; and do not stand looking on it at a distance, where you see nothing but the outside; nor judge by bare hearsay, which giveth you no taste or relish of it. The sweetness of honey, or wine, or meat, is not known by looking on it, but by tasting it. Come near and try what it is to live in the love of God, and in the belief and hope of life eternal, and in universal obedience to the laws of Christ, and then tell us how these things do relish with you. You will never know the sweetness of them effectually as long as you are but lookers on.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2838.) In the works of nature (and sometimes of art) the outside is so far from showing you the excellencies, that it is but a comely veil to hide them. Though you would have a handsome cover for your watch, yet doth it but hide the well-ordered frame and useful motions that are within. You must open it, and there observe the parts and motions if you would pass a right judgment of the work. You would have a comely cover for your books; but it is but to hide the well-composed letters from your sight, in which the sense, and use, and excellency doth consist. You must open it, if you will read it, and know the worth of it. A common spectator when he seeth a rose or other flower or fruit-tree, thinketh he hath seen all, or the chiefest part. But it is the secret unsearchable motions and operations of the vegetative life and juice within, by which the beauteous flowers and sweet fruits are produced, and wonderfully differentiated from each other that are the excellent part and mysteries in these natural works of God. Could you but see these secret inward causes and operations, it would incomparably more content you. He that passeth by and looketh on a beehive, and seeth but the cover, and the laborious creatures going in and out, doth see nothing of the admirable operations within which God hath taught them. Did you there see how they make their wax and honey, and compose their combs, and by what laws, and in what order their commonwealth is governed, and their work carried on, you would know more than the outside of the hive can show you. So it is about the life of godliness. If you saw the inward motions of the quickening Spirit upon the soul, and the order and exercise of every grace, and by what laws the thoughts and affections are governed, and to whom they tend, you would then see more of the beauty of religion than you can see by the outward behaviour of our assemblies.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2839.) The shell is not sweet, but serves to hide the sweeter part from those that will not storm those walls, that they may possess it as their prize. The kernel of religion is covered with a shell so hard that flesh and blood cannot break it. Hard sayings, and hard providences to the Church, and to particular believers, are such as many cannot break through, and therefore never taste the sweetness.

The most admired feature and beauty of any of your bodies (which fools think to be the most excellent part of the body) is indeed but the handsome, well-adorned case that God by nature doth cover His more excellent inward works with. Were you but able to see within the skin, and but once to observe the wonderful motions, heart, and brain, and the course of the blood in the veins and arteries, and the several fermentations, and the causes and nature of chylications and sanguifications and the spirits, and senses, and all their works; and if you saw the reason of every part and vessel in this wondrous frame, and the causes and nature of every disease; much more if you saw the excellent nature and operations of that rational soul, that is the glory of all, you would then say that you had seen a more excellent sight than the smooth and beautiful skin that covers it. The invisible soul is of greater excellency than all the visible beauties in the world.

So also, if you would know the excellencies of religion, you must not stand without the doors, or judge of it by the skin and shell, but you must come near, and look into the inward reasons of it, and think of the difference between the high employments of a saint, and the poor and sordid drudgery of the ungodly; between walking with God in desire and love and in the spiritual use of His ordinances and creatures, and conversing only with sinful men and transitory vanities; between the life of faith and hope, which is daily maintained by the foresight of everlasting glory, and a life of mere nature, and worldliness, and sensuality, and idle compliment and pomp, which are but the progenitors of sorrow and end in endless desperation. Come near, and try the power of God's laws, and of the workings of His Spirit; and think in good sadness of the place where you must live for ever, and the glory you shall see, and the sweet enjoyment and employment you shall have in the presence of the eternal Majesty; and think well of all the sweet contrivances and discoveries of His love in Christ, and how freely they are offered to you; and how certainly they may be your own; peruse the promises, and sweet expressions of love and grace; and exercise your souls in serious meditation, prayer, thanksgiving, and praise; and withal remember, that none but these will be durable delights; and tell me whether a life of sport, and pride, and worldliness, and flesh-pleasing, or a life of faith and holiness, be the better, the sweeter, and more pleasant life.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

7. Its source.

(2840.) The godly are "partakers of the Divine nature." It is not the essence of God that is here called the Divine nature that we partake of; we abhor the thoughts of such blasphemous arrogance, as if that grace did make men gods. But it is called the Divine nature, in that it is caused by the Spirit of God, and floweth from Him as the light or sunshine floweth from the sun. You use to say the sun is in the house, when it shineth in the house, though the sun itself be in the firmament. So the Scripture saith that God dwelleth in us, and Christ and the Spirit dwelleth in us, when the heavenly light, and love, and life which streameth from Him dwelleth in us; and this is called the Divine nature.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2841.) It is the sun that gives light to the flower and paints it with all its bright and varied hue. The chemical processes which its rays set in motion form the leaves and blossoms, and so arrange the surfaces that they reflect various hues from light shining on them; and so it is with the believer. It is the same Sun of righteousness which raised him from the dead and animated him with the power of a divine life, which clothes him with the beauties of holiness. All evil is from ourselves, and all good is from God.

—Macmillan.

8. Its production God's aim in all His providences.

(2842.) As God makes use of all the seasons of the year for the harvest, the frost of winter as well as the heat of summer; so doth He of fair and foul, pleasing and unpleasing providences, for promoting holiness. Winter-providences kill the weeds of lusts, and summer-providences ripen and mellow the fruits of righteousness. When He afflicts, 'tis for our profit, to make us partakers of His holiness. Afflictions Bernard compares to the tezel, which, though it be sharp and scratching, is to make the cloth more pure and fine. God would not rub so hard if it were not to fetch out the dirt that is ingrained in our natures. God loves purity so well He had rather see a hole than a spot in His child's garments. When He deals more gently in His providences, and lets His people sit under the sunny bank of comforts and enjoyments, fencing them from the cold blasts of affliction, 'tis to draw forth the sap of grace, and hasten their growth in holiness.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2843.) God's holiness makes it certain that He regards our holiness as the very crown of our nature, apart from which the idea which He desires to have illustrated in every man is unfulfilled. Being holy Himself, it must be, and it is, His great concern that we should attain to moral and spiritual perfection.

There are some parents who care too much for the mere physical health and strength of their children; their supreme anxiety, in fact, is that their children should be healthy, beautiful animals, —everything is subordinated to that. There are others who are intellectually ambitious in relation to their children, and whose chief joy is to recognise what seems to them faint traces and prophecies of genius, and everything in their case is subordinated to the intellectual culture of their children. Those of a nobler temper care most that their children should have courage, which lies near the root of all virtue, and temperance and truthfulness and generosity, and a nice sense of honour. They feel that every inferior aim should be sacrificed to this. And, from what we know of the Divine holiness, I repeat that we are certain that God's great concern for all of us is that we should be holy even as He is holy.

—Becher.

9. Its production the end and object of all religious observances.

Now this illustrates a law which prevails throughout nature. Everywhere there is a vast accumulation of forces at work, to bring about apparently very slight results. Who shall recount the various powers which have been at work in nature's mysterious recesses to produce a single drop of dew? Who shall describe the countless laws which have been set in motion for the birth of a wayside flower? Who shall tell the infinite varieties of process which are at work in the laboratory of the universe to bring down for us one ray of the sunshine which warms us, one breath of the air without which we could not for an instant exist?

How does this principle apply in religious matters? We have, so to speak, a vast mass of Christianising machinery at work throughout the world. Now, is all this church-building and church-going an end in itself, or only the means to an end? I fear there are some who imagine that church-going is in itself the aim and end of all religion. No mistake can be more deplorable or pernicious. It is a blunder as egregious as it would be for the visitor to the manufactory such as I have described, to suppose that the machinery was all set in motion merely to be gazed at, and to keep employed the people who are engaged in tending it. The manufacturer, who lays out his capital in such costly apparatus, would find but an unsatisfactory return at the end of the year if there had not been a given quantity of finished goods for profitable sale in the market. So it is with church-going. It is wretched work if the worship of the house of God begins and ends with the prayers uttered there. If I were asked, What is the end and object of all religious observance?— what, to carry out the metaphor, is the finished product intended as the result of all the machinery of religious worship whether public or private?—I should reply, Holiness of life. It is just in so far as religion produces holiness of life that it is religion. When it fails to do this, it is not real religion at all; it is a spurious, counterfeit religion, a delusion, a mockery, a snare of the devil.

—Hooper.

10. Should be continually striven after.

(1.) Notwithstanding that it may expose us to hatred and suffering.

(2845.) Nothing more easy and common than for the most ungodly to say they are all for a godly life; and God forbid that any should be against it; when yet they hate and reject it indeed, when it comes to the practice of those particular duties in which it doth consist. It is not godliness that they hate and reproach, but it is fervent prayer, holy conference, meditation, self-denial, mortification of the desires of the flesh, heavenly-mindedness, &c. In general they will say that God's law must be obeyed, and His will preferred before their own. But when it comes to the particulars, they love Him not above all, they take His name in vain, they keep not holy His day, they disobey superiors that would reform them, they are envious, malicious, covetous, lustful, and break all the commandments in particular, which in general they profess to keep. As if your servant should promise to do your work; and when you set him to it, one thing is too hard, and another he is not used to, and so he hath his exceptions against the greatest part which he undertook. As if one should wound one of you in the head, and stab you to the heart, and cut off an arm or a leg, and say, "I wish the man no harm; it is not the man that I hate or hurt, but only the head, the heart, the arm," &c. Even so it is not holiness that these men hate and speak against; but it is so much praying, and meditating, and reading the Scriptures, and making such a stir about religion when less ado may serve the turn.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2846.) I must profess that since I observed the course of the world, and the concord of the world and providences of God, I took it for a notable proof of man's fall, and of the verity of the Scripture, and the supernatural origin of true sanctification, to find such a universal enmity between the holy and the serpent seed, and to find Cain and Abel's case so ordinarily exemplified, and him that is born after the flesh to persecute him that is born after the Spirit. And methinks to this day it is a great and visible help for the confirmation of our Christian faith.

But that which is much remarkable in it is, that nothing else in the world, except the crossing of men's carnal interest, doth meet with any such universal enmity. A man may be as learned as he can, and no man hate him for it. If he excel all others, all men will praise him and proclaim his excellency; he may be an excellent linguist, an excellent philosopher, an excellent physician, an excellent logician, an excellent orator, and all commend him. Among musicians, architects, soldiers, seamen, and all arts and sciences, men value, prefer, and praise the best; yea, even speculative theology, such wits as the schoolmen and those that are called great divines are honoured by all, and meet, as such, but with little enmity, persecution, or obloquy in the world. Though I know that even a Galileus, a Campanella, and many such have suffered by the Roman Inquisitors, that was not so much in enmity to their speculations or opinions, as through a fear lest new philosophical notions should unsettle men's minds and open the way to new opinions in theology, and so prove injurious to the kingdom and interest of Rome. I know also that Demosthenes, Cicero, Seneca, Lucan, and many other learned men, have died by the hands or power of tyrants. But this was not for their learning, but for their opposition to those tyrants' wills and interests. And I know that some religious men have suffered for their sins and follies, and some for their meddling too much with secular affairs, as the counsellors of princes, as Functius, Justus Jonas, and many others. But yet no parts, no excellency, no skill or learning is hated commonly, but honoured in the world; no, not theological learning, save only this practical godliness and religion, and the principles of it, which only rendereth men amiable to God, through Christ, and saveth men's souls.

(2.) In spite of misrepresentation.

(2847.) When a sinner is convinced of the necessity of holiness in a time and place where it is rare, and ungodliness is the common road, the necessary singularity of such a one in giving up himself to the will of God, is commonly charged on him as his pride; as if he were proud that cannot be contented to be damned in hell for company with the most; or to despise salvation if most despise it, and to forsake his God when most forsake Him, and to serve the devil when most men serve him. If you will not swear, and be drunk, and game, and spend your time, even the Lord's day, in vanity and sensuality, as if you were afraid of being saved, and as if it were your business to work out your damnation, the world will call you proud and singular, and "think it strange that you run not with them to excess of riot, speaking evil of you." You shall quickly hear them say, "What I will you be wiser than all the town? What a saint! What a holy precisian is this!" When Lot was grieved for the filthiness of Sodom, they scorned him as a proud controller. "This one fellow came in to sojourn, and he will needs be a judge."

(3.) Notwithstanding that perfection is unattainable in this life.

(2848.) It is a weak pretence that, because the consummate measure of sanctification can only be attained in the next life, therefore we should not endeavour after it here. For by sincere and constant endeavours we make nearer approaches to it, and according to the degrees of our progress such are those of our joy. As nature has prescribed to all heavy bodies their going to the centre, and although none comes to it, and many are at a great distance from it, yet the ordination of nature is not in vain; because, by virtue of it, every heavy body is always tending thither in motion or inclination: so although we cannot reach to complete holiness in this imperfect state, yet it is not in vain that the Gospel prescribes it, and infuses into Christians those dispositions whereby they are gradually carried to the full accomplishment of it. Not to arrive at perfection is the weakness of the flesh, not to aspire after it is the fault of the spirit. —Bates, 1625–1699.

And what thought they of Noah, that walked with God in so great singularity, when the world was drowned in (and for) their wickedness? When David "humbled his soul with fasting" they turned it to "his reproach." Especially when any of the servants of Christ do press towards the highest degree of holiness, they shall be sure to be accounted proud and hypocrites. And yet they accuse not that child or servant of pride who excelleth all the rest in pleasing them and doing their work. Nor do they take a sick man to be proud, if he be more careful than others to recover his health. But he that will do most for heaven, and most carefully avoideth sin and hell, and is most serious in his religion, and most industrious to please his God, this man shall be accounted proud.

—Baxter, 1615–1691.

11. How it is to be attained.

(2849.) Often look on the perfect pattern which Christ in His holy example hath given thee for a holy life. Our hand will be as the copy is we write after; if we set low examples before us, it cannot be expected we should rise high ourselves; and indeed the holiest saint on earth is too low to be our pattern, because perfection in holiness must be aimed at by the weakest Christian (2 Cor. vii. 1), and that is not to be found in the best of saints in this lower world. If thou wilt walk holily, thou must not only endeavour to do what Christ commands, but as Christ Himself did; thou must labour to shape every letter in thy copy, action in life, in a holy imitation of Christ.

—Gurnall, 1617–1679.

(2850.) A painter, employed in the limning some excellent piece, has not only his pattern before his eyes, but his eye frequently upon the pattern, to possess his fancy to draw forth an exact resemblance. He that would express the image of God must imprint upon his mind the purity of His nature, cherish it in his thoughts, that the excellent beauty of it may pass from his understanding to his affections, and from his affections to his practice. How can we arise to a conformity to God in Christ, whose most holy nature we glance upon, and more rarely sink our souls into the depths of it by meditation? Be frequent in the meditation of the holiness of God.

—Charnock, 1628–1680.

(2851.) It is not by fits and starts that men become holy. It is not occasional, but continuous, prolonged, and lifelong efforts that are required; to be daily at it; always at it; resting but to renew the work; falling but to rise again. It is not by a few, rough, spasmodic blows of the hammer, that a graceful statue is brought out of the marble block, but by the labour of continuous days, and many delicate touches of the sculptor's chisel. It is not a sudden gush of water, the roaring torrent of a summer flood, but a continuous flow, that wears the rock; and a constant dropping that hollows out the stone. It is not with a rush and a spring that we are to reach Christ's character, attain to perfect saintship; but step by step, foot by foot, hand over hand, we are slowly and often painfully to mount the ladder that rests on earth and rises to heaven.

—Guthrie.

(2852.) A false notion of holiness springs up in many minds, and finds such a lodgment that it is very difficult to dispossess it. Holiness is supposed to be an achievement mastered at length—much as a lesson is mastered—by a variety of exercises, prayers, fastings, meditations, almsdeeds, self-discipline, sacraments; and when mastered, a sort of permanent acquisition, which goes on increasing as the stock of these spiritual exercises accumulates. It is not regarded in its true light as a momentary receiving out of Christ's fulness, grace for grace, as the result of His inworkings in a heart which finds the task of self-renewal hopeless, and makes itself over to Him, to be moulded by His plastic hands, resigning, of course, its will to Him in all things, without which resignation such a surrender would be a horrible hypocrisy.

Now let us take up the illustrations of this truth; and first His own illustration, the wisest, profoundest, and most beautiful of all. "As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye abide in Me;" "Apart from Me ye can do nothing." The circulating sap, which is the life of the tree, is indeed in the vine-branch so long as it holds of the stem; but in no sense whatever is it from the vine-branch. Cut off the branch from the stem, and it ceases instantaneously to live, for it has no independent life. Even so the fruits of the Spirit, while of course our hearts are the sphere of their manifestation, are in no sense from our hearts; they are not the result of the enlivening of our own will; they are not a righteousness of our own, built up by a series of endeavours, or a laborious process of self-discipline, but a righteousness outflowing continually from the fulness of grace which is in Christ.

Another illustration may perhaps help to impress the truth. When we walk abroad on a beautiful day, and survey a landscape lit up by the beams of a summer sun, our eye catches a variety of colours lying on the surface of this landscape. There is the yellow of the golden grain, the green of the pasture-land, the dark brown of those thick planted copses, the silver gleam of the stream which winds through them, the faint blue of the distant hills seen in perspective, the more intense blue of the sky, the purple tinge of yonder sheet of water; but none of these colours reside in the landscape, they are not the properties of the material objects on which they rest. All colours are wrapt up in the sunlight, which, as is well known, may be seen resolved into its elementary colours in the prism or the rainbow. Apart from the sunlight no object has any colour; as is shown by the fact that, as soon as light is withdrawn from the landscape, the colours fade from the robe of nature. The difference of colour in different objects, while the sun is shining, is produced by some subtle difference of texture or superficies, which makes each object absorb certain rays, and reflect certain other rays, in different proportions. Now Christ is the Sun of Righteousness, in whom dwells all the fulness of the Godhead bodily—the fair colour of every grace and Christian virtue. When Christ is shining upon the heart, then these virtues are manifested there, by one Christian grace of one description, by another of another, according to their different receptivity and natural temperament; just as, when the sun is shining, colours are thrown upon a landscape, and reflected by the different objects in different proportions. But as no part of the landscape has any colour in the absence of the sun, so Christians have no grace except from Christ, nor hold any virtue independently of Him.

Let it be clearly understood, then, that the great secret of bringing forth much fruit, or, in other words, of all advance in grace and holiness, is, according to the profound teaching of our Lord Himself, a constant keeping open (and if possible, enlarging) the avenues of the soul towards Him. If a vine-branch is to sprout and throw out new suckers and shoots, the tube by which it communicates with the stock of the tree must adhere tightly to the stem, and be well open for the passage of the sap. If you desire to see the colours of furniture in this room, whose shutters are closed, throw open the shutters, and admit the full flood of sunlight. And if you desire to see the dead heart put forth the energies of spiritual life, and the dark heart illumined by the fair colours of spiritual grace, throw wide open the passage of communication between Christ and it, and allow the Life which is in Him, and the Light which is in Him, to circulate freely through it.

—Goulburn.

(2853.) What if the poor bird imprisoned in the cage should be thinking that, if it is ever to gain its liberty, it must be by its own exertions, and by vigorous and frequent strokes of its wings against the bars? If it did so, it would ere long fall back breathless and exhausted, faint and sore, and despairing. And the soul will have a similar experience which thinks that Christ has indeed won pardon and acceptance for her (but that sanctification she must win for herself), and under this delusion beats herself sore in vain efforts to correct the propensities of a heart which the Word of God pronounces to be "desperately" wicked. That heart,—you can make nothing of it yourself; leave it to Christ, in quiet dependence upon His grace. Suffer Him to open the prison doors for you, and then you shall fly out and hide yourself in your Lord's bosom, and there find rest. Yield up the soul to Him, and place it in His hands, and you shall at once begin to have the delightful experience of His power in sanctifying.

"Yield up the soul," we say; and in saying so, we of course imply (though it needs to be expressed, as well as implied) that you yield up your will without reserve. There is no such thing as yielding up the soul without yielding up the will; for the will is the chief power of the soul. Christ Himself cannot sanctify a moral agent whose will holds persistently to his corruption. Even a man cannot liberate a bird from its cage which likes to stay there, refuses to move when the door is opened, and flies back when it is taken out. God has given us a free will, the exercise of which cannot indeed change our hearts, or renew our moral nature, but which can say "Nay" to the world, to the flesh, and the devil; which shows that it can say "Nay" by saying it sometimes when worldly interests are concerned. And this "Nay" it must say if the soul is to be sanctified and bring forth fruits.

—Goulburn.

may be called littles, though in truth each of those littles is of vast importance. Little duties prayerfully discharged ; little temptations earnestly resisted in the strength which God supplies out of the fulness which He has made to dwell in Jesus Christ for His people ; little sins avoided, or crucified ;—these all together help to form that holy character which, in the hour of need, will be, under God, such a sure defence to the Christian. —Aubrey C. Price.

(2855.) The mere doing of God's will cannot produce positive goodness in a man, just because a man must be good before he can do that will. But it naturally tends to produce in that man a love to goodness and a dislike of its opposite. Suppose a man to become the servant of God, as a consequence of this he does the will of God from a sense of duty. But at first virtue thus performed may be found irksome ; there may be no affection in the heart for the thing performed ; no strong or ready recoil from its opposite. What is done is done from a sense of duty and obligation, from an honourable motive, it is true, but yet without that full and overflowing sense of delight which would result from a real and deep-rooted love for the thing itself. To produce this result, then, is manifestly desirable, for without it, the moral excellence of the man is not complete. But how is it to be produced ? The language of Paul suggests the reply : It is by continuing to serve God. If we go on doing our duty, by and by what was first done merely from a sense of obligation will come to be done in love to the thing itself. The real loveliness and value of God's law will unfold itself to us ; the doing of our hand will come to be the delight of our heart ; that which was at first a way of performance merely will come to be a way of pleasantness ; and so it will be found that the grand result of serving of God is "towards holiness." There are many analogies by which this process of our regenerated nature might be illustrated. Take, for instance, the case of a child learning to read. At first his efforts are simple acts of obedience. He sees no excellence in his daily tasks. He performs them simply because his master bids him. But as he advances, learning takes hold of his mind. There is a fitness in it to interest and engross him. He sees how good it is to have knowledge, and he feels how pleasant it is to hold intercourse with other minds by books. He comes to feel as if he could not live without this exercise. It has grown to be part and parcel of his being, his chosen occupation, and his highest treat. And thus what he at first did simply because his master bade him do it, has, by the mere act of doing it, grown to be a treasured delight to him. Of that child's service to his teacher we may surely say that the fruit of it has been towards a love of letters.

Just so is it with the case before us. We begin God's service because He calls us to it, we end by loving the service for its own sake. And this is an advanced stage of the divine life. It implies a greater likeness to God who doth that which is good, not from any outward obligation, but from the free and unalterable propensity of His eternal nature towards that which is good. We thus cease to be servants, and grow into the life and liberty of sons. Our obedience to God has brought us in happy advance towards His presence. We have been doing the will of the Father, and the consequence is, that our own will has become identified with His. Inclination and duty now go hand in hand. The sense of bondage has disappeared, and a sweet sense of free choice has come in its place. We have learned what it is to be holy as God is holy. By serving Him we have found our fruit unto holiness. —Alexander.

12. Must pervade the whole life, and cause us to hate all sin.

(2856.) God hath given us precepts of such a holiness and such a purity, such a meekness and such humility, as hath no pattern but Christ, no precedent but the purities of God : and, therefore, it is intended we should live with a life whose actions are not chequered with white and black, half sin and half virtue. God's sheep are not like Jacob's flock, "streaked and spotted ;" it is an entire holiness that God requires, and will not endure to have a holy course interrupted by the dishonour of a base and ignoble action. I do not mean that a man's life can be as pure as the sun, or the rays of celestial Jerusalem ; but like the moon, in which there are spots, but they are no deformity ; a lessening only and an abatement of light, no cloud to hinder and draw a veil before its face, but sometimes it is not so severe and bright as at other times. Every man hath his indiscretions and infirmities, his arrests and sudden incursions, his neighbourhoods and semblances of sin, his little violences to reason, and peevish melancholy, and humorous, fantastic discourses ; unaptness to a devout prayer, his fondness to judge favourably in his own cases, little deceptions, and voluntary and involuntary cozenages, ignorances and inadvertences, careless hours, and unwatchful seasons. But no good man ever commits one act of adultery ; no godly man will at any time be drunk ; or if he be, he ceases to be a godly man, and is run into the confines of death, and is sick at heart, and may die of the sickness—die eternally. —Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

(2857.) He that hath a tight shoe and a tender foot is sensible of the least stone or rubbish got in ; nor can he be at ease till he hath taken it out. The holy soul is troubled with the smallest error he commits ; and is so far from favouring any sin, that he will not pardon himself for stumbling against his will. —Adams, 1653.

(2858.) Let us then resemble the high priest, who, when he was anointed with that sacred unction, let the oil run down to the very hems and fringes of his garment, that even the smallest parts might shed the fragrant perfume of the sanctuary. —D'Alel.

(2859.) The Christian character should savour of holiness. The promise is, "I will be as the dew unto Israel ;" and how sweet is the fragrance of the flower after the falling of the dew ! so must the believer be under the soft distillments of the droppings of heaven on his heart.

(2860.) Holiness was meant, our New Testament tells us, for every day use. It is home-made and home-worn. Its exercise hardens the bone, and strengthens the muscle, in the body of character. Holiness is religion shining. It is the candle lighted, and not hid under a bushel, but lighting the house. It is religious principle put into motion. It is the love of God sent forth into circulation, on the feet, and with the hands, of love to man. It is faith gone to work. It is charity coined into actions, and devotion breathing benedictions on human suffering, while it goes up in intercessions to the Father of all piety.

—F. D. Huntington.

13. Is not at once confirmed in the soul.

(2861.) As the needle of a compass, when it is directed to its beloved star, at the first addresses waves on either side, and seems indifferent of its courtship of the rising or declining sun ; and when it seems first determined to the north, stands awhile trembling, as if it suffered inconvenience in the first fruition of its desires, and stands not still in full enjoyment till after first a great variety of motion, and then an undisturbed posture ; so is the piety and so is the conversion of a man wrought by degrees and several steps of imperfection : and at first our choices are wavering ; convinced by the grace of God, and yet not persuaded ; and then persuaded, but not resolved ; and then resolved, but deferring to begin ; and then beginning, but, as all beginnings are, in weakness and uncertainty ; and we fly out often into huge indiscretions, and look back to Sodom, and long to return to Egypt : and when the storm is quite over, we find little bubblings and unevennesses on the face of the waters. We often weaken our own purposes by the returns of sin ; and we do not call ourselves conquerors till, by a long possession of virtues, it is a strange and unusual, and, therefore, an uneasy and unpleasant thing to act a crime.

—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

14. Its progress is not always perceptible.

(2862.) The progress of holiness is sometimes like the lengthening of daylight, after the days are past the shortest. The difference is for some time imperceptible, but still is real ; and in due season becomes undeniably visible.

—Saller.

15. How it is to be maintained.

(2863.) The bloom of the hawthorn or White-May looks like snow in Richmond Park, but nearer London, or by the road side, its virgin whiteness is aedly stained. Too often contact with the world has just such an effect upon our piety ; we must away to the far-off garden of paradise to see holiness in its unsullied purity, and meanwhile we must be much alone with God if we would maintain a gracious life below.

—Spurgeon.

16. Is not to be trusted in.

(2864.) When thou trustest in Christ within thee, instead of Christ without thee, thou settest Christ against Christ. The bride does well to esteem her husband's picture, but it were ridiculous if she should love it better than himself, much more if she go to it rather than to him to supply her wants. Yet thou attest thus when thou art more fond of Christ's image in thy soul than of Him who painted it there. Will thy husband, the Lord Jesus, thank thee for honouring His creature to the dishonour of His person ?

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

17. Does not entitle us to heaven.

(2865.) From justification arises our title to heaven ; from sanctification arises our meetness for it. A king's son is heir-apparent to his father's crown. We will suppose the young prince to be educated with all the advantages, and to be possessor of all the attainments, that are necessary to constitute a complete monarch. His accomplishments, however great, do not entitle him to the kingdom ; they only qualify him for it ; so the holiness and obedience of the saints are no part of that right on which their claim to glory is founded, or for which it is given ; but a part of that spiritual education, whereby they are fitted and made meet to inherit "the kingdom prepared for them from the foundation of the world."

—Saller.

(2866.) As a dead man cannot inherit an estate, no more can a dead soul (and every soul is spiritually dead until quickened, and born again of the Holy Ghost) inherit the kingdom of God. Yet, sanctification and holiness of life do not constitute any part of our title to the heavenly inheritance, any more than mere animal life entitles a man of fortune to the estate he enjoys : he could not, indeed, enjoy his estate if he did not live ; but his claim to his estate arises from some other quarter. In like manner, it is not our holiness that entitles us to heaven ; though no man can enter into heaven without holiness.

—Saller.

HOLY SPIRIT. THE

I. THE THIRD PERSON IN THE BLESSED TRINITY.

(2867.) If a sober, wise, and honest man should come and tell you that in such a country, where he has been, there is one who is the governor of it, that doth well discharge his office,—that he hears causes, discerns right, distributes justice, relieves the poor, comforts them that are in distress ; supposing you gave him that credit which honesty, wisdom, and sobriety deserve, would you not believe that he intended a righteous, wise, diligent, intelligent person, discharging the office of a governor ? What else could any man living imagine ? But now suppose that another unknown person, or, so far as he is known, justly suspected of deceit and forgery, should come to you and tell you that all which the other informed you and acquainted you withal was indeed true, but that the words which he spake have quite another intention ; for it was not a man or any person that he intended, but it was the sun or the wind that he meant by all which he spake of him : for whereas the sun by his benign influence makes a country fruitful and temperate, suited to the relief and comfort of all that dwell therein, and disposes the minds of the inhabitants to mutual kindness and benignity, he described these things figuratively to you, under the notion of a righteous governor and his actions, although he never gave you the least intimation of any such intention :—must you not now believe that either the first person, whom you know to be a wise, sober, and honest man, was a notorious trifler, and designed your ruin, if you were to order any of your occasions according to his reports, or that your latter informer, whom you have just reason to suspect of falsehood and deceit in other things, has endeavoured to abuse both him and you, to render his veracity suspected, and to spoil all your designs grounded thereon ? One of these you must certainly conclude upon.

And it is no otherwise in this case. The Scripture informs us that the Holy Spirit rules in and over the Church of God, appointing overseers of it under Him ; that He discerns and judges all things ; that He comforts them that are faint, strengthens them that are weak, is grieved with them and provoked by them who sin; and that in all these, and in other things of like nature innumerable, He works, orders, and disposes all "according to the counsel of His own will." Hereupon it directs us so to order our conversation towards God that we do not grieve Him nor displease Him, telling us thereon what great things He will do for us; on which we lay the stress of our obedience and salvation. Can any man possibly, that gives credit to the testimony thus proposed in the Scripture, conceive any otherwise of this Spirit but as of a holy, wise, intelligent Person? Now, whilst we are under the power of these apprehensions, there come to us some men, Socinians or Quakers, whom we have just cause on many other accounts to suspect, at least of deceit and falsehood; and they confidently tell us that what the Scripture speaks concerning the Holy Spirit is indeed true, but that in and by all the expressions which it uses concerning Him, it intends no such person as it seems to do, but "an accident, a quality, an effect, or influence of the power of God," which figuratively does all things mentioned,—namely, that has a will figuratively, and understanding figuratively, discerns and judges figuratively, is sinned against figuratively, and so of all that is said of Him. Can any man that is not forsaken of all natural reason, as well as spiritual light, choose now but determine that either the Scripture is designed to draw him into errors and mistakes about the principal concernment of his soul, and so to ruin him eternally; or that these persons, who would impose such a sense upon it, are indeed corrupt seducers that seek to overthrow his faith and comforts? Such will they at last appear to be.

—Owen, 1616-1683.

II. HIS ASSISTANCE.

1. Its nature.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2869.) It is not the work of the Spirit to tell you the meaning of Scripture, and give you the knowledge of divinity, without your own study and labour, but to bless that study, and give you knowledge thereby. Did not Christ open the eyes of the man born blind as suddenly, as wonderfully, and by as little means as you can expect to be illuminated by the Spirit? And yet that man could not see any distant object out of his reach, till he took the pains to travel to it, or it was brought to him, for all his eyes were opened. When he was newly healed, he could not have told what was done in Samaria, nor seen what was in Jericho, nor what a town Tyre or Sidon was, unless he would be at the pains to travel thither. And if he would see Rome, he must be at so much more pains, as the place was more distant. Would you have been so silly as to say, "This man can presently see Samaria; Tyre, Rome, because Christ hath opened his eyes?" So is it here. If Christ have anointed your eyes with the eye-salve of the Spirit, and removed the inward impediments of your sight, yet it is not that you may presently know all truths which you never heard of, or read of, or studied to know. You must study, and study again; and the further off, and more difficult the truths are, the more must you study, and then expect to know by the blessing of the Spirit: let experience witness. Did you not hear all those truths which you know from the mouth of some teacher, or other person, or else consider and study of them yourselves, before you came to know them by the Spirit? Go not, then, out of God's way, if you expect His blessing.

Doth not experience commonly tell you, that men know more that study and have learning than those that do not? Are not the ministers and other learned men and godly people, that have studied the Scriptures long, the most knowing people in England? Nothing but mad ignorance or impudence can deny it. What man breathing knew as much the first hour he received the Spirit, as he doth after many years' study and diligent labour?

To reject study on pretence of the sufficiency of the Spirit, is to reject the Scripture itself; for as a man rejecteth his land that refuseth to till it, or rejecteth his meat if he refuse to eat it, though he praise it never so much; so doth he reject the Scripture that refuseth to study it, or to study that which must first be known, or is necessary thereto. Meditation digesteth the word, which else is cast up again.

—Baxter, 1615-1691

(2870.) The Word of God is called the sword of the Spirit. It is the instrument by which the Spirit worketh. He does not tell us anything that is out of the record; but all that is within it He sends home with clearness and effect upon the mind. He does not make us wise above that which is written, but He makes us wise up to that which is written. When a telescope is directed to some distant landscape, it enables us to see what we could not otherwise have seen; but it does not enable us to see anything which has not a real existence in the prospect before us. It does not present to the eye any delusive imagery—neither is that a fanciful and fictitious scene which it throws open to our contemplation. The natural eye saw nothing but blue land stretching along the distant horizon. By the aid of the glass there bursts upon it a charming variety of fields, and woods, and spires, and villages. Yet who would say that the glass added one feature to this assemblage? It discovers nothing to us which is not there; nor out of that portion of the book of nature, which we are employed in cultivating, does it bring into view a single character which is not really and previously inscribed upon it. And so of the Spirit. He does not add a single truth or a single character to the book of revelation. He enables the spiritual man to see what the natural man cannot see; but the spectacle which He lays open is uniform and immutable. It is the Word of God which is ever the same; and he whom the Spirit of God has enabled to look to the Bible with a clear and affecting discernment, sees no phantom passing before him; but, amidst all the visionary extravagance with which he is charged, can, for every one article of his faith, and every one duty of his practice, make his triumphant appeal to the law and to the testimony.

—Chalmers, 1780-1847.

2. Our need of it.

(1.) To deliver us from sin.

(2871.) To know the way to heaven, sometimes to cast a longing eye in that direction, and by fit and start to make a feeble effort heavenwards, can end in nothing. Man must get the Spirit of God. Thus only can we be freed of the shackles that bind the soul to earth, the flesh, and sin. I have seen a captive eagle, caged far from its distant home, as he sat mournfullike on his perch, turn his eye sometimes heavenwards; there he would sit in silence, like one wrapt in thought, gazing through the bars of his cage up into the blue sky; and, after a while, as if noble but sleeping instincts had suddenly awoke, he would start and spread out his broad sails, and leap upward, revealing an iron chain that, usually covered by his plumage, drew him back again to his place. But though this bird of heaven knew the way to soar aloft, and sometimes, under the influence of old instincts, decayed but not altogether dead, felt the thirst of freedom, freedom was not for him, till a power greater than his own proclaimed liberty to the captive, and shattered the shackles that bound him to his perch. Nor is there freedom for us till the Holy Spirit sets us free, and, by the lightning force of truth, breaks the chains that bind us to sin.

—Guthrie.

(2.) To guide and uphold us from day to day.

(2872.) The Holy Spirit of God is our guide. Who will displease his guide, a sweet comfortable guide, that leads us through the wilderness of this world? As the cloud before the Israelites by day, and the pillar of fire by night, so He conducts us to the heavenly Canaan. If we grieve our guide, we cause Him to leave us to ourselves. The Israelites would not go a step further than God by His angel went before them. It is in vain for us to make toward heaven without our blessed Guide.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(2873.) We need a monitor to stir up in us diligence, watchfulness, and earnest endeavours: "And thine ears shall hear a word behind thee, saying, This is the way, walk ye in it, when ye turn to the right hand, and when ye turn to the left." The cares and business of the world do often drive the sense of our duty out of our minds. One great end of God's Spirit is to put us in remembrance, to revive truths upon us in their season. A ship though never so well rigged, needs a pilot: we need a good guide to put us in mind of our duty.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(2874.) By "regeneration," we understand the commencement of the life of God in the soul of man; the beginning of that which had not an existence before: by "renewal" the invigoration of that which has been begun; the sustentation of a life already possessed. The impartation of life is one thing; its support another. Its "renewal" does not mean its reanimation after dying out, as the light of an extinguished lamp may be renewed—but that the life itself is supported and preserved; that there is the revival of exhausted energy, the supply of the waste and decay occasioned by the wear and tear of whatever expends or tries its powers. The subject may be illustrated by the analogy of natural life. When a child is born, we do not say that its life is renewed, but that its life has begun; its visible existence starts from its commencement. Having thus started, it then needs to be sustained and fed; the living being requires nourishment and invigoration in the form of food and rest. Even the strong man, worn and reduced by care and toil, by the battle and the burden of each day, is conscious of weakened and wasted energy, and needs the constant and regular renewal of his strength. All this is obviously analogous to the inward and spiritual life of man, it has its beginning. In "the washing of regeneration" the new life commences. Having begun, it needs to be supported and preserved. And not only so; but exposed to injury, liable to be weakened and depressed by the perils that menace and the labours that belong to it, it needs to be refreshed and recruited, strengthened and revived. That is effected by "the renewing of the Holy Ghost,"—the flowing into the soul, through "the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ," of the varied gifts of that Divine agent by whom the life itself was imparted at first.

—Biny.

(2875.) Consciously, distinctly, resolutely, habitually, we need to give ourselves, our business, our interests, our families, our affections, into the Spirit's hands, to lead and fashion us as He will. When we work with the current of that Divine will, all is vital, efficient, fruitful; for leaning back against the Omnipotent arm, this human frame attracts strength into all its sinews. But when we strive against that current, some secret flaw vitiates even what we call our successes; and how do we know but our proudest successes then are only failures in disguise? You have seen the rower's strength put vigorously against the tide; and, judging from his own narrow point on the water, the dash of his oars seemed to be dividing the waves, and sending him up the channel. But when the mist lifts, let him send his glance away to some stable landmark on the shore, and he finds the triumphant stream has all the time been drifting him backward and downward. So with the moral issue of our plans. By our conceited standards we seem to compass our ends; but transfer the scale of measurement to eternity, and behold! we have been losers of the soul while we gained the world, because the Spirit was not invited to befriend our toil! After the bolts are all driven, and the shrouds are all set, we must still wait for the breath of heaven to fill the sail. Nothing, literally nothing, in the final reckoning, without our Lord!

—F. D. Huntington.

(3.) To support us in affliction.

(2876.) If you thoroughly exhaust a vessel of the air it contains, the pressure of the air outside will break that vessel into perhaps millions of pieces, because there is not a sufficiency of air within to resist and counteract the weight of the atmosphere from without. A person who is exercised by severe affliction, and who does not experience the Divine comforts and supports in his soul, resembles the exhausted receiver above described; and it is no wonder if he yields, and is broken to shivers, under the weight of God's providential hand. But affliction to one who is sustained by the inward presence of the Holy Ghost, resembles the aerial pressure on the outer surface of an unexhausted vessel. There is that within which supports it, and preserves it from being destroyed by the incumbent pressure from without. —Toplady, 1740-1778.

(4.) In the study of God's Word.

(2877.) God is able to interpret His own Word unto thee. Indeed none can enter into the knowledge thereof but he must be beholden unto His Spirit to unlock the door. If thou hadst a riper head and higher parts than thou canst now pretend to, thou wouldst, without His help, be but like the blind Sodomites about Lot's house, groping but not able to find the way into the true saving knowledge thereof. He that hath not the right key is as far from entering the house as he that hath none, yea, in some sense further off; for he that hath none will call to him that is within, while the other, trusting to his false key, stands pottering without to little purpose. The Pharisees were no little conversant in the Scriptures, yet even these missed that truth which lay before them almost in every leaf of Moses and the Prophets, whom they were, in their everyday study, tumbling over: I mean that grand truth concerning Christ, of whom both Moses and the Prophets speak.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2878.) None so blind and ignorant whose eyes His Spirit cannot open. He who by His incubation upon the waters at the Creation hatched that rude mass into the beautiful form we now see, and out of that dark chaos made the glorious heavens, and garnished them with so many orient stars, can move upon thy dark soul, and enlighten it, though now it be as void of knowledge as the evening of the world's first day was of light. The schoolmaster sometimes sends home the child and bids his father put him to another trade, because not able, with all his art, to make a scholar of him; but if the Spirit of God be the Master, thou shalt learn, though a very dunce.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2879.) Scripture can be savingly understood only in and by the inward illumination of the Holy Ghost. The Gospel is a picture of God's free grace to sinners. Were we in a room hung with the finest paintings and adorned with the most exquisite statues, we could not see one of them, if all light were excluded. Now the blessed Spirit's irradiation is the same to the mind that outward light is to the bodily eyes.

—Toplady, 1740-1778.

(2880.) The Word of God will not avail to salvation without the Spirit of God. A compass is of no use to the mariner unless he has light to see it by.

—Toplady, 1740-1778.

(2881.) You may try to teach a child the meaning of the term "sweetness," but words will not avail: give him some honey and he will never forget. You might seek to tell him of the glorious mountains, and the Alps, that pierce the clouds and send their snowy peaks, like white-robed ambassadors, up to the courts of heaven: take him there; let him see them, and he will never forget them. You might seek to paint to him the grandeur of the American continent, with its hills and lakes and rivers, such as the world saw not before: let him go and view it, and he will know more of the land than he could know by all your teaching, when he sits at home. So the Holy Spirit does not only tell us of Christ's love; He sheds it abroad in the heart. He does not merely tell us of the sweetness of pardon; but He gives us a sense of no condemnation, and then we know all about it, better than we would have done by any teaching of words and thoughts. —Spurgeon.

(2882.) In order for me to find my way to heaven two things become necessary. I must have an inspired chart external to me, which is the Bible. I must have, secondly, an inspired heart, which is internal to me, in order to enable me to read profitably that book. Now of all charts, or, to use the more common phrase, of all books, the Bible is the plainest. Comments, commentaries, sermons, explanations, are most precious; but still the Bible itself, in all things that are vital, is so plain, that the humblest peasant can understand it, while in all things that are mysterious, it is so difficult that we shall spend heaven, and still not exhaust them. The Holy Spirit is needful, not to enable me to understand the Bible; for I can understand it by study just as well as Homer, or Shakespeare, or Milton, or any other writer; but so to understand it that, instead of being a mere outer truth it may exercise an influence within, overcoming the hostility of my heart, sanctifying its governing principles, and giving new life and energy within. Hence it is the Spirit that fills every symbol in it with celestial glory, that inspires every truth in the Bible with life, gives to its every promise sweet music, and communicates to the heart that studies its receptive power, and makes this book the guide unto life everlasting. The Romanist looks to the Pope to interpret the Bible; the Tractarian looks to the Church to interpret it; the Socinian looks to reason to interpret it; the Christian looks to the Holy Ghost to explain and interpret the Bible to him.

To show you the necessity of the Spirit, let us take the very simple illustration of a sundial. If you go to a sundial at midnight and study it with a brilliant lamp, you will be able to trace every figure, and to understand it as thoroughly as any human being ever understood it. But while the lamp or moonlight applied to the sundial will enable you to understand its structure most accurately, neither will enable you to reach its practical use. If you want to do that, you must go out when the sun has risen, or shines from its meridian, and then you will not only be able to see the structure of the dial, but to discover from it the hour of the day. So in reading this blessed book, you can by the lamplight of human reason, or by the moonlight of tradition, or by a light which is a mixture of the darkness of both—the pope—understand this book in its outward facts; but in its inner, its practical, and saving meaning, you must ask the Author of the book to explain it to you. Suppose that you have heard that a person has written a book, and on reading that book you find a passage in it which you can make nothing of; and you appeal to this divine or to that divine to ask them to explain its meaning, but in vain. Suppose you heard that the author of the book would be in the vestry at a certain hour ready to explain the passage, you would say, What is the use of going to others, when the author of the book is accessible and ready to explain his meaning? He will be the best able to make it plain.

The author of this book, the Bible, waits, wherever there is a heart that can pray, or lips that can move, to explain the meaning or the mystery of the passage that the reader himself cannot understand.

—Cumming.

(5.) In prayer.

(2883.) "None can say Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost." One may say the words without any special work of the Spirit in him, and so may a parrot; but to say Christ is Lord believingly, with thoughts and affections comporting with the greatness and sweetness thereof, requires the Spirit of God to be in his heart and tongue. Now it is not the bare naming Christ in prayer, and saying, For the Lord's sake, that procures our welcome with God, but saying it in faith; and none can do this without the Spirit. Christ is the door that opens into God's presence and lets the soul into His very bosom, faith is the key that unlocks the door; but the Spirit is He that makes this key, and helps the Christian to turn it in prayer, so as to get any access to God. You know in the law it was a sin not only to offer "strange incense," but also to bring "strange fire." By the incense, which was a composition of sweet spices, appointed by God to be burnt as a sweet perfume in His nostrils, was signified the merit and satisfaction of Christ, who being bruised by His Father's wrath, did offer Himself a sacrifice to God for a sweet-smelling savour. By the fire that was put to the incense (which also was appointed to be taken from the altar, and not any common hearth) was signified the Spirit of God, by which we are to offer up all our prayers and praises, even as Christ offered Himself up by the Eternal Spirit. To plead Christ's merits in prayer, and not by the Spirit, is to bring right incense but strange fire, and so our prayers are but smoke, offensive to His pure eyes, not incense, a sweet savour to His nostrils.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

—Toplady, 1740-1778.

(6.) In preaching.

—Spencer, 1658.

(2886.) The most correct and lively description of the sun cannot convey either the light, the warmth, the cheerfulness, or the fruitfulness, which the actual shining of that luminary conveys; neither can the most laboured and accurate dissertations on grace and spiritual things impart a true idea of them, without an experience of the Holy Spirit's work on the heart.

—Toplady, 1740-1778.

(2887.) The bellows one day heaved a long-drawn sigh.

"What's the matter, friend Bellows, that you seem so sad?" said the hearth.

"I have been toiling to no purpose," it answered in a dejected tone.

"Haven't succeeded to kindle the fire, is it?" asked the hearth.

"That's the cause," replied the bellows; "after all my blowing there is no flame! Occasionally it has flickered for a moment, but as suddenly relapsed into its former condition. In fact, the more I blow the darker it appears;—and oh! it is so painfully disheartening!"

"Perhaps," said the hearth considerably, "it requires something besides in order to quicken it;—simple blowing may else unsuccessfully labour in the effort to obtain a spark."

Gospel ordinances, which are so instrumental in quickening the affections of the spiritually minded, are unsuccessful if the heart is not enkindled by Divine grace. The Holy Spirit must apply the love of Christ to the soul, and then the fire will begin to burn, and the value of ordinances be felt in raising the affections into a flame, that we shall say as the disciples at Emmaus, "Did not our heart burn within us, while He talked with us by the way, and while He opened to us the Scriptures?"

—Bowden.

(2888.) Such is my belief in the reality, and existence, and agency of the Divine Spirit, that I think I should have no hope and no faith as a minister and as a labourer for the enfranchisement of mankind, if it were not that I believed there was an all-prevalent, vitalising Divine Spirit. I should as soon attempt to raise flowers if there were no atmosphere, or produce fruits if there were neither light nor heat, as I should attempt to regenerate men if I did not believe there was a Holy Ghost. I have faith in the Divine Spirit spread abroad over the whole human family, which is really the cause of life in the higher directions; and it is this faith that gives me hope and courage in all labour.

—Becher.

(7.) In the use of ordinances.

(2889.) Ordinances are but as the sails of a ship, ministers as the seamen that manage those sails: the anchor may be weighed, the sails spread, but when all this is done, there is no sailing till a gale come. We preach and pray, and you hear; but there is no motion Christ-ward until the Spirit of God blows upon them.

—Flavel, 1627-1691.

(2890.) In vain do the inhabitants of London go to their conduits for supply unless the man who has the master-key turns the water on. And in vain do we think to quench our thirst at ordinances, unless God communicate the living water of His Spirit.

—Toplady, 1740-1778.

(2891.) The atmosphere which encompasses our globe forty-five miles every way, is equally important to the life of animals and to the vegetation of plants. But it would quickly cease to answer these valuable ends were it not for the additional influence of the sun. Whereas, in subordination to that, and as a medium between that and us, it ministers every moment to our best temporal interests. Thus, the ordinances of the Gospel are to be numbered among those streams which gladden the Church of God when He makes them the vehicles of His own power and presence to the soul. Abstracted from the converting and cherishing operations of the Holy Ghost, the best means of grace would infallibly leave us (as a sunless atmosphere would leave the earth) no less cold and unanimated than they found us. Salter.

III. HIS INFLUENCE.

1. On whom it is exerted.

(2892.) As we press our seals, not on air or water, but on materials capable of receiving the characters, so the Holy Spirit of God is only given to really believing minds capable of receiving and preserving His seal. —Jean Claude.

2. How it is exerted.

(1.) Freely.

(2893.) The Spirit of God is a free agent, "Up-hold me," saith David, "with Thy free Spirit." He is not as a prisoner tied to the oar, that must needs work when we will have him; but as a prince, when He pleaseth, He comes forth and shows Himself to the soul, and when He pleaseth He retires and will not be seen. What freer than the wind? not the greatest king on earth can command it to rise for his pleasure; to this the Spirit of God is compared (John iii.). He is not only free to breathe where He lists, in this soul, and not in that, but when He pleaseth also. —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2.) Gently.

(2894.) The Holy Spirit leads us as a mother leads by the hand her child of two years old; as a person who can see leads one who is blind. —Vianney.

(3.) Silently.

(2895.) The operation of the Spirit doth very much imitate that of Nature; it is in a very still and silent way that the sap is drained in by the root, and ascends up the trunk of the tree, and diffuses itself to every branch, so that we may see that it lives, but we do not see how. The case is with souls that are brought to live in the Spirit, as with very infirm and languishing persons who have been consumed, and even next to death, in a corrupt air; being removed into such as is pure and wholesome they revive, but in a very insensible way; so is this life preserved by a vital, spiritual influence, which is a pure air to them, a gentle, indulgent, benign, and cherishing air; they live by it, and never a whit the worse, because it is not so turbulent as to make a noise. —Salter.

(2896.) We do not perceive the Agent who changes the character at work, but we conclude He has been working by the discovering effects produced. It is for this reason, among others, that He is compared to the wind, "Thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, nor whither it goeth; so is every one that is born of the Spirit." The silent nature of the Spirit's operations has sometimes made His agency to be denied altogether by those who are ever demanding some sensible evidence of the truth communicated in the Word. But those who urge this objection forget that many of the most powerful of the agents of Nature are themselves unseen, and are only to be discovered by their fruits. We do not, for instance, see the wind, whether it comes in the gentle breeze, to fan us, or in the hurricane, to work such devastation among the labours of man and the very works of God. The heat that nourishes the plants of the earth, and the electricity so intimately connected with all atmospherical and organic changes, move secretly and in silence. These individuals forget that God is always Himself unseen in the midst of His works. When we walk forth in the eventide to meditate, we are constrained to acknowledge that God is everywhere present among these works of grandeur; and yet, by intense gaze, we cannot discover His person, nor, by patient listening, hear the sound of His footsteps. No jarring sound of mechanism comes across the void that intervenes between us and these heavens—no voice of boasting reaches our ear, to tell of the Worker; it is the heavens themselves that declare His glory. And why should the God who created us not be able to renew the heart when it is debased by the effects of sin, and yet be as unseen in the one case as the other? And there is a manifest congruity in the circumstance that the Agent conducts His work so silently and imperceptibly. It is only by such a mode of procedure that the spirit of man can retain its separate action and freedom. There is no violence done to man's nature in the supernatural work carried on in the heart. The dealings of God are, in every respect, suited to the essential and indispensable principles of man's nature. "I drew them with the cords of a man, with the bands of love." —M'Cosh.

(4.) Yet its effects are perceptible.

(2898.) "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit." Now there are two truths which appear to be clearly taught in these words, viz., (1) That the new birth, like the wind, is perceptible in its effect; and, (2) That it is not invariably attached to any agency or instrumentality whatever. The wind itself is invisible, but none mistake the evidence of its motion. I may see the sails flapping against the mast of the ship that drifts powerless on the surface of a calm and glassy sea; and I may look again, and while I hear the breeze rustling in the trees, may see that same vessel dashing through the waves with its sails full, and its masts straining under the pressure of the gale, and I know, without inquiry, that the wind has risen; while, on the other hand, if I were to see the ship still lifeless, the sails still hanging loose, and the sea still glassy, it would be but lost labour to assure me that the gale had begun. And then, again, if any one was to inquire why the soft south wind is bringing up the gentle shower, or why the cold north-easter is cutting down so many tender plants by fell consumption, none can reply. Not all the philosophers in the world can devise a plan by which to regulate the motion of the breeze. It is one of those things, which though a matter of everyday life, God has kept in His sovereign hand. He has made us acquainted with no rule, and if there be a secret machinery, He has hidden it from our eye. The wind blows at His bidding, and He gives no account of any of His matters.

Now, our Blessed Lord teaches us in this text that it is just so with the new birth: "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit." If, therefore, there is no sound—if all be dead, all slumbering, and all regardless of the Master's law and the Master's will—if there be no fruit, no result, no love, no victory,—then we are not justified in asserting of that soul that it is born again. But if we are permitted to see the breeze spring up—if there is a kindling of a new life, a springing forward with a new power, a holy devotedness on new principles,—then we trust, whatever be the instrumentality, that it is the work of the Spirit, and that the soul is born again of God.

But again, according to the principle of the text, we cannot tie Him down to stated means.

—E. Hoare.

3. Should not be resisted.

(2899.) Take heed, therefore, sinners, how you use the Spirit when He comes, knocking at the door of your hearts. Open at His knock, and He will be your guest; you shall have His sweet company: repulse Him, and you have not a promise He will knock again. And if once He leave striving with thee, unhappy man, thou art lost for ever; thou liest like a ship cast up by the waves upon some high rock, where the tide never comes to fetch it off. Thou mayest come to the Word, converse with other ordinances, but in vain. 'Tis the Spirit of them which is both tide and wind, to set the soul afloat, and carry it on, or else it lies like a ship on dry ground which stirs not.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

IV. HIS INDWELLING IN THE SOUL.

1. Its manner.

(2900.) God is united to us, and we are united to Him, not by any form of matter, not by physical conjunction or contiguity, but by the intersphering of soul-life. It is that which knits us to Him. Our thoughts reach out and thread themselves to His thoughts, and thus bring us towards Him.

Hence, God's union with men is not a shadow, is not a figure, is not a dream: it is the statement of a fact as literal as any law in nature. The union of sunlight with vegetables is not more real. The flow of nourishing sap in fruits is not more literal than the interfusion and soul-union of God's soul with men's.

What a wonderful and glorious doctrine is this, that the soul of God touches the soul of man! As there is no babe cradled and rocked that has not its mother, in the ordinary course of life, to overhang it by night and by day, to kiss it as it sleeps, and to cover it with smiles and caresses when it wakes; so every creature that is born into life has a God whose ever-watchful soul broods tenderly over it by day and by night, and who interspheres it in His own life.

—Becker.

2. The safety of the soul.

(2901.) An house uninhabited soon comes to ruin; and a soul uninhabited by the Holy Spirit of God verges faster and faster to destruction.

—Topleady, 1740-1778.

3. Is a pledge and foretaste of heaven.

(2902.) God is especially present in the hearts of His people, by His Holy Spirit; and indeed the hearts of holy men are temples in the truth of things, and, in type and shadow, they are heaven itself. For God reigns in the hearts of His servants; there is His kingdom. The power of grace has subdued all His enemies; there is His power. They serve Him night and day, and give Him thanks and praise; that is His glory. This is the religion and worship of God in the temple. The temple itself is the heart of man; Christ is the high priest, who from thence sends up the incense of prayers, and joins them to His own intercession, and presents all together to His Father; and the Holy Ghost, by His dwelling there, has also consecrated it into a temple; and God dwells in our hearts by faith, and Christ by His Spirit, and the Spirit by His purities; so that we are also cabinets of the mysterious Trinity; and what is this sort of heaven itself, but as infancy is short of manhood, and letters of words? The same state of life it is, but not the same age. It is heaven in a looking-glass, dark, but yet true, representing the beauties of the soul, and the graces of God, and the images of His eternal glory by the reality of a special presence.

—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

(2903.) In the early times when land was sold, the owner cut a turf from the greensward and cast it into the cap of the purchaser as a token that it was his; or he tore off the branch of a tree and put it into the new owner's hand to show that he was entitled to all the products of the soil; and when the purchaser of a house received seizin or possession, the key of the door, or a bundle of thatch plucked from the roof, signified that the building was yielded up to him. The God of all grace has given to His people all the perfections of heaven to be their heritage for ever, and the earnest of His Spirit is to them the blessed token that all things are theirs. The Spirit's work of comfort and sanctification is a part of heaven's covenant blessings, a turf from the soil of Canaan, a twig from the tree of life, the key to mansions in the skies. Possessing the earnest of the Spirit we have received seizin of heaven.

—Spurgeon.

4. A matter of consciousness.

(2904.) It is not, of course contended, that we can have absolute and demonstrative certainty of the presence of the Holy Spirit, any more than of any other fact which depends on evidence, and consequently admits of doubt. We can have as much moral certainty as we need for practice: ground enough for hope to build and joy to flourish on. Who doubts that he is in health when the pulse beats truly, and the nerves are braced, and the spirits buoyant, and each organ with unfelt regularity elaborates its proper functions? Questioned it may be, demonstrated it cannot be; but we know it, and are thankful. And so there may be evidence of the indwelling of the Spirit within us, not demonstrative, indeed, but sufficient to make the believer walk warily, as one who has received a precious gift which he is bound to cherish, and to fill his bosom with peace and thankfulness and joy of the Holy Ghost.

—Jackson.

A. Its evidences.

(2905.) The only true test of the presence of the Holy Spirit is its sanctifying influence on our hearts and lives. It is evidenced only by its effects. So much indeed would appear to be conveyed to us even by the name by which the Almighty Comforter has been pleased to reveal Himself to us in the pages of His Word. The Spirit, πνευμα,—the imperceptible, yet vital breath, which is, and there is life and will and motion; which departs, and all is cold and senseless and still;—the impalpable and viewless, but powerful and beneficent wind; now rending the rocks and laying low the forests; now purifying the stagnant air or opening the blossoms of spring; now wafting the seeds each to its appointed place. And thus it was said by our blessed Lord Himself: "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh and whither it goeth; so is every one that is born of the Spirit." As the vital principle of our material frame,—which science may search for but cannot detect, and when it has dissected the members, and analysed the fluids, and untied the muscles and ganglions, and followed line by line the delicate tracery of the nerves, is forced to confess that it has had to do but with the instruments and mechanism of the mysterious power within,—may yet be recognised by a child's intellect, in the fire of the eye, the force of the arm, and the immediate certainty with which action follows on the determination of the will; so the presence of the Holy Spirit of God in the hearts of His people, though secret itself,—the presence of the Invisible—is discernible by its effects.
—Jackson.

V. THE WITNESS OF THE SPIRIT.

1. Variable, yet real.

(2906.) The witnessing of the Spirit admits of degrees; as the operations of the Spirit are at one time more powerful and manifest than at another, so may the soul's persuasion of its adoption by it be. At one time He acts so powerfully as that all fears and doubts are banished; at another time it may not be so clear, but much overclouded, and yet accompanied with some degrees of persuasion that Christ is theirs, even though faith be weak. A rich man's window may be wider than a poor man's, and so the sun may make his house the more light, that the things within it may be better discerned; but the poor man may really enjoy the beams of the sun, and see what is in his house; so the poorest, the weakest believer may know the Spirit hath shined into his heart, as well as others that enjoy brighter beams than he hath been acquainted with.
—Ersine, 1685-1752.

(2907.) Do not wonder if that evidence of which we speak vary and change in its clearness and force in your own hearts. "The flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh." Do not think it cannot be genuine because it is variable.

There is a sun in the heavens, but there are heavenly lights, too, that wax and wane; they are lights, they are in the heavens, though they change.
—Maclaren.

2. An evidence of the divine mission of Christ.

(2908.) Abundance of honest, holy souls, do live in the fervent love of God and in hatred of sin, and in sincere obedience, in justice and charity to all men, and in heavenly desires and delights, who yet cannot well dispute for their religion; nor yet do they need to fly to believe as the Church believeth, though they know not what or why, nor what the Church is. But they have that Spirit within them which is the living witness and advocate of Christ, and the seal of God, and the earnest of their salvation; not a mere pretence that the Spirit persuadeth them, and they know not by what evidence; nor yet that they count it most pious to believe strongest without evidence when they least know why. But they have the Spirit of renovation and adoption, turning the very bent of their hearts and lives from the world to God, and from earth to heaven, and from carnality to spirituality, and from sin to holiness. And this fully assureth them that Christ, who hath actually saved them, is their Saviour, and that He who maketh good all His undertaking is no deceiver, and that God would not sanctify His people in the world by a blasphemy, a deceit and lie, and that Christ who hath performed His promise in this, which is His earnest, will perform the rest. And withal the very love to God, and holiness, and heaven, which is thus made their new nature by the Spirit of Christ, will hold fast in the hour of temptation, when reasoning otherwise is too weak. Oh, what a blessed advantage have the sanctified against all temptations to unbelief! And how lamentably are ungodly sensualists disadvantaged, who have deprived themselves of this inherent testimony! If two men were born blind, and one of them had been cured, and had been shown the candlelight and twilight, how easy it is for him to believe his physician if he promise also to show him the sun, in comparison of what it is to the other who never saw the light!
—Baxter, 1615-1691.

HOPE.

I. DEPICTED.

(2909.) Hope is a virgin of a fair and clear countenance; her proper seat is upon earth, her proper object is in heaven; of a quick and piercing eye that can see the glory of God, the mercy of Christ, the society of saints and angels, the joys of paradise, through all the clouds and orbs; as Stephen saw heaven opened, and Jesus standing in the holy place. Her eye is so fixed on the blessedness above that nothing in the world can remove it. Faith is her attorney-general, prayer her solicitor, patience her physician, charity her almoner, thankfulness her treasurer, confidence her vice-admiral, the promise of God her anchor, peace her chair of state, and eternal glory her crown.
—Adams, 1653.

II. ITS INFLUENCE.

1. It is the spring and soul of enterprise.

(2910.) Hope of salvation puts the Christian upon high and noble exploits. It is a grace born for great actions. Faith and hope are the two poles on which all the Christian's noble enterprises turn. As carnal hope excites carnal men to their achievements which gain them any renown in the world; so is this heavenly hope influential into the saint's undertakings. What makes the merchant sell house and land, and ship his whole estate away to the other end almost of the world, and this amidst a thousand hazards from pirates, waves, and winds, but hope to get a greater by this bold adventure? What makes the daring soldier rush into the furious battle upon the very mouth of death itself, but hope to snatch honour and spoil out of its jaws? Hope is his helmet, shield, and all, which makes him laugh in the face of all danger. In a word, what makes the scholar beat his brains so hard, sometimes with the hazard of breaking them, by overstraining his parts with too eager and hot a pursuit of learning, but hope of commencing some degrees higher in the knowledge of those secrets in nature that are locked up from vulgar understandings? who when he hath attained his desire, is paid but little better for all his pains and study, that have worn nature in him to the stumps, than he is that tears the flesh off his hands and knees with creeping up some craggy mountain which proves but a barren, bleak place, to stand in, and wraps him up in the clouds from the sight of others, leaving him little more to please himself with but this, that he can look over other men's heads, and see a little further than they. Now if these peddling hopes can prevail with men to such fixed resolutions for the obtaining of these poor, sorry things, which borrow part of their goodness from men's fancy and imagination, how much more effectual must the Christian's hope of eternal life be to provoke him to the achievement of more noble exploits!

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2911.) Hope is the very spring that sets all the wheels agoing. Who would preach if it were not in hope to prevail with poor sinners for their conversion and confirmation? Who would pray, but for the hope to prevail with God? Who would believe, or obey, or strive, or suffer, or do anything for heaven, if it were not for the hope that he hath to obtain it? Would the mariner sail, and the merchant adventure, if they had not hope of safety and success? Would the husbandman plough, and sow, and take pains, if he had not hope of increase at harvest? Would the soldier fight, if he hoped not for victory? Surely no man doth adventure upon known impossibilities.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2912.) Once on a time, certain strong labourers were sent forth by the great King to level a primeval forest, to plough it, to sow it, and to bring to him the harvest. They were stout-hearted and strong, and willing enough for labour, and much they needed all their strength and more. One stalwart labourer was named Industry—consecrated work was his. His brother Patience, with thews of steel, went with him, and tired not in the longest days under the heaviest labours. To help them they had Zeal, clothed with ardent and indomitable energy. Side by side there stood his kinsman Self-denial, and his friend Importunity. These went forth to their labour, and they took with them, to cheer their toils, their well-beloved sister Hope; and well it was they did, for they needed the music of her consolation ere the work was done, for the forest trees were huge, and demanded many sturdy blows of the axe ere they would fall prone upon the ground. One by one the giant forest kings were overthrown, but the labour was immense and incessant. At night when they went to their rest, the day's work always seemed so light, for as they crossed the threshold, Patience, wiping the sweat from his brow, would be encouraged, and Self-denial would be strengthened by hearing the sweet voice of Hope within singing, "God will bless us, God, even our own God, will bless us." They felled the lofty trees to the music of that strain; they cleared the acres one by one, they tore from their sockets the huge roots, they delved the soil, they sowed the corn, and waited for the harvest, often much discouraged, but still held to their work as by silver chains and golden fetters by the sweet sound of the voice which chanted so constantly, "God, even our own God, will bless us." They never could refrain from service, for Hope never could refrain from song. They were ashamed to be discouraged, they were shocked to be despairing, for still the voice rang clearly out at noon and eventide, "God will bless us, God, even our own God, will bless us." You know the parable, you recognise the voice: may you hear it in your souls to-day!

—Spurgeon.

2. It relieves, sustains, and comforts in affliction.

(2913.) Hope is indeed the rattle which nature did provide to still the froward crying of the foad child, man.

Felltham, 1668.

(2914.) Hope is the handkerchief that God puts into His peoples' hands to wipe the tears from their eyes, which their present troubles, and long stay of expected mercies, draw from them.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2915.) Hope breaks the alabaster-box of the promise over the Christian's head, and so diffuseth the consolations thereof abroad the soul, which like a precious ointment, have a virtue as to exhilarate and refresh the spirit in its faintings, so to heal the wounds, and remove the smart, which the Christian's poor heart may feel from its affliction. "Hope maketh not ashamed, because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts."

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2916.) This hope of salvation supports the soul in the greatest afflictions. The Christian's patience is, as it were, his back, on which he bears his burdens; and some afflictions are so heavy that he needs a broad one to carry them well. But if hope lay not the pillow of the promise between his back and his burden, the least cross will prove unsupportable: therefore it is called "The patience of hope."

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2917.) What the sponge is to the cannon when hot with often shooting in, that is hope to the soul in multiplied afflictions; it cools the spirit, and meekens it, that it doth not fly to pieces, and break out into distemper'd thought or words against God.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2918.) Hope fills the afflicted soul with such inward joy and consolation, that it can laugh while tears are in the eye, sigh and sing all in a breath; it is called "the rejoicing of hope" (Heb. iii. 6).

And hope never affords more joy than in affliction ; it is on a watery cloud that the sun paints those curious colours in the rainbow. We "rejoice in the hope of glory, and not only so, but we glory in tribulation." —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2919.) A religious hope does not only bear up the mind under her sufferings, but makes her rejoice in them. —Addison, 1672-1719.

(2920.) Hope throws a generous contempt upon ill usage, and looks like a handsome defiance of a misfortune ; as who should say, You are somewhat troublesome now, but I shall conquer you. —Jeremy Collier, 1650-1726.

(2921.) Hope is necessary in every condition. The miseries of poverty, of sickness, or captivity, would, without this comfort, be insupportable ; nor does it appear that the happiest lot of terrestrial existence can set us above the want of this general blessing ; or that life, when the gifts of nature and of fortune are accumulated upon it, would not still be wretched, were it not elevated and delighted by the expectation of some new possession, of some enjoyment yet behind, by which the wish shall be at last satisfied, and the heart filled up to its utmost extent.

Hope is, indeed, very fallacious, and promises what it seldom gives ; but its promises are more valuable than the gifts of fortune, and it seldom frustrates us without assuring us of recompensing the delay by a greater bounty. —Dr. S. Johnson, 1709-1784.

2. It sustains in the conflicts and temptations of life.

(2922.) As the whole use of the anchor is to hold fast the ship in one sure and certain place, notwithstanding all tempests and waves beating against it, because it entereth into the very bottom of the sea, there taking fast hold : even so the principal use of hope is to enter into the heaven of heavens, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God, and to hold fast our souls there with Him, notwithstanding all the waves and tempests of Satan, sin, and condemnation do beat daily and continually against them. —Caudray, 1609.

(2923.) Like a valiant captain, in a losing battle, hope is ever encouraging man, and never leaves him till they both expire together. It is almost as the air by which the mind doth live. —Felltham, 1668.

4. It enables a man to be helpful to his fellow-men.

(2924.) The man who carries a lantern in a dark night can have friends all around him, walking safely by the help of its rays, and he not defrauded. So he who has the God-given light of hope in his breast can help on many others in this world's darkness, not to his own loss, but to their precious gain. —Becher.

5. We should therefore pray that it may be increased in us.

(2925.) There are many Christians who, all their life long, carry their hope as a boy carries a bird's nest containing an unfledged bird that can scarcely peep, much less sing—a poor, sledgeless hope. —Becher.

III. HOW AND WHY A CHRISTIAN HOPE IS TO BE ATTAINED.

(2926.) There are persons that cannot do otherwise than hope ; and after they have once resolved that they will live a Christian life, it never enters their head that they are going to do anything else, or that there can be but one result. They say, "If a man comes to me, I will not cast him out ; and when I go to Christ, He will not cast me out." They consider it a settled thing. It may be presumptuous sometimes ; but when persons are soundly converted, it is not. Then it is eminently Gospel-like. A man says to his creditor, "I owe you a debt, and I am utterly unable to pay it. You hold my note. It lies against my industry. I do not see how I am going to get along." "Well," says the creditor, "I will cancel that debt ;" and he takes the note, and dashes his pen across it, and hands it to the man. And you cannot persuade the man that he any longer owes the debt. He knows that it is cancelled, and that that is the end of it.

Now a man says, "I owed Christ a debt, and could not pay it ; but Christ has cancelled it, and it cannot stand against me any longer." Then he acts as if he really believed that it was cancelled. Is not that sensible ? Is not that Christian ? Another man says, "I should like to do just so, but I cannot. I do not know what is the reason. Sometimes, when I go to the prayer-meetings, and sing sweet Christian hymns, and hear the brethren pray, I get lifted into this joyful experience ; but, I do not know why, the next morning I feel worse than I did before." There are a great many persons who are of a vine-like nature, and who depend for their religious support on the influences that are exerted upon them by stronger Christians. And when they are left to themselves, they are like vines that, having fallen, are trailing on the ground.

Many persons do not know how to feed themselves spiritually. When food is presented to them by others, they see it, and are nourished by it ; but the moment others cease to present it to them, they cease to perceive it and to be benefited by it. They have not the power to minister it to themselves. They are unable without help to gain these views ; and, failing to have the views, they fail to have that experience of peace which is the result of them. —Becher.

IV. CAUTIONS CONCERNING ITS EXERCISE.

1. We should remember that many of the hopes we cherish are baseless and illusory.

(2927.) Our hopes, I see, resemble much the sun, That rising and declining casts large shadows ; But when his beams are dress'd in mid-day brightness, Yields none at all : when they are farthest from Success, their gilt reflection does display The largest show of events fair and prosperous. —Chapman.

2. We should not set our hopes on too distant objects.

(2928.) It is a precept several times inculcated by Horace, that we should not entertain a hope of anything in life which lies at a great distance from us. The shortness and uncertainty of our time here makes such a kind of hope unreasonable and absurd. The grave lies unseen between us and the object which we reach after. Where one man lives to enjoy the good he has in view, ten thousand are cut off in the pursuit of it.

—Addison, 1672-1719.

3. We should not permit our hopes to become extravagant or idle.

(2929.) If we hope for what we are not likely to possess, we act and think in vain, and make life a greater dream and shadow than it really is.

—Addison, 1672-1719.

(2930.) Used with due abstinence, hope acts as a healthful tonic; intemperately indulged, as an enervating opiate. The visions of future triumph which at first animate exertion, if dwelt upon too intensely, will usurp the place of the stern reality; and noble objects will be contemplated, not for their own inherent worth, but on account of the day-dreams they engender. Thus hope, aided by imagination, makes one man a hero, another a somnambulist, and a third a lunatic; while it renders them all enthusiasts. —Sir. J. Stephen.

4. We should test its reality.

(2931.) How many Christians there are who have a hope which lasts only until they need to use it! How many persons there are who are able to sustain sorrow until sorrow comes upon them! How many there are who trust in God until they have occasion to trust in Him!

Do you recollect the scene in Don Quixote in which the immortal knight put upon himself a helmet made of pasteboard? That helmet being smitten and pierced by a sword, he sewed it up again, and would not part with it, but in his insanity wore it, and felt that he had an all-sufficient helmet on his head. Are there not many Don Quixotes among men, who put on armour that looks very well till some sword or spear is thrust into it, but which then is found to be like the pasteboard helmet that went to pieces the moment it was touched? If we are to have a piety that shall sustain us in the flood and in the fire; if we are to have a faith that shall be an all-sufficient armour by day and by night, the year round, and from year to year, we must have one that is made up of something better than mere pasteboard instruction or a paper belief.

—Becher.

(2932.) It is quite in vain for any of us to have a hope in God which is valid only in the fair hour of prosperity and of health. When an anchor is thrown overboard, if it floats in the stream it is useless. No anchor is of any use whatsoever to a ship that cannot by its cable go down to take hold of the firm bottom, and that, taking hold of it, is not able to keep the ship. If when the storm beats, if when the whole concentrated fury of the storm beats on the ship, the anchor holds it, that is an anchor worth having. Woe to the mariner whose anchor breaks in the time of testing! If you have a hope that is good when you are young, when you are prosperous, and when you are happy, but does not hold you when you are sick, when you are cast out, when you are bereaved and discouraged, when life is taken away from you—if you have no hope that holds you then, you have got nothing at all. An anchor that not only deceives men with the appearance of safety, but that gives way in the hour of danger, is worse than none at all—a hope that holds a man when he does not need holding, but breaks when he does.

—Becher.

V. ITS DISAPPOINTMENTS.

(2933.) The setting of a great hope is like the setting of the sun. The brightness of our life is gone, shadows of the evening fall around us, and the world seems but a dim reflection itself,—a broader shadow. We look forward into the coming lonely night: the soul withdraws itself. Then stars arise, and the night is holy. —Longfellow.

(2934.) It is when our budding hopes are nipped beyond recovery by some rough wind, that we are the most disposed to picture to ourselves what flowers they might have borne if they had flourished.

—Dickens.

(2935.) Hope is the ruddy morning of joy, recollection is its golden tinge; but the latter is wont to sink amid the dews and dusky shades of twilight; and the bright blue day which the former promises, breaks indeed, but in another world, and with another sun.

—Richter.

VI. A HOPE THAT WILL NOT BE DISAPPOINTED.

(2936.) The supreme hope of seeing Christ is a hope that will never, never be disappointed. Many hopes we cherish that are disappointed; many purposes we form that have to be broken off. In fact, my brethren, human life is, after all, a pile of fragments or half-built towers; and there are few of us who have attained to anything like mature years whose hearts may not be compared to the graveyards, where lie entombed many earthly dreams, the objects of young ambition, as well as many plans and pursuits that we once followed eagerly, but are now ashamed of, or perhaps have abandoned to take up fresh courses altogether. But, my friends, the hope of the Bridegroom's coming is a hope that will never fail us, a hope that we never need relinquish, and of which we shall never despair. As our life-star, it shall lead us on, like the star which guided the wise men, and never disappear till it actually brings us to the vision of Christ.

—R. W. Forrest.

HUMILITY.

1. IN WHAT IT CONSISTS.

1. Not in under-rating ourselves.

(2937.) Humility doth no more require that a wise man think his knowledge equal with a fool's, or ignorant man's, than that a sound man take himself to be sick.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2938.) If a man does not take notice of that excellency and perfection that is in himself, how can he be thankful to God, who is the author of all excellency and perfection? Nay, if a man hath too mean an opinion of himself, it will render him unserviceable both to God and man.

—Selden, 1584-1654.

2. But in not over-valuing ourselves.

(2939.) Humility consists not in wearing mean clothes, and going softly and submissively, but in mean opinion of thyself.

—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

(2940.) By humility I mean not the abjectness of a base mind; but a prudent care not to over-value ourselves upon any account.

—Grew, 1607-1698.

(2941.) What do you esteem yourself before God? Doubtless nothing. It is no great humility in a fly to esteem itself nothing in comparison to a mountain; nor for a drop of water to hold itself nothing in comparison of the sea; nor for a spark of fire to hold itself nothing in respect of the sun. But humility consists in not esteeming ourselves above others, and in not desiring to be so esteemed by others.

—Francis de Sales.

II. ITS CHARACTERISTICS.

1. It is not self-conscious.

(2942.) In spiritual graces let us study to be great, and not to know it, as the fixed stars are every one bigger than the earth, yet appear to us less than torches.

—Adams, 1653.

(2943.) Those persons who do most good are least conscious of it. The man who has but a single virtue or charity is very much like the hen that has but one chicken. That solitary chicken calls forth an amount of clucking and scratching that a whole brood seldom causes.

—Becher.

2. It delights in privacy.

(2944.) Pride loves to climb up, not as Zaccheus to see Christ, but to be seen himself. "The fool" (Solomon tells us) "hath no delight in understanding, but that his heart may discover itself." Pride would be somebody, and therefore comes abroad to court the multitude, whereas humility delights in privacy; as the leaves do cover and shade the fruits, that some hand must gently lift them up before they can see the fruit: so should humility and a holy modesty conceal the perfections of the soul, till a hand of Providence by some call invites them out.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2945.) Hast-thou passed by the hedgerow at eventide, and has a delicious fragrantcy been all about thee, and thou knewest not whence it came? Hast thou searched and found the sweet violets hidden beneath its leaves, and known that it was that which gave its odours to the air around thee? Thus should the Christian make sweet the place of his abode with the perfume of his good deeds; and thus, in all humility, should he endeavour to remain unnoticed himself. When thou seest the hungry fed, and the naked clothed, the sick man visited, and the widow comforted—search, and thou shalt find the flower whence all this odour arose: thou shalt find full often that the Christian hath been there constrained by the love of Christ.

—Salter.

III. IS CONSTANTLY EXEMPLIFIED IN THE WISE AND GOOD.

(2946.) See how, in the fanning of this wheat, the fullest and greatest grains lie ever the lowest; and the lightest take up the highest place. It is no otherwise in morality: those which are most humble are fullest of grace; and oftentimes these have most conspicuity which have the least substance. To affect obscurity or submission is base and suspicious; but that man, whose modesty presents him mean to his own eyes and lowly to others, is commonly secretly rich in virtue. Give me rather a low fulness than an empty advancement.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(2947.) True goodness is proved like true balm; for as balm, when dropped into water, if it sinks and rests at the bottom is accounted the most excellent and precious; so, would you know whether a man be truly wise, learned, or generous, observe whether his qualifications tend to humility, modesty, and submission, for then they shall be good indeed; but if they swim on the surface, and strive to appear above water, they shall be so much the less true in the same proportion as they appear.

—De Sales.

(2948.) Samuel, the judge and high priest of Israel, one day visited the school of the prophets at Gibeah, which he had founded; and rejoiced at the progress which the pupils of the prophets had made in various kinds of knowledge, and the art of playing the lute, and in songs. Among them was a youth, named Adoniah, the son of Milcha, who found favour in the eyes of Samuel;—for his countenance was fair to look upon, and the sound of his voice was full of strength and sweetness. But his heart was filled with pride and empty delusion, because he was superior to others in knowledge and understanding. He fancied himself wiser than seven sages, and behaved haughtily towards his teachers, and his lips were full of empty words and of conceit. The judge of Israel had compassion on the boy Adoniah, for he loved him more than the rest, because he was full of wisdom and fair to look upon. Therefore Samuel said, "The Spirit of the Lord has chosen this boy to be a prophet in Israel; but he strives against Him, and will mar His work."

Then Samuel led forth the youth into the mountains, to a vineyard which lay towards Ramah. And behold, it was the time that the vine was in bloom.

Then Samuel lifted up his voice, and said, "Adoniah, what seest thou?" Adoniah answered, "I see a vineyard, and I inhale the sweet odour of blossoms." And Samuel said, "Approach and examine the flower of the vine."

The youth obeyed, and answered, "It is a tender little flower, simple and humble." Then Samuel answered, and said, "And yet it produces God's fruit, to gladden man's heart, and to strengthen his body and make it fair. Adoniah, thus is the pleasant vine in the time of its bloom, before it brings forth the delicious fruit. Remember the vine in the days of thy blooming youth!"

And Adoniah, the son of Milcha, kept all these words of Samuel in his heart, and henceforth he walked with humble and gentle spirit. Then all men loved Adoniah, and said, "The Spirit of God is come upon the youth."

And Adoniah increased in wisdom and beauty, and became a man like the herdsman of Tekoa, and Isaiah the son of Amoz, and his name was praised in Israel.

—F. A. Krummacher.

(2949.) The highest piety being ever associated with the deepest humility, true religion is like that sweetest of all singing birds, the skylark, which, with the lowest nest but highest wing, dwells on the ground, and yet soars to the skies. —Guthrie.

IV. ITS IMPORTANCE.

1. It is the foundation of Christian character.

(2950.) As a building is so much the stronger as the groundwork of the same is laid deeper: even so the groundwork of Christian philosophy is unfeigned humility, and the deeper the same is settled in our hearts, the surer and more permanent will the building of our religion be. —Cowdrey, 1609.

2951.) A heart full of pride is but a vessel full of air; this self-opinion must be blown out of us before saving knowledge be poured into us. Humility is the knees of the soul, and to that posture the Lamb will open the book; but pride stands upon tiptoes, as if she would snatch the book out of Christ's hand and unclasp it herself. The first lesson of a Christian is humility; and he that hath not learned the first lesson is not fit to take out a new. —Adams, 1653.

(2952.) Humility is the first lesson we learn from reflection, and self-distrust the first proof we give of having obtained a knowledge of ourselves.

—Zimmermann, 1728-1795.

(2953.) True humility, the basis of the Christian system, is the low, but deep and firm, foundation of all real virtue.

—Burke, 1728-1797.

2. It is absolutely necessary to our acceptance with God.

(2954.) Humility is all important in Christian morality. It is necessary, in order to change every apparently good action into a really Christian action, and to make it acceptable with God. It is like the cipher at the right hand of a figure, nothing in itself, but yet increasing tenfold the value of that with which it is connected. It is the salt, giving savour to otherwise tasteless food. Yet we sometimes see men actually proud of their right feelings or right actions, and thereby vitiating them altogether.

—Cotton.

3. It qualifies us for the reception of grace.

(2955.) God promises His grace to the humble, and therefore there must be something in humility that disposes men for grace. This heavenly rain in this differs from the natural, that it falls chiefly in the lower places, whereas that falls indifferently. But herein, however, it resembles the natural rain, that however it falls, yet it stays and lodges in the lower grounds, in the valleys, which also is the chief place for springs and fountains, according to that observation of the Psalmist: "He sendeth the springs into the valleys, which run among the hills." Now to these valleys, both St. Austin and St. Bernard compare the humble and low-spirited man. So St. Austin: "If they are humble, they are valleys, they take what is infused and do not let it go. If water falls upon a high place, it runs down and falls off; but if upon a concave and low place, it is there received, and there it stands." He might have further added,—and enriches it, and makes it fruitful. And so it is with the hearts of humble men, those spiritual valleys, they receive the grace of God and keep it (there being nothing in the spirit of humility that is offensive to the Spirit of God, that grieves or provokes Him to depart) and being thus under the standing and remaining influences of the dew of heaven, they grow fruitful with it, and abound in every good word and work; and so, as the Psalmist says, "The valleys also are covered over with corn; they shout for joy."

—Norris, 1707.

4. It ennobles our nature.

(2956.) The humble man is a lowly valley, sweetly planted and well watered; the proud man's earth, whereon he tramples, but secretly full of wealthy mines, more worth than he that walks over them; a rich stone set in lead; and lastly, a true temple of God built with a low roof.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(2957.) Humility leads to the highest distinction, because it leads to self-improvement. Study your own characters; endeavour to learn and to supply your own deficiencies; never assume to yourselves qualities which you do not possess; combine all this with energy and activity, and you cannot predicate of yourselves, nor can others predicate of you, at what point you may arrive at last.

—Sir Benjamin Brodie.

5. It is the life of prayer.

(2958.) Well, Christian, if thou wouldst keep thy soul awake, take heed thou losest not the sense of thy wants. Begging is the poor man's trade; when thou beginnest to conceit thyself rich, then thou wilt be in danger of ceasing to beg, that is, to pray.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

6. It is the safeguard of all the virtues.

(2959.) Humility is the chain of the chaplet of all the virtues.

—Vianney.

(2960.) Humility is not only a virtue in itself, but a vessel to contain other virtues: like embers, which keep the fire alive that is hidden under it.

—Adams, 1653.

V. ITS INFLUENCE ON THE CHARACTER AND LIFE.

1. It promotes growth in grace.

(2961.) As a tree, the more deeply it is rooted in the earth, the taller it groweth: even so, a man, the more humble he is, the higher doth the Lord exalt him.

—Cowdrey, 1609.

(2962.) Where do the rivers run that fertilise our soil—is it on the top of yonder hill? No! in the vales beneath. If you would have "the river whose streams make glad the city of our God" to run through your hearts, and enrich them to His glory, you must abide in the vale of humility.

2. It makes men contented.

(2963.) As light, where it is, cannot but shine, nor fire choose but burn, so where humility is, it will make a man frame himself thereto within and without. In his mind, to take up lowly thoughts and desires; without, to acquaint himself with words and all courses which suit with the lowliness of his mind. A bladder when it is full of wind does swell so big that we cannot grip it in our hand, but when the wind is pressed or let out, it is a small matter, and is easily contained in a little compass ; so pride does so puff up a man that he swells big at heart, looks big, speaks big, and is hardly satisfied with any honour. But when humility comes, that presses out that wind by which the heart was swollen, and then a man sets much less by himself, and is lowly in his words and looks, and can make himself equal with those of low degree.

—Bayne, 1618.

(2964.) The humble know it is much easier to obey than govern, and that the valleys are the most fruitful grounds, and that it is the cedars and mountain trees that are blown down, and not the shrubs, and that a low condition affordeth not only more safety, but more leisure and quietness to converse with God, and that it is a mercy that others may be employed in his preservation, and keeping the walls, and watching the house, while he may follow his work in quietness and peace ; and therefore willingly payeth honour and tribute to whom it is due.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

3. It makes men thankful.

(2965.) Objects seem large or little according to the medium through which they are viewed. In the microscope, what a remarkable change they undergo ! The humble moss rises into a graceful tree ; the beetle, armed for battle, flashes in golden or silver mail ; a grain of sand swells into a mass of rock ; and, on the other hand, a mountain looked at through the wrong end of a telescope sinks into a mole-hill, and the broad lake contracts into a tiny pool. Even so, according as we look at them, with the eyes of self-condemning humility, or of self-righteous pride, God's mercies seem great or little. For example, a minister of the Gospel passing one day near a cottage, was attracted to its door by the sound of a loud and earnest voice. It was a bare and lonely dwelling ; the home of a man who was childless, old, and poor. Drawing near this mean and humble cabin, the stranger at length made out these words, "This, and Jesus Christ too ! this, and Jesus Christ too !" as they were repeated over and over in tones of deep emotion, of wonder, gratitude, and praise. His curiosity was roused to see what that could be which called forth such fervent, overflowing thanks. Stealing near, he looked in at the patched and broken window ; and there in the form of a grey, bent, worn-out son of toil, at a rude table, with hands raised to God, and his eyes fixed on some crusts of bread and a cup of water, sat piety, peace, humility, contentment, exclaiming, "This, and Jesus Christ too !" —Guthrie.

4. It makes men useful.

(2966.) The boughs which are best laden with fruit hang downwards, and we can with the most ease gather the fruit from them ; high trees are commonly fruitless, and what grows on them is hard to come by ; it hangs so high above our reach. So have we more good of the humble, as who have most good in them, and do communicate it to us. Such as are proud have for the most part least true good in them, or look so high, that the fruit they bear cannot be reached by God's poor people.

—Bayne, 1618.

(2967.) A Christian minister said, "I was never of any use until I found out that God did not make me for a great man."

VI. HOW IT IS TO BE ATTAINED.

(2968.) Let us bring ourselves to greater lights than our own ; that is, oft come into the company of those that have greater grace than ourselves. The stars give no light when the sun is up. The stars are something in the night, but they are nothing in the day. And those that are conceited of their own excellences, when they come into the presence and company, and converse with those that are better than themselves, their spirits fall down, they are abased.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(2969.) A sight of God's glory humbles : Elijah wrapped his face in a mantle when God's glory passed by. "Now mine eye seeth Thee, wherefore I abhor myself" (Job xlii. 5). The stars vanish when the sun appears.

—Watson, 1696.

(2970.) The creature never appears so pitiful and inconsiderable as when it views itself with one eye, and its Creator with the other.

Everything is more apparent as it stands compared with its opposite. Man is but a weak and a contemptible thing at the best ; but much more contemptible, if compared to an angel, and yet infinitely and inconceivably more despicable must he be, if compared to God. A glowworm signifies little if compared but to a candle ; but set it before the stars, consider it in emulation with the sun and the ruling lights of heaven, and what a silly ridiculous thing must it appear !

While men consider nothing but themselves, they may grow proud and conceited : for little things may be valued by those who never saw greater. He that never saw the day, may admire and dote upon his lamp. But consideration and experience of great things reduces and degrades little matters to their own proper dimensions. "Those that measure themselves by themselves" (says the apostle) "are not wise." For when we make a thing its own measure, it is impossible to discover any defect in it. But bring it to another thing that excels and outshines it, and then we shall quickly see how much a tree is taller than a shrub, and a royal palace greater and nobler than a country cottage.

Men are enamoured with their own reason ; but let them compare it with omniscience, and it is nothing. They perhaps value themselves upon their dominion over these inferior things ; but what is all their grandeur to the royalty and universal empire of Providence ? what is their policy to the wisdom of Him that governs the world and "charges the very angels with folly ?" It is impossible for a man that frequently and seriously thinks of God to value himself.

—South, 1633-1716.

(2971.) Religion, and that alone, teaches absolute humility ; by which I mean a sense of our absolute nothingness in the view of infinite greatness and excellence. That sense of inferiority which results from the comparison of men with each other is often an unwelcome sentiment forced upon the mind, which may rather embitter the temper than soften it : that which devotion impresses is soothing and delightful. The devout man loves to lie low at the footstool of his Creator, because it is then he attains the most lively perceptions of the Divine excellence, and the most tranquil confidence in the divine favour. In so august a presence he sees all distinctions lost, and all beings reduced to the same level. He looks at his superiors without envy, and his inferiors without contempt : and when from this elevation he descends to mix in society, the conviction of superiority which must in many instances be felt is a calm inference of the understanding, and no longer a busy, importunate passion of the heart.

—Robert Hall, 1764–1831.

(2972.) Persons pray that they may be humble. Here is a big, strong man who, in the morning, prays that he may be humble through the day ; and in order to make it more effectual, while kneeling he puts his head clear down in his chair ; and in order to make it still more effectual, he talks in an official voice. When his prayer is finished, he gets up and straightens himself, and goes to his store, and storms about his business. He is not going to see things go to rack and ruin because nobody feels responsible. And the man quite forgets his prayer. He leaves that for God to take care of. When he comes home at night he has some mournful feelings about the way in which he has conducted himself through the day. And the next morning he prays for humility again. The experience of the previous day is repeated. At night his feelings are mellowed down once more (for men almost always have the grace of humility when they are sleepy); and so he gets through another night.

Now, the fault did not lie in the fact that the man prayed God to make him humble. The fault lay in this, that he thought the prayer relieved him from the responsibility of training himself—from the necessity of the yoke and the harness. Men pray for meekness, and yet when they are brought into circumstances which call for the exercise of meekness they forget their prayer. —Beecher.

VII. DEEPENS AS GRACE INCREASES.

(2973.) They who climb lofty mountains, find it safest, the higher they ascend, the more to bow and stoop with their bodies ; and so does the Spirit of Christ teach the saints, the higher they get in their victories over corruption, to bow lowest in humility.

—Gurnall, 1617–1679.

(2974.) When the corn is nearly ripe it bows the head and stoops lower than when it was green. When the people of God are near ripe for heaven, they grow more humble and self-denying than in the days of their first profession. The longer a saint grows in the world, the better he is still acquainted with his own heart and his obligations to God ; both of which are very humbling things. Paul had one foot in heaven when he called himself the chiefest of sinners and least of saints.

A Christian in the progress of his knowledge and grace is like a vessel cast into the sea—the more it fills, the deeper it sinks. —Flavel, 1630–1691.

VIII. ITS COUNTERFEITS.

(2975.) Many are humbled that are not humble ; many are cast down that have proud hearts still, as Pharaoh had.

—Sibbes, 1577–1635.

(2976.) Let iron be broken into pieces, yet still it remains hard : so, a heart may be broken in pieces, and yet remain hard and unhumiliated. But true humility is, when the soul is melted, so as to run into this gospel mould ; so as to receive Christ, and walk in Him.

—Erskine, 1685–1752.

IX. ITS WISDOM.

(2977.) Let us acquire that height which comes by humility. Let us look into the nature of human things, that we may kindle with the longing desire of the things to come ; for in no other way is it possible to become humble, except by the love of what is divine, and the contempt of what is present. For just as a man on the point of obtaining a kingdom, if, instead of that purple robe, one offers him some trivial compliment, will count it to be nothing ; so shall we also laugh to scorn all things present, if we desire that other sort of honour.

Do ye not see the children, when in their play they make a band of soldiers, and heralds precede them, and lictors, and a boy marches in the midst in the general's place, how childish it all is ?

Just such are all human affairs. Yea, and more worthless than these : to-day they are, and to-morrow they are not. Let us therefore be above these things ; and let us not only not desire them, but even be ashamed if any one hold them forth to us. For thus casting out the love of these things, we shall possess that other love which is Divine, and shall enjoy immortal glory.

—Chrysostom, 347–407.

(2978.) I will, in things not weighty, submit freely ; the purest gold is the most ductile ; it is commonly a good blade that bends well. If I expect disadvantage, or misdoubt the conquest, I think it good wisdom to give in soonest ; so shall it be more honour to do that willingly, which with stiffness I cannot but hazard on compulsion. I had rather be accounted too much humble than esteemed a little proud ; the reed is better that bends and is whole, than the strong oak that, not bending, breaks. If I must have one, give me an inconvenience, not a mischief.

—Felltham, 1668.

—Baxter, 1615–1691.

X. ITS REWARDS.

1. The inheritance of the earth (Matt. v. 5.)

(2980.) To be humble to superiors is duty ; to equals, is courtesy ; to inferiors, is nobleness ; and to all, safety ; it being a virtue that, for all her lowliness, commandeth those souls it stoops to.

—Sir T. More, 1480–1535.

2. Pardon.

(2981.) Humility is a gracious herb, and allays the wrath of God ; whereas pride provokes it. It is recorded of an English king, Edward I., that being exceeding angry with a servant of his, in the sport of hawking, he threatened him sharply. The gentleman answered, It was well there was a river between them. Hereat the king, more incensed, spurred his horse into the depth of the river, not without extreme danger of his life, the water being deep, and the banks too steep and high for his ascending. Yet at last recovering land, with his sword drawn he pursues the servant, who rode as fast from him. But finding himself too ill-horsed to outride the angry king, he reined, lighted, and on his knees exposed his neck to the blow of the king's sword. The king no sooner saw this but he put up his sword, and would not touch him. A dangerous water could not withhold him from violence; yet his servant's submission did soon pacify him. Whiles man flies stubbornly from God, He that rides upon the wings of the wind' posts after him with the sword of vengeance drawn. But when dust and ashes humbles himself, and stands to His mercy, the wrath of God is soon appeased.

—Adams, 1653.

2. Grace.

(2982.) Make a valley, receive the rain. Low grounds are filled, high grounds are dried up. Grace is rain. Why dost thou marvel then, if "God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace unto the lowly"?

—Augustine, 353-429.

(2983.) The humble man is the tree planted by the rivers of water, that brings forth his fruit in his season, and whose leaf does not wither (Ps. i. 3). For where are the rivers of water but in the valleys? "Surely in the valleys," says St. Bernard: "for who does not see," says he, "that the torrents do decline the steep places of the hills, and divert to the middle lowness of the valley?" "So truly," says he, "God resists the proud, and gives grace to the humble." He thrives and prospers and is fruitful in his low but fat and rich soil, while the proud man on the top of his bleak and barren mountain, for want of taking up or retaining this spiritual dew, dries up, hardens, and withers. For he is too high for the grace of God, as having no sense of his need of it, nor can the Spirit of God delight to dwell with him, who has so much of the spirit of the devil.

—Norris, 1707.

4. Power with God.

(2984.) Humility wrestleth with God, like Jacob, and wins by yielding; and the lower it stoops to the ground, the more advantage it gets to obtain the blessing.

—Adams, 1653.

5. Eternal glory.

(2985.) Humility is a commodity, for which God will exchange the crown of glory. Moses, David, Paul went thither with this traffic, I am unworthy; and Christ gave them for it the kingdom of heaven.

—Adams, 1653.

HYPOCRITES.

1. Their self-seeking.

(2986.) Even as the swiftest hawk, going about to seize the bird that flieth, as it were, in the top of the air, doth not, when she first seeth her, fly directly towards her, but rather, with setting of a compass, doth seem to despise and to fly from her, but, at the second or third flight, she goeth towards her with a wonderful force and incredible swiftness, to take her in the air and to rend her in pieces: right so do hypocrites behave themselves; for at the first they will seem to thee not to regard, but to contemn the riches and promotions of the world, but then they counterfeit a simplicity, fowling for a greater matter than yet they see at present, and reaching at some higher dignity than the present occasion doth offer; but at the second or third flight, when everything doth answer their expectation, thou shalt perceive that with all speed and greediness they will lay hold upon those things which thou thoughtest they had contemned.

—Cawdray, 1609.

(2987.) As rebels make their proclamations in the name of the king, and pirates intending to rob merchants hang out the flags of other nations, both to scandal them and to conceal themselves; so do hypocrites wear Christian colours that they may be the devil's cozeners.

—Adams, 1653.

(2988.) Cnidius, a skilful architect, building a watch-tower for the king of Egypt (to discover the dangerous rocks by night to the mariners), caused his own name to be engraven upon a stone in the wall in great letters, and afterwards covered it with lime and mortar, and upon the outside of that wrote the name of the king of Egypt in golden letters, as pretending that all was done for his honour and glory; but herein was his cunning, he very well knew that the dashing of the water would in a little time consume the plastering (as it did), and then his name and memory should abide to after generations. Thus there are many in this world, who pretend to seek only the glory of God, the good of His Church, and the happiness of the state; but if there were a window to look into their hearts, we should find nothing there written but self-seeking.

—Spencer, 1658.

(2989.) The hypocrite sets his watch, not by the sun, that is, the Bible, but by the town clock; what most do, that he will do. Vox populi is his vox Dei.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

2. Their zeal for forms and ceremonies.

(2990.) Fruit-trees that bring forth the fairest and most beautiful blossoms, leaves, and shoots, usually bring forth the fewest and least fruits; because where nature is vigorously pressing to do one work (spending its strength there), it is at the same time weak about other works; but distinct and several works of nature, in moderate degree, are all promoted at the same time.

This is another similitude, &c., whence we learn that generally those persons who are excessive, and most curious about the forms of duties, have least of the power of godliness.

The Pharisees were excessively careful about the outside of God's worship: in preaching, praying, fasting, giving alms, &c. But where was sincerity all this while? They had the form, but wanted the power of godliness. These were but leaves, buds or blossoms, but no fruits; they were not profitable to them as to eternal advantages. "Except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven."

So it was among us of late years: bowing at the name of Jesus and at the communion table, surplice, common prayer, &c. These and such like were pressed with all eagerness and strictness. The body of religion was large and monstrous, but without a soul, or, if any, it was lean and feeble. These kind of persons are like the Indian fig-tree that Pliny speaks of, which had leaves as broad as targets, but fruits no bigger than a bean.

This is a foul fault among us at this day ; some men stand more about the forms of worship than about the power of it ; they look so much after the way, manner, and circumstances, that they almost lose the substance ; things which are but as husks, or shells to the kernels, or as leaves in respect of fruits.

Some others labour more for gifts than for graces, for human learning than for holiness ; all these are guilty of the same folly, as those who take more care about the shape and fashion of the garment, than the health and soundness of the body ; or (to use the metaphor in hand), they bring forth leaves instead of fruits, and so are unprofitable trees, liable to God's displeasure and cutting down every moment.

—Austen, 1656.

(2991.) They are set upon excess of ceremonies, because they are defective in the vital parts, and should have no religion if they had not this. All sober Christians are friends to outward decency and order ; but it is the empty self-deceiver that is most for the unwarrantable inventions of man, and useth the worship of God but as a mask or puppet-play, where there is great doings, with little life, and to little purpose. The chastest woman will wash her face ; but it is the harlot, or wanton, or deformed, that will paint it. The soberest and the comeliest will avoid a nasty or ridiculous habit, which may make them seem uncomely where they are not ; but a curious dress, and excessive care, doth signify a deformed body or a filthy skin, or, which is worse, an empty soul, that hath need of such a covering. Consciousness of such greater want doth cause them to seek these poor supplies. The gaudiness of men's religion is not the best sign that it is sincere. Simplicity is the ordinary attendant of sincerity. It hath long been a proverb, "The more ceremony, the less substance ; and the more compliment, the more craft."

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2992.) In the carnal religion of the hypocrite, the outside, which should be the ornament and attendant of the inward spiritual part, hath got the mastery, and is used in an enmity against the more noble part which it should serve ; and much more are his human inventions and mixtures thus destructively employed. His bellows do but blow out the candle, under pretence of kindling the fire. He sets the body against the soul, and sometimes the clothing against both. He useth forms to the destruction of knowledge, and quenching of all seriousness and fervour of affection. By preaching, he destroyeth preaching, and prayeth till prayer is become no prayer, but the image or carcass of prayer at the best.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

3. Their love of publicity.

(2993.) Though the total neglect of secret duties in religion speaks a person to be a hypocrite, yet the performance of duties in secret will not demonstrate thee a sincere person ; hypocrisy is, in this, like the frogs brought on Egypt—no place was free from them, no not their bed-chambers ; they crept into their most inward rooms. And so doth hypocrisy into chamber duties, as well as public ; indeed, though the places be secret where such duties are performed, yet the matter may be so handled, and is by some hypocrites, that they are not secret in their closets ; like the hen who goes into a secret place to lay her egg, but by her cackling tells all the house where she is, and what she is doing.

Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2994.) "Thou shalt not be as the hypocrites, for they love to pray standing in the synagogues and in the corners of the street, that they may be seen of men." That they may be seen of men ! He rings the changes on that—exposing the pride and vanity that lay at the root of their religion. Loud, ostentatious, and unprofitable, it was like the brawling, noisy, foaming, frothy torrent, which, with a rock for its bed and barrenness on its banks, makes itself seen and heard. How different genuine, gracious piety ! Affluent in blessings but retiring from observation, it has its symbol in the stream that pursues a silent course, and, flashing out in the light of day but here and there, but now and then, is not known but by the good it does—the flowers that bloom on its banks, and the evergreen verdure which it gives to the pastures through which it winds on its quiet path.

Guthrie.

4. Often show fairer than real Christians.

(2995.) Their worship is like to counterfeit money, which is gilded outwardly, but within is nothing but brass, or suchlike base stuff, so that all is not gold that glitters ; or like the apples which grow at the Dead Sea (where sometime Sodom and Gomorrah stood), which are fair in colour, beautiful in show, but when you come to touch them, or to handle them, they turn to dust and cast out a filthy savour, more unpleasant to the nostrils than they were pleasant before to the eyes. Thus it is with hypocrites ; they appear beautiful before men, they love to be well thought of by them, and have many times more glorious shows than others that are more sound within, because they study nothing else but how to get the applause and praise of the world.

—Attersool, 1618.

(2996.) "You are very dull-looking and worn," said the New Coin to an Old Shilling,—surveying its ownself with much satisfaction.

"When you have had experience of the world as I have, you will not appear so fresh and bright perhaps as now. You have all your trials to come, friend ; and I only wish that you may wear well unto the end," said the Old Shilling.

"You have had many rough rubs in your time, judging from your appearance," observed the New Coin sarcastically.

"True," replied the Old Shilling.

"Why, indeed, one needs to look narrowly, in order to see whether you are really a shilling at all ! What a contrast I am to your smoothness, with my legible inscription and prominent impression," remarked the New Coin.

"All with honest service, though, in my own case, as I am thankful to say," answered the Old Shilling, with humility notwithstanding. "Appearances are not always to be depended upon, and 'All is not gold that glitters.' But, however that may be, this is a fact, that all currency must be subjected to trial ; whilst sterling silver will always bear the test and be never rejected ; for, when through wear and tear no longer fit for its labour, the Mint will accept and receive it again."

The New Coin was shortly afterwards tested in company with the Old Shilling ; and whilst the latter was honourably accepted as a true coin of the realm, the other was ignominiously broken up and destroyed; having been discovered to be base metal—a vile counterfeit!

A day is coming when all men will be "weighed in the balances," and when only the just will pass current. But the character of professors is now undergoing examination. God's providence often sifts out hypocrites from among genuine believers; and, in the solemn language of the prophet, "Reprobate silver shall men call them, because the Lord hath rejected them." —Bowden.

5. The contrast between what they seem and are.

(2997.) As a thick wood, that giveth great shadow, doth delight the eyes of the beholders greatly with the variety of flourishing trees and pleasant plants, so that it seemeth to be obtained only for pleasure's sake, and yet within is full of poisonous serpents, ravening wolves, and other wild beasts: even so a hypocrite, when outwardly he seemeth holy and to be well-furnished with all sorts of virtues, doth please well the eyes of his beholders; but within him there lurketh pride, covetousness, envy, and all manner of wickednesses, like wild and cruel beasts wandering in the wood of his heart.

—Cawdray, 1609.

—Cawdray, 1609.

(2999.) Hypocrites are like pictures on canvas, they show fairest at farthest. A hypocrite's profession is in folio, but his sincerity is so abridged that it is contained in decimo-sexto, nothing in the world to speak of. A hypocrite is like the Sicilian Etna, flaming at the mouth when it hath snow at the foot: their mouths talk hotly, but their feet walk coldly. The nightingale hath a sweet voice, but a lean carcass; a voice, and nothing else but a voice: and so have all hypocrites.

—Adams, 1653.

(3000.) They that seem best to the world, are often the worst to God; they that are best to God, seem worst to the world. When the moon is lightest to the earth, she is darkest to heaven; when she is lightest to heaven, she is darkest to the earth. So often men most glorious to the world are obscurest to the divine approbation; others, obscure to the world's acknowledgment, are principally respected in God's favour.

—Adams, 1653.

(3001.) Wicked men are like the apples of Sodom, seemingly fair but nothing but ashes within. The best of God's servants are like sound apples, lying in a dusty loft (living in a wicked world), gathering much dust about them, so that they must be rubbed or pared before they can be eaten. Such, notwithstanding, are sincere.

—Fuller, 1608-1661.

(3002.) Their religion is only in show and outside, as apples may be fair to see in the skin, but rotten at the core.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(3003.) It is always winter with the hypocrite in his formal lifeless services, and yet sometime his leaf doth never fall. He is like the box-tree that knows no fruit, and yet its leaves are always green.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(3004.) The shops in the square of San Marco were all religiously closed, for the day was a high festival. We were much disappointed, for it was our last day, and we desired to take away with us some souvenirs of lovely Venice; but our regret soon vanished, for on looking at the shop we meant to patronise, we readily discovered signs of traffic within. We stepped to the side door, and found when one or two other customers had been served, that we might purchase to our heart's content, saint or no saint. After this fashion too many keep the laws of God to the eye, but violate them in the heart. The shutters are up as if the man no more dealt with sin and Satan; but a brisk commerce is going on behind the scenes. From such deceit may the Spirit of Truth preserve us.

—Spurgeon.

(3005.) In the pursuit of pastoral duty, I stood a little while ago in a cheesemonger's shop, and being in a fidgety humour, and having a stick in my hand, I did what most Englishmen are sure to do, I was not content with seeing, but must needs touch as well. My stick came gently upon a fine cheese in the window, and to my surprise a most metallic sound emanated from it. The sound was rather hollow, or one might have surmised that all the taste-holes had been filled up with sovereigns, and thus the cheese had been greatly enriched, and the merchant had been his own banker. There was, however, a sort of crockery jingle in the sound like the ring of a huge bread or milk pan, such as our country friends use so abundantly; and I came to the very correct conclusion that I had found a very well got-up hypocrite in the shop window. Mark, from this time, when I pass by, I mentally whisper, "Pottery;" and the shams may even be exchanged for realities, but I shall be long in believing it. In my mind the large stock has dissolved into potsherds, and the fine show in the window only suggests the potter's vessel. The homely illustration is simply introduced because we find people of this sort in our churches, looking extremely like what they should be, yet having no substance in them, so that if, accidentally, one happens to tap them somewhere or other with sudden temptation or stern duty, the baked earth gives forth its own ring, and the pretender is esteemed no longer. —Spurgeon.

6. Their knowledge is comfortless.

(3006.) The knowledge of the hypocrite brings small joy and comfort with it, and though it exceed in measure, yet it cheers not the heart like the least knowledge of a sound Christian; even as the knowledge of the lawyer in the evidences of a man's lands may be greater than the owner's, but yet he cannot read them with like comfort, because he has no right to them.

—Downam, 1644.

7. Their religion is only a screen.

(3007.) The use of the hypocrite's religion is to be a screen betwixt him and the flames of wrath, that would scorch him too soon, if he were of no religion : and to be to him as a tent or a penthouse to keep off the storms that would fall upon him, while he is trading for the world, and working for the flesh. His religion is but the sheath of his guilty conscience, to keep it from wounding him, and cutting his fingers, while they are busy in the brutish service of his lusts. It is but a glove to save his skin, when he hath to do with the nettles and thorns of the threatenings of God, and the thoughts of vengeance, that else would reach his guilty soul. It is but as his upper garment, to save him from a storm, and then to be laid by as an unnecessary burden, when he is at home. The hypocrite's religion is but as his shoe; he can tread it in the dirt, so it will but save his foot from galling. As a man that hath an unquiet scolding wife is fain to speak her fair by flatteries, lest he should have no rest at home; or as a thief is fain to cast a crust to the dog that barketh at him, to stop his mouth; so is an ungodly, sensual person fain to flatter his conscience with some kind of devotion and seeming righteousness that may deceive him into a belief that he is a child of God. Religion is the sovereign in a gracious soul, and the master in an upright conscience, and ruleth above all worldly interests. But with the unregenerate, it is but an underling and servant that must do no more than the flesh and the world will give consent to, and is regarded no further than for mere necessity; and when it hath done the work which the hypocrite appointed it, it is dismissed and turned out of doors. God is acknowledged and confessed by the hypocrite, but not as God. Christ is believed and accepted, but not as Christ, but as an underling to the world, and a journeyman to do some job of work for a distressed, wrangling conscience; or as an unwelcome physician to give them a vomit when they have taken some extraordinary surfeit of sensual delight: when they have fallen into great affliction, or into any foul, disgraceful sin, then, perhaps they take up their prayer-books, or call upon Christ, and seem devout and very penitent. But their piety is blown over with the storm. The effect ceaseth with the cause. It was not the love of God, or of His holy ways and service, that set them upon their devotions, but some tempest of adversity, or shipwreck of their estates, or friends, or consciences; and when the winds are laid, and the waves are still, their devotions cease with their danger.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

8. Their inconstancy in prayer.

(3008.) A hypocrite, Job saith, will not pray always; he will not always call upon God. Possibly he may sometimes cry out, as a scholar under the rod, or a malefactor upon the rack, for deliverance out of some affliction; but when God openeth His hand, and bestoweth the mercy, his mouth is shut, and his heart too, that you shall hear but little more of this duty.

If he pray on his sickbed, and God raise him up, he leaves his prayers sick a-bed behind him. His prayer was but a messenger sent about some particular errand; when that is done, the messenger returneth. As that story of the friar speaketh, how, when he was a poor friar, he went ever sadly casting his eyes upon the ground, but being abbot, he went merrily, looking upward. One of his companions asked him the reason of that alteration: he answered, that he was a common friar, he went dejected by looking downward for the keys of the abbey, which now he had found, and left that posture.

So when a hypocrite hath the temporal good thing he desireth—for that usually is most desired by him—he hath his ends, and his prayers an end too.

—Swinnock, 1673.

9. Their folly and misery.

(3009.) As it availeth a man nothing at all, to the relief of his poverty, to have false coin in his purse; it must be good current money, otherwise it doth the more endanger himself, and openeth a gap to his utter destruction: even so a fair tongue with a foul heart is false coin; it will help no man if he say he hateth sin, and yet loveth it in his heart; for in so doing he condemneth himself, notwithstanding how many and how good prayers he may make.

—Camdrey, 1609.

(3010.) As a man can have very small comfort to be thought by the world to be rich because he hath a shop full of wares and driveth a great trade, when, in the meantime, he knows, poor man, that he oweth much more than he is worth; or because he maketh a counterfeit show of rich wares, whereas he hath nothing but empty boxes with false inscriptions, or but pieces of wood and brickbats made up in paper instead of silks or other costly wares: so is it with all those that seem to be religious, that make a goodly show of godliness, yet, in the meantime, are very bankrupts in grace, and like one of Solomon's fools (Prov. xiii. 7), that boast themselves of great riches, when they are, indeed, exceeding poor. But what get they by it? What comfort reap they by it? None at all; their consciences bearing them witness that they are none such as the world takes them to be.

—Downname, 1642.

(3011.) If thou hast an angel's tongue and a devil's heart, thou art no better than a post in the cross-way, that rots itself to direct others; or a torch that, having pleased others with the light, goes forth itself in smoke and stench.

—Adams, 1653.

(3012.) The Jews covered Christ's face, and then buffeted Him. So does the hypocrite; he first says in his heart, God sees not, and then makes bold to sin against Him. He ought to say with Augustine, "I may hide Thee from myself, but not myself from Thee."

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3013.) As a merchant in a storm is loth to cast his goods into the sea, and therefore hopes he may save himself and them, till he and they are drowned together; or as a patient that abhors his physic, or loves some forbidden thing too well, is hoping still that he may escape, though he use the thing he loves, and forbear the medicine which he loathes till he be past remedy, and he consents too late; so is it often with the self-deceiving hypocrite: he loves not this strict, and holy, and heavenly, and self-denying life, and therefore he will hope that God will save him without it, as long as he is religious in a way that he accounts more wise, and safe, and moderate, and comely, and suited to the nature and infirmity of man. These are his hopes, and to deceive his heart, by maintaining these, it is that he is religious, till either grace convert, or justice apprehend him, and his hopes and he are swallowed up by convincing flames and utter desperation.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(3014.) A friend had fitted two glasses into a little ivory tube in such a way that any small object, like a midge or other insect, when put into it, and viewed through the smaller and upper glass, seemed of enormous magnitude, with all its parts, however diminutive, distinctly visible. If, however, the tube was reversed, and the objects contemplated through the larger glass, they then appeared to shrink below the usual size. Gotthold looked upon the contrivance with no ordinary pleasure, and said: I know not what better name to give this instrument than the magnifier. In my opinion, however, the hearts of the proud and of the hypocritical are of the same construction. When they contemplate what is their own—their virtues and talents—they see through a glass which self-love has so artfully prepared, that all seems of vast dimensions, and they imagine that they have good reason to boast and congratulate themselves upon their gifts. If, however, they have occasion to look at their neighbour and his good points, they turn the instrument upside down, and then all seems small and common-place. In like manner, their own faults and vices they observe through the diminishing glass, and reckon them very inconsiderable; while they contemplate their neighbour's from the opposite side, and so convert a midge into an elephant. The greatest of all delusions in the world is that which man voluntarily practises upon himself, and which betrays him with his eyes open, into pride, self-esteem, and contempt of others. You will own that the heart of the Pharisee, who looked upon himself as a mighty saint, and upon the Publican as a brand fit for the burning, was of this description. That Pharisee, however, has left behind him a numerous offspring, and spread his line over the whole earth. In fact, I do not believe there exists a man who has not sometimes used such an instrument in the way we have described.

—Scriven, 1629-1693.

(3015.) To pretend holiness when there is none, is a vain thing. What were the foolish virgins better for their blazing lamps, when they wanted oil? What is the lamp of profession without the oil of saving grace? What comfort will a show of holiness yield at last? Will painted gold enrich? Painted wine refresh him that is thirsty? Will painted holiness be a cordial at the hour of death? A pretence of sanctification is not to be rested in. Many ships that have had the name of the Hope, the Safeguard, the Triumph, yet have been cast away upon the rocks; so many who have had the name of saintship, have been cast into hell.

—Watson, 1696.

10. Their craft.

(3016.) Experience sheweth that Irish and Cornish stones, and many other false gems, have such a lustre in them, and so sparkle like true jewels, that a cunning lapidary, if he be not careful, may be cheated with them. Such are the enlightening graces which shine in hypocrites: they so nearly resemble the true sanctifying and saving graces of the elect, that the eye of spiritual wisdom itself may mistake them if it be not single and look narrowly into them.

—Featly, 1582-1644.

11. The certainty of their ultimate exposure.

(3017.) Counterfeit diamonds may sparkle and glitter, and make a great show for some time, but their lustre will not last long; and experience shows that an apple, if it be rotten at the core, though it have a fair and shining outside, yet rottenness will not stay long, but will taint the outside also. It is the nature of things unsound that the corruption stays not where it began, but corrupteth more and more till all be alike. Thus it is that sincerity tells the Christian, "nothing counterfeit will last long," and that man that hath a rotten heart towards God, his want of sincerity will in time be discovered, and his outside be made as rotten as his inside. Fraud and guile cannot go long unspied, dissembling will not always be dissembled, and hypocrisy will discover itself in the end.

—Bond, 1646.

(3018.) Hypocrites labour to seem saints, not to be so; but the holy labour to be, more than to seem, saints. The kite may fly aloft, but her eye and mind is to the earth: she seems to be a gallant bird at her pitch, till she falls down upon a carrion. Oh how the dissembling zealot makes a show to honour Christ with his lofty profession, as if he were altogether a man of heaven: tarry but a little, throw the bait of glory in his way, and he will stoop to a carrion, and be taken with the pride of his own commendation.

—Adams, 1653.

(3019.) Remember that a vessel of true gold will wear brighter and brighter to the last, when a cup which is only gilt will grow paler and paler till all the gilt be off.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(3020.) Hypocrites are certain to miscarry at last; so true is that proverb, "Frost and fraud have dirty ends."

The Christian, like a star in the heavens, wades through the cloud that for a time hides his comfort; but the hypocrite, like a meteor in the air, blazeth for a while, and then drops into some ditch where he is quenched. "The light of the righteous rejoiceth, but the lamp of the wicked is put out."

Hypocrites are like tops, that go no longer than they are whipped; but the sincere soul is ever ready; it doth not want a will, but only skill and strength to act.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3021.) God taught man to make coats to cover his naked body, but the devil taught him to weave deceit to cover his naked soul; yet the more subtle thou art in concealing thy sin, the more egregiously thou playest the fool. None so shamed as the liar when found out, and thou art sure to be.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3022.) There is no more difference betwixt an hypocrite and an apostate, than betwixt a green apple and a ripe one: come awhile hence, and you will see him fall rotten-ripe from his profession. Judas a close hypocrite, how soon an open traitor? And as fruit ripens sooner or later, as the heat of the year proves, so doth hypocrisy, as the temptation is strong or weak; some hypocrites go longer before they are discovered than others; because they meet not with such powerful temptations to draw out their corruptions.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3023.) Coals of fire cannot be concealed beneath the most sumptuous apparel, they will betray themselves with smoke and flame; nor can darling sins be long hidden beneath the most ostentatious profession, they will sooner or later discover themselves, and burn sad holes in the man's reputation. Sin needs quenching in the Saviour's blood, not concealing under the garb of religion.

—Spurgeon.

12. The vanity of their hope.

(3024.) In the 14th verse of the 8th chapter of Job, we have the hypocrite's hope compared to "a spider's web;" a similitude of great elegance and significance; and we may observe a great analogy between the spider's web, and that in a double respect.

1st. In respect of the curious subtilty and the fine artificial composure of it. The spider in every web shows itself an artist: so the hypocrite spins his hope with a great deal of art, in a thin, fine thread. This and that good duty, this good thought, this opposing of some gross sin, are all interwoven together to the making up a covering for his hypocrisy. And as the spider draws all out of its own bowels, so the hypocrite weaves all his confidence out of his own inventions and imaginations.

2dly. It resembles it in respect of its weakness; it is too fine spun to be strong. After the spider has used all its art and labour in framing a web, yet how easily is it broken, how quickly is it swept down! So after the hypocrite has wrought out a hope with much cost, art, and industry, it is yet but a weak, slender, pitiful thing. He does indeed by this get some name and room amongst professors; he does, as it were, hang his hopes upon the beams of God's house. But when God shall come to cleanse, and, as it were, to sweep His sanctuary, such cobwebs are sure to be fetched down. Thus the hypocrite, like the spider, by all his artifice and labour only disfigures God's house. A hypocrite in a church is like a cobweb in a palace—all that he is or does serving only to annoy and misbecome the place and station that he would adorn.

—South, 1633-1716.

(3025.) To show yet farther how contemptible and vain a thing it is, we have the wise man emphatically comparing it to a candle, in Prov. xxiv. 20, where he tells us that "the candle of the wicked shall be put out." And what is a candle, but a diminutive, dwindling light at best, made only to burn for a little time, both shining and spending itself at once; so that although it should not be blown out, or extinguished by any violent accident, yet it would at length go out of its own accord, and that too with an offensive farewell left behind. In like manner, though God should not, by any severe and boisterous dispensation of judgments, forcibly tear the hypocrite's hope out of his heart; yet through its own native weakness, having lasted its term, and, like a candle, having consumed its little stock, it must die away of itself.

—South, 1633-1716.

13. Their wickedness.

(3026.) It is fearful for a man to bind two sins together, when he is not able to bear the load of one. To act wickedness, and then to cloak it, is for a man to wound himself, and then go to the devil for a plaster. What man doth conceal, God will not cancel. Iniquities strangled in silence will strangle the soul in heaviness.

—Adams, 1653.

(3027.) The door of his mouth is swept and garnished, and strewed with green rushes; but in his heart is a whole legion of devils. The hypocrite, certainly, is a secret atheist; for if he did believe there was a God, he durst not be so bold as to deceive Him to His face.

—Adams, 1653.

(3028.) Hypocrites are like the snake, which casts her coat, but keeps her poison: they keep the love of sin.

—Halson, 1696.

14. Their punishment.

(3029.) "And whose trust shall be a spider's web" (Job viii. 14). The assurance of the hypocrite is rightly called like the webs of spiders, in that all the pains and labour they spend to acquire glory, the wind of mortality blows quite to shreds. For as they never seek the things of eternity, they lose together with time all temporal good things.

Moreover it is to be considered that spiders draw their threads in a regular order, for that hypocrites as it were regulate their works by the rule of discernment. The spider's web is woven with pains, but it is scattered by a sudden blast.

—Gregory, 545-604.

(3030.) The dissolute shall speed better than the hypocrite; and lukewarmness is more offensive to God's stomach than frost-coldness. The thistle in the forest shall not fare so ill as the barren fig-tree in the vineyard.

—Adams, 1653.

(3031.) Bad men may keep up long, but when once they fall, they cannot rise again. They are like apples I have seen hanging from a tree, round and fair as they could be, but also inside as rotten as they could be. As long as they could swing upon their stem they did well enough, but when they had fallen and smashed upon the ground, I never heard of their being made good apples of afterwards.

—Becker.

(3032.) The meteor, if it once fall, cannot be rekindled. When those who once flashed before the eyes of the religious public with the blaze of a vain profession fall into open and scandalous sin, it is impossible to renew their glory. Once break the egg of hypocrisy, and who can repair the damage?

—Spurgeon.

15. Do not disprove the existence of true piety.

(3033.) Will you say that there are no real stars, because you sometimes see meteors fall, which for a time appeared to be stars? Will you say that blossoms never produce fruit, because many of them fall off, and some fruit which appeared sound is rotten at the core? Equally absurd is it to say there is no such thing as real religion, because many who profess it fall away, or prove to be hypocrites in heart.

—Payson.

(3034.) As to the insinuation of general hypocrisy, the wretched charge got up against all religion, when some specious professor stands unmasked before the world, how absurd it is!

Is there no sound grain in our barn-yards, because there is so much chaff?

Are all patriots—Wallace and Bruce, Tell, Russell, and Washington—deceivers and liars, because some men have villainously betrayed their country?

Is there no bright honour in our army, because some soldiers—the sweepings, probably, of our city streets—have deserted, left the lines, and leaped the trenches, and gone over to the enemy?

Is there no such virtue as integrity among British merchants, because now and then we hear of a fraudulent bankrupt?

Because some religious professors prove hypocrites, is therefore all ardent piety hollow hypocrisy?

—Guthrie.

JOY.

1. Is more than mirthfulness.

(3035.) True joy is a serene and sober motion; and they are miserably out that take laughing for rejoicing: the seat of it is within, and there is no cheerfulness like the resolutions of a brave mind, that has fortune under its feet.

—Seneca, B.C. 5—A.D. 65.

2. The transiency of worldly joys.

(3036.) Worldly joys are soon gone. Some may crown themselves with rose-buds, and bathe in the perfumed waters of pleasure, yet these joys which seem to be sweet are swift; like meteors, they give a bright and sudden flash, and then disappear. But the joys which believers have, are abiding; they are a blossom of eternity, a pledge and earnest of those rivers of pleasure which run at God's right hand for evermore.

—Watson, 1696.

3. Is a duty of the Christian life.

(3037.) Christ takes no more delight to dwell in a sad heart, than we do to live in a dark house. Therefore, let in the light which sheds its beams upon thee from the promise, or else thy sweet Saviour will be gone.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3038.) I desire the dejected Christian to consider, that by his heavy and uncomfortable life, he seemeth to the world to accuse God and His service, as if he openly called Him a rigorous, hard unacceptable Master, and His work a sad unpleasant thing. I know this is not your thoughts: I know it is yourselves, and not God and His service that offendeth you; and that you walk heavily not because you are holy, but because you fear you are not holy, and because you are no more holy. I know it is not of grace, but for grace that you complain. But do you not give too great occasion to ignorant spectators to judge otherwise? If you see a servant always sad, that was wont to be merry while he served another master, will you not think that he hath a master that displeaseth him? If you see a woman live in continual heaviness ever since she was married, that lived merrily before, will you not think that she hath met with an displeasing match? You are born and new born for God's honour; and will you thus dishonour Him before the world? What do you (in their eyes) but dispraise Him by your very countenance and carriage, while you walk before Him in so much heaviness? The child that still cries when you put on his shoes doth signify that they pinch him, and he dispraiseth his meat that makes a sour face at it, and he dispraiseth his friend that is always sad and troubled in his company. He that should say of God, "Thou art bad, or cruel, and unmerciful," should blaspheme. And so would he that saith of holiness, "It is a bad, unpleasant, hurtful state." How then dare you do that which is so like to such blaspheming, when you should abstain from all appearance of evil?

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(3039.) Much harm has been done by the idea that a certain gloom, and a restriction of the lively emotions, bear some relation to piety. These bear the same relation to it that rust does to the sword-blade—they eat into it. The command, "Be sober," does not mean, be unmirthful.

—Becher.

4. Its beauty.

(3040.) As sincerity is the soul of all graces and duties, so this delight is the lustre and embroidery of them.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

5. Its transforming power.

(3041.) Joy is not a fancy, or bred of conceit; but is rational, and ariseth from the feeling of some good, viz., the sense of God's love and favour. Joy is so real a thing, that it makes a sudden change in a person; it turns mourning into melody. As in the spring-time, when the sun comes to our horizon, it makes a sudden alteration in the face of the universe,—the birds sing, the flowers appear, the fig-tree puts forth her green figs; everything seems to rejoice and put off its mourning, as being revived with the sweet influence of the sun; so, when the Sun of Righteousness ariseth on the soul, it makes a sudden alteration, and the soul is infinitely rejoiced with the golden beams of God's love.

—Watson, 1696.

6. Should be continuous.

(3042.) Rejoice in God, "although the fig-tree blossom not," &c. (Hab. iii. 17, 18). Yea, rejoice in these hardest things as His doings. A heart rejoicing in His delights in all His will, and is surely providing for the most firm joy in all estates. For if nothing can come to pass besides or against His will, then cannot that soul be vexed that delights in Him, and has no will but His, but follows Him at all times; not only when He shines bright on them, but when they are clouded. That flower that follows the sun, does so even in cloudy days; when it does not shine forth, yet it follows the hidden course and motion of it: so the soul that moves after God keeps that course when He hides His face, is content, yea, is glad at His will in all estates, or conditions, or events.

—Laghton, 1611-1684.

7. Its hindrances.

(3043.) The reason why many poor souls have so little heat of joy in their hearts, is that they have so little light of gospel knowledge in their mind. The further a soul stands from the light of truth, the further he must needs be from the heat of comfort.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3044.) Having once closed with Christ, thy guilt is gone, and this spoiled thy mirth before; all your dancing of a child will not make it quiet if a pin pricks it; well, now the pin of guilt is taken out, that robbed thee of the joy of life.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3045.) It is only where there is much faith and consequent love that there is much joy. Let us search our own hearts. If there is but little heat around the bulb of the thermometer, no wonder that the mercury marks but a low degree. If there is but small faith, there will not be much gladness. The road into Giant Despair's castle is through doubt, which doubt comes from an absence, a sinful absence, in our own experience, of the felt presence of God, and the felt force of the verities of His Gospel.

—Maclaren.

8. Mistakes concerning it:

(1.) It is not necessarily an immediate effect of conversion.

(3046.) There be many persons who suppose, because Christianity is joy-producing, that when they become Christians they will necessarily be joyful. They suppose that they are to take it as they would nitrous oxide gas, and that when they have sucked it in awhile, they will begin to experience the inspiration of joy, that they will be lifted up, and that they will feel delightfully. There are those who suppose that there is a divine magnificent intoxication which God gives to the souls of His children; and that when the flash strikes them they will break forth into rejoicings, and say, "Joy!" "Glory!" "Hallelujah!" "How happy I am!" There are some who have such an experience; but how long does it last? How quick does the sudden blaze become sudden ashes!

—Becher.

(2.) It will not be experienced or continued unless the conditions of joy are fulfilled.

(3047.) When you look at the actual lives of Christians—even of those who strive to live in accordance with the innermost meaning of the term disciples of Christ, do you find joy? I do not think that you find it in any such measure as to characterise them and discriminate them from other people. Was there, then, an impossible thing commanded? Was that commanded which could not take place? I think not.

Our florists make up packages of seeds, and send out for a dollar thirty kinds, or for two dollars eighty kinds; there are directions that go with them; and every package is labeled, "Gorgeous purple," "Exceedingly beautiful," "Remarkably fine," and so on, referring to the flowers. Now, let these seeds go into the hands of some clumsy person who perhaps has raised corn and potatoes, but who has never raised flowers; and let him plant them in cold, wet, barren soil, and at an untimely season. A few of them will sprout, and will come slowly up, pale and spindling, and will be neglected, and the weeds will overrun them; and when the time for blossoming comes there will be found here and there a scrawny plant with one or two stinky blossoms, and men will say, "Now we see the outcome of this pretence. Look at the labels on the specimens. It is all humbug. The man says, 'Gorgeous purple.' Here is what he calls gorgeous purple! He says, 'Exceedingly beautiful.' That is his idea of beauty! He says, 'Remarkably fine.' That is remarkably fine, is it?" So they go through the whole catalogue, and say, "There was the promise, and here is the fulfilment!"

But do you not perceive that the way in which you use the seed, the manner in which you plant it, the skill that you exercise in preparing the soil to receive it, and the season that you have to plant it in, have much to do with its successful growth? There are a hundred circumstances which will have a great deal to do in determining what you will actually get. It is true that beautiful plants might have been produced from those seeds. They were deserving of all the praise that was bestowed upon them. There was no deception practised concerning them. They might have been just what they were represented to be. But they were not what they might have been, for want of knowledge, for want of skill, and for want of the right adaptation of conditions to ends.

—Becher.

(3048.) While, on the one hand, there is no more certain means of enjoying God than of humbly seeking to walk in the ways of His commandments, on the other hand, there is nothing more evanescent in its nature than the emotion of religious joy, faith, or the like, unless it be turned into a spring of action for God. Such emotions, like photographs, vanish from the heart unless they be fixed. Work for God is the way to fix them. Joy in God is the strength of work for God, but work for God is the perpetuation of joy in God.

—MacLaren.

(3.) Like all other feelings, it is not unintermittent.

(3049.) Mark the same people that usually have the highest joys, and see whether at other times they have not the greatest troubles. This week they are as at the gates of heaven, and the next as at the doors of hell: I am sure, with many it is so. Yet it need not be so, if Christians would but look at these high joys as duties to be endeavoured, and mercies to be valued; but when they will needs judge of their state by them, and think that God is gone from them or forsaken them, when they have not such joys, then it leaves them in terror and amazement. Like men after a flash of lightning, that are left more sensible of the darkness. For no wise man can expect that such joys should be a Christian's ordinary state; or God should so diet us with a continual feast. It would neither suit with our health, nor the condition of this pilgrimage. Live, therefore, on your peace of conscience as your ordinary diet; when this is wanting, know that God appointeth you a fast for your health; and when you have a feast of high joys, feed on it and be thankful; but when they are taken from you, gape not after them as the disciples did after Christ at His ascension; but return thankfully to your ordinary diet of peace. And remember that these joys, which are now taken from you, may so return again. However, there is a place preparing for you, where your joys shall be full.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(3050.) There is a certain experience of joy narrated that I think is mischievous. I sometimes hear men speak in the most indiscriminating way in meetings (I do not mean in our own), where they say, "I used to be very unhappy, but since God shone on my soul, I have not seen a cloud. All day long, from morning till night, and from day to day, I am in an empyrean of joy." I do not believe it, in the first place. A man might just as well say to me, "I had my violin tuned fifty years ago, and it is in as good order now as it was then, and there has not been a string touched since." I do not believe it. I do not believe a cat-gut was ever made that did not shrink and lengthen by the stress of weather. If a man tells me that he has an uninterrupted and uniform experience of joy, I do not believe him. If he says he has come into a high state of joy, I am not disposed to doubt that; but however high that state of joy may be, it must have gradations, sometimes flaming up into glorious light and admirable beauty, at other times lingering in twilight, and at other times going out in darkness, so that for a period there is a total abstinence from joy. That is the normal, and that is the necessary experience of joy, where it is wholesome.

—Becher.

(4.) Perfect joy is not to be expected on earth.

(3051.) As gold keeps the name in the leaf as well as in the wedge, in the coin as in the bullion; or as he that sees a beam or two shine through the crevice of a wall may say he sees the sun shine, as well as he that walks abroad: so neither are we so destitute of all comfort, as because the earth is not our heaven, to make it therefore our hell; but we may say there is a leaf of joy, the tin-foil of it here in this life, some few glimpses that shine in upon us. As for the full, the solid, the jubilating joy, it must not be looked for in this valley of tears. There is joy, but not here; true joy, but not yet. Tarry till the harvest we must, but then we shall reap in joy, when heaven is our dwelling, the angels our partners, incorruption our change, immortality our garment. The earth is not the place for such joy, nor dull flesh the subject of it.

—Drupps, 1588-1662.

9. Christian joy is heaven begun.

(3052.) The joy, and the sense of salvation, which the pure in heart have here, is not a joy severed from the joy of heaven, but a joy that begins in us here, and continues, and accompanies us thither, and there flows on, and dilates itself to an infinite expansion (as, if you should touch one corn of powder in a train, and that train should carry fire into a whole city, from the beginning it was one and the same fire), though the fulness of glory thereof be reserved to that which is expressed in the promise, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God!"

—Donne, 1573-1631.

(3053.) The noblest spirits are those which turn to heaven, not in the hour of sorrow but in that of joy; like the lark, they wait for the clouds to disperse, that they may soar up into their native element.

—Jean Paul Richter.

JUDGMENT. THE DAY OF.

1. Its terrors.

(3054.) In final and extreme events, the multitude of sufferers does not lessen but increase the sufferings; and when the first day of judgment happened, that (I mean) of the universal deluge of waters on the old world, the calamity swelled like the flood, and every man saw his friend perish, and the neighbours of his dwelling, and the relatives of his house, and the sharers of his joys, and yesterday's bride, and the new-born heir, the priest of the family, and the honour of the kindred, all dying or dead, drenched in water and the Divine vengeance; and then they had no place to flee unto, no man cared for their souls; they had none to go unto for counsel, no sanctuary high enough to keep them from the vengeance that rained down from heaven; and so it shall be at the Day of Judgment, when that world and this, and all that shall be born hereafter, shall pass through the same Red Sea, and be all baptized with the same fire, and be involved in the same cloud, in which shall be thunderings and terrors infinite; every man's fear shall be increased by his neighbour's shrieks, and the amazement that all the world shall be in shall unite as the sparks of a raging furnace into a globe of fire, and shall roll on its own principle, and increase by direct appearances and intolerable reflections. He that stands in a churchyard in the time of a great plague, and hears the passing-bell perpetually telling the sad stories of death, and sees crowds of infected bodies pressing to their graves, and others sick and tremulous, and death dressed up in all the images of sorrow round about him, is not supported in his spirit by the variety of his sorrow: and at Doomsday, when the terrors are universal, besides that it is in itself so much greater, because it can affright the whole world, it is also made greater by communication and a sorrowful influence; grief being then strongly infectious, when there is no variety of state, but an entire kingdom of fear; and amazement is king of all our passions, and all the world its subjects; and that shriek must needs be terrible, when millions of men and women, at the same instant, shall fearfully cry out, and the noise shall mingle with the trumpet of the archangel, with the thunders of the dying and groaning heavens, and the crack of the dissolving world, when the whole fabric of creation shall shake into dissolution and eternal ashes.

—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

2. Its disclosures.

(3055.) "The iniquity of Ephraim is bound up, their sin is hid." Not that his sin was hid from God, but his sin is hid; that is, it is recorded, it is laid up against a day of reckoning. That this is the meaning, is clear by the foregoing words, his iniquity is bound up: as the clerk of the assizes binds up the indictments of malefactors in a bundle, and at the assizes brings out the indictments, and reads them in court, so God binds up men's sins in a bundle, and, at the Day of Judgment, this bundle shall be opened, and all their sins brought to light before men and angels.

—Watson, 1696.

3. Our motives will determine our destiny.

(3056.) If we had eyes adapted to the sight, we should see, on looking into the smallest seed, the future flower or shrub or tree enclosed in it. God will look into our feelings and motives as into seeds; by those embryos of action He will infallibly determine what we are, and will show what we should have been, had there been scope and stage for their development and maturity. Nothing will be made light of. The very dust of the balances shall be taken into account. It is in the moral world, as it is in the natural, where every substance weighs something; though we speak of imponderable bodies, yet nature knows nothing of positive levity; and were men possessed of the necessary scales, the requisite instrument, we should find the same holds true in the moral world. Nothing is insignificant on which sin has breathed the breath of hell: everything is important in which holiness has impressed itself in the faintest characters. And accordingly "there is nothing covered that shall not be revealed; and hid that shall not be known." However unimportant now, in the estimation of man, yet, when placed in the light of the Divine countenance, like the atom in the sun's rays, it shall be found deserving attention; and as the minutest molecule of matter contains all the primordial elements of a world, so the least atom of that mind shall be found to include in it the essential elements of heaven.

—Harris, 1804-1856.

4. The law by which we shall be judged.

(3057.) Our sentence is already passed by the law. "The word that I have spoken, the same shall judge you in the last day." A man that is to be examined and tried for life and death, would fain know how it would speed with him, and how matters shall be carried beforehand. God will not deal with you by way of surprise; He hath plainly told you according to what rule He will proceed. The sentence on our state, be it a good or evil one, is already passed. (See John iii. 18, Rom. viii. 1.)

—Salter.

8. Its present moral influence.

(3058.) The Romans, when the fear of Carthage, that aspired to a superiority in empire, was removed, presently degenerated from military valour and civil virtues into softness and luxury. So if men were absolved from the fear of judgment to come, no restraint would be strong enough to bridle the impetuous resolutions of his depraved will.

(3059.) Whether I eat or drink, or in whatever other action or employment I am engaged, that solemn voice always seems to sound in my ears, "Arise, ye dead, and come to judgment." As often as I think of the Day of judgment, my heart quakes, and my whole frame trembles. If I am to indulge in any of the pleasures of the present life, I am resolved to do it in such a way that the solemn realities of the future judgment may never be banished from my recollection. —St. Jerome, 340-420.

6. Why men are indifferent with regard to it.

(3060.) An object in itself great, and which we know to be so, will appear small to us if we view it from a distance. The stars, for example, in our view, are but as little specks or points of light; and the tip of a finger, if held very near to the eye, is sufficient to hide from us the whole body of the sun. Distance of time has an effect upon us, in its kind, similar to distance of space. It diminishes in our mind the idea of what we are assured is, in its own nature, of great magnitude and importance. If any of us were informed that we should certainly die before this day closes, what a sudden and powerful change would take place in our thoughts! That we all must die, is a truth, of which we are no less certain, than that we are now alive. But because it is possible that we may not die to-day, or to-morrow, or this year, or for several years to come, we are often little more affected by the thoughts of death, than if we expected to live here for ever. In like manner, if you receive the Scripture as a Divine revelation, I need offer you no other proof, that there is a day, a great day, approaching, which will put an end to the present state of things, and introduce a state unchangeable and eternal. Then the Lord will descend with a shout, with the voice of an archangel, and with the trump of God. The earth and all its works will be burnt up. The great Judge will appear, the tribunal be fixed, the books opened, and all the human race must give an account of themselves to God, and, according to His righteous award; be happy or miserable in a degree beyond expression or conception, and that for ever.

If we were infallibly assured that this tremendous scene would open upon us to-morrow; or if, while I am speaking, we should be startled with the signs of our Lord's coming in the air, what confusion and alarm would overspread the congregation! Yet, if the Scripture be true, the hour is approaching when we must all be spectators of this solemn event, and parties nearly interested in it. But because it is at a distance, we can hear of it, speak of it, and profess to expect it, with a coolness almost equal to indifference. —Newton, 1725-1807.

7. Not the less certain because unexpected.

(3061.) It will be unexpected: every judgment coming of Christ is as the springing of a mine. There is a moment of deep suspense after the match has been applied to the fuse which is to fire the train. Men stand at a distance, and hold their breath. There is nothing seen but a thin, small column of white smoke, rising fainter, and fainter, till it seems to die away. Then men breathe again: and the inexperienced soldier would approach the place thinking that the thing has been a failure. It is only faith in the experience of the commander, or the veterans, which keeps men from hurrying to the spot again—till just when expectation has begun to die away, the low, deep thunder sends up the column of earth majestically to heaven, and all that was on it comes crushing down again in its far circle, shattered and blackened with the blast.

It is so with the world. By God's word the world is doomed. The moment of suspense is past: the first centuries in which men expected the convulsion to take place at once; for even apostles were looking for it in their lifetime. We have fallen upon days of scepticism. There are no signs of ruin yet. We tread upon it like a solid thing fortified by its adamant hills for ever. There is nothing against that, but a few words in a printed book. But the world is mined: and the spark has fallen; and just at the moment when serenity is at its height, "the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat," and the feet of the Avenger shall stand on the earth.

—Robertson, 1816-1853.

8. Importance of preparation for it.

(3062.) The uncertainty of this day bespeaks our preparedness. When the disciples asked Christ concerning the sign of His coming (Luke xxi. 7), He answers them with a how, not with a when. He describes the manner, but conceals the time: such signs shall go before. He does not determine the day when the judgment shall come after. Only He cautions them, with a "Take heed, lest that day come upon you unawares: for as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the earth" (vers. 34, 35). The bird little thinks of the snare of the fowler, nor the beast of the hunter; this fearlessly rangeth through the woods, the other merrily cuts the air: both follow their unsuspected liberty, both are lost in unprevented ruin. Against public enemies we fortify our coasts; against private thieves we bar our doors, and shall we not against the irremediable fatality of this day prepare our souls? It is favour enough that the Lord hath given us warning: the day is sudden, the warning is not sudden. The old world had the precaution of six-score years, and that (we cannot deny) was long enough; but we have had the prediction of Christ and His apostles of above fifteen hundred years' standing; besides the daily sound of those evangelical trumpets, that tell us of that archangelical trumpet in their pulpits. When we hear the thunder, in a dark night on our beds, we fear the lightning. Our Saviour's gospel, premonishing of this day, is like thunder; if it cannot wake us from our sins, the judgment shall come upon us like lightning, to our utter destruction. But I will thank the Lord for giving me warning (Ps. xvi. 7). The thunder first breaks the cloud, and makes way for the lightning, yet the lightning first invades our sense. All sermons, upon this argument of the last day, are thunder-claps; yet such is the security of the world, that the sons of thunder cannot wake them, till the Father of lightning consume them. Thou hast given a sign to them that fear Thee, that they may flee from the face of the bow, saith that royal prophet. The huntsman doth not threaten the deer, or terrify him; but watches him at a stand, and shoots him. But God speaks before He shoots; takes the bow in His hand and shows it us before He puts in the arrow to wound us.

St. Gregory hath a meditation, which, by way of similitude, doth well express this point:—Mariners have made their voyage, and are returning home; when on a sudden the winds rise, and the seas begin to be troubled. First they are set upon with lighter waves, then with fiercer billows: then little balls of fire are seen rolling on the face of the waters: now they labour with all their powers, and unlade the vessel of those precious merchandise, for which they made their unhappy voyage. But still the inexorable rage of the sea ceaseth not, till it hath swallowed the ship: some sink with it, and others by help of a little bark get to shore. We are all put into the vessel of mortality; and all those signs preceding the Day of Judgment, are so many successive waves prognosticating this universal shipwreck. And now worldlings would throw overboard their unblest traffic; the covetous despiseth his riches, the voluptuous his pleasures, the ambitious his honours; they have ventured all their life for those sins, and now they would be rid of that venture with all their hearts. The main storm comes, the earth trembles, the ocean roars, the elements melt, the heavens dissolve, the huge fabric of the whole world perisheth. Those that have put all their fortunes and estate in that one uncertain vessel must perish with it: but the children of grace have a little pinance, the Church of Christ; and this carries them safe through the fire, as Noah's ark bore him through the water, and lands them in heaven, where they are welcomed home with songs of triumph.

(3063.) The Day of Judgment is remote, thy day of judgment is at hand, and as thou goest out in particular, so thou shalt be found in the general. Thy passing-bell and the archangel's trumpet have both one sound to thee. In the same condition that thy soul leaves thy body, shall thy body be found of thy soul. Thou canst not pass from thy death-bed a sinner, and appear at the great assizes a saint. Both in thy private sessions, and the universal assizes, thou shalt be sure of the same Judge, the same jury, the same witnesses, the same verdict. How certain thou art to die, thou knowest; how soon to die, thou knowest not. Measure not thy life with the longest; that were to piece it out with flattery. Thou canst name no living man, not the sickest, which thou art sure shall die before thee. Daily we follow the dead to their graves, and in those graves we bury the remembrance of our own death with them. Here drops an old man, and there a child; here an aged matron, there a young virgin: with mourning eyes we attend them to their funerals, yet before we lay the rosemary out of our hands, the thought of death hath vanished from our hearts. When a hog lies bound under the knife to be killed, he makes a hideous cry above any other creature: hereupon the other swine come running in, and they grunt, and whine, and keep a fearful noise; but as soon as the dying beast hath ceased, they also are silent, and return to the filthy mire as carelessly as if no harm had been done. When we lose a neighbour, a friend, a brother, we weep, and howl, and lament, as if, with Rachel, we could never be comforted; but the body once interred, and the funeral ceremonies ended, if we do not stay to inquire for some legacies, we run back with all possible haste to our former sins and turpitudes, as if there had been no such matter. Alas! that the farthest end of all our thoughts should be the thought of our ends! Death is but our apprehension, like the taking of a malefactor; but it sends us to the session, and that either to forgiveness or execution. Oh then, let us repent in life, that we may find comfort in death, and be acquitted at the Day of Judgment by Jesus Christ.

—Adams, 1653.

(3064.) Men dealing in the world for riches, are but like scholars playing at dice for counters, which come and go; now the heap is on this side, by and by on that: on a sudden comes in the master, and he seizes all, both dice and counters; not without some just correction of the gamblers. Some men tug, and scramble, and wrangle for these paltry vanities, wealth and honours: this fountain dries, that cistern fills; one noble house withers, while another of low degree swells up to a lord: to-day this merchant hath the cash, to-morrow that; but the Lord's day confiscates all, and then who is the richer man? This world is like a broad table with a scant of narrow table-cloth; which every man is still drawing to his own side, though he pluck his neighbour's part from him: this day comes with a fatal voider, and takes away all, cloth, meat, table, and guests too. Thus far together, all are served alike; but then comes the difference. All men hope well, and think themselves good; but let me tell them of this day, as Moses did those rebellious Levites, "To-morrow the Lord will show who are His, and who are holy" (Numb. xvi. 5). A common hen, together with her own eggs, may hatch the eggs of eagles that are laid under her; but when they are grown up, while her own brood keep the base earth, those of a higher kind fly upwards. This world breeds us all, and is both to good and bad a common mother; but when that great day of separation comes, all they that are begotten of immortal seed shall leave their mother, and take after their Father; and while their kindred in the flesh sink down under their natural corruptions, these eagles that are sprung from above, shall mount up to the eternal nest of glory.

—Adams, 1653.

(3065.) We should make preparations to meet Him, because when we are brought before Him it will be too late to do what is necessary to be done. The path up to the judgment-seat is not a way of preparation; nor at His bar is it a place to prepare for eternity. It is no time to prepare for battle when the enemy is in the camp; no time to make ready to meet a foe when he has broken open your door. There is such a thing as putting off preparation until it is too late. A man may neglect the care of his health, until it is too late. A student may suffer the proper time to prepare for a profession to glide away, until it is too late. A farmer may neglect to plough and sow, until it is too late. A man on a rapid stream near a cataract may neglect to make efforts to reach the shore, until it is too late. And so in religion. It is easy to put it off from childhood to youth; from youth to manhood; from manhood to old age, until it shall be too late. Beyond that interview with God, there is no preparation. Your eternity is not to be made up of a series of successive probations, where, though you fall in one, you may avail yourself of another.

—Barnes, 1798-1870.

(3066.) We should make preparation, because we go there on a very solemn errand. We go there not as idle spectators; not to behold the glory of the Divine dwelling and throne; not as we often travel to other lands to see the works of nature, or the monuments of art; but we go on the final trial, and with reference to the irreversible doom of the soul. A man who is soon to be put on trial for his life feels that much must be done with reference to that important day in his existence; and makes the preparation accordingly. Everything about the kind of testimony on which he can rely; everything in the law, in the character of the judge and of the jury, becomes to him a matter of moment, and he looks it all over with most anxious solicitude. He who should have the prospect of such a trial before him, and who should evince the same unconcern on these points which the mass of men do in reference to their trial before God, would be regarded as a fool or a madman. Should we go into his cell and find him engaged in blowing up bubbles, or in some other trifling employment, manifesting the utmost indifference to all that we could say of the character of the judge or jury, or to the importance of being prepared for the arraignment, we should regard him as bereft of the characteristics of a rational being. On the issue of that interview with God depends everything that is dear to us hereafter. There will not be a moment in all that boundless eternity before us which will not be affected by the results of that day's investigation. To us it will be the most solemn moment of our existence—a period to be remembered in all the days of our future being—as it should be anticipated with anxious solicitude in all the days that precede it.

—Barnes, 1798-1870.

KNOWLEDGE.

1. SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS.

1. Is founded in faith.

(3067.) All knowledge, of whatsoever kind, must have a twofold groundwork of faith,—one subjectively, in our own faculties, and the laws which govern them:—the other objectively, in the matter submitted to our observations. We must believe in the being who knows, and in that which is known: knowledge is the copula of these two acts. Even scepticism must have the former. Its misfortune and blunder is, that it will keep standing on one leg; and so can never get a firm footing. We must stand on both before we can walk, although the former act is often the more difficult.

—Guesses at Truth.

2. The desire of knowledge.

(1.) Is natural.

less neither architecture nor fortification; we cross seas only to view nature in nakedness, or magnificence in ruins; we are equally allured by novelty of every kind, by a desert or a palace, a cataract or a cavern, by everything rude and everything polished, everything great and everything little; we do not see a thicket but with some temptation to enter it, nor remark an insect flying before us but with an inclination to pursue it.

This passion is, perhaps, regularly heightened in proportion as the powers of the mind are elevated and enlarged.

—Dr. S. Johnson, 1709-1784.

(2.) Is insatiable.

(3069.) The desire of knowledge, like the thirst of riches, increases ever with the acquisition of it.

—Sterne, 1713-1768.

(3070.) Knowledge always desires increase; it is like fire, which must first be kindled by some external agent, but which will afterwards propagate itself.

—Dr. S. Johnson, 1709-1784.

3. How it may be best acquired.

(3071.) They who would advance in knowledge should lay down this as a fundamental rule, not to take words for things.

—Locke, 1632-1704.

(3072.) The best way of acquiring most branches of knowledge is to study them, if possible, for some specific object or occasion. This will supply the curiosity with a powerful stimulus, and communicate to the search a practical character essentially beneficial.

—W. B. Clairmont.

(3073.) In the pursuit of knowledge, follow it wherever it is to be found; like fern it is the produce of all climates, and like coin, its circulation is not restricted to any particular class. We are ignorant in youth, from idleness, and we continue so in manhood from pride; for pride is less ashamed of being ignorant, than of being instructed, and she looks too high to find that which very often lies beneath her. Therefore condescend to men of low estate, and be for wisdom that which Alcibiades was for power. He that rings only one bell will hear only one sound; and he that lives only with one class will see but one scene of the great drama of life. Mr. Locke was asked how he had contrived to accumulate a mine of knowledge so rich, yet so extensive and so deep: he replied, that he attributed what little he knew, to the not having been ashamed to ask for information; and to the rule he had laid down, of conversing with all descriptions of men, on those topics chiefly that formed their own peculiar professions or pursuits. I myself have heard a common blacksmith eloquent, when welding of iron has been the theme; for what we know thoroughly, we can usually express clearly, since ideas will supply words, but words will not always supply ideas. Therefore when I meet with any that write obscurely, or converse confusedly, I am apt to suspect two things; first, that such persons do not understand themselves; and, secondly, that they are not worthy of being understood by others.

—Colton, 1832.

4. If too easily gained, is soon lost.

(3074.) In common life a remark has become obvious, that the fortune which is bequeathed or acquired at an easy rate, is more likely to be dissipated than the fruits of laborious industry. It is so likewise in learning. Ideas collected without any great effort, make but a slight impression on the memory or the imagination. The reflection, that they may be recalled at pleasure, prevents any solicitude to preserve them. But the remembrance, that the degree of knowledge already acquired has cost us dearly, enhances its value, and excites every precaution to prevent it from being lost. I would compare the learning acquired by the facilitating aids of modern invention, to the vegetables raised in a hot bed; which, whatever size or beauty they may attain in a short time, never acquire that firmness and durable perfection, which is gradually collected by the slow process of unassisted nature.

Knorr, 1831.

5. How it is to be valued.

(3075.) Knowledge is to be valued (as all creatures are) according to its usefulness. As it is more honourable to know how to govern a kingdom, command an army or navy, or save men's lives, than to make a fiddle or a hobby-horse; so it is ten thousandfold more honourable, to know how to order our hearts and lives, and to walk with God, and obtain the everlasting glory, than to know how to get riches, and pleasures, and vain glory of the present world.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(3076.) As a pound of gold more enricheth than many loads of dirt, so a little knowledge of great and necessary matters maketh one wiser than a great deal of pedantic, toyish learning. No man hath time and capacity for all things: he is but a proud fool, that would seem to know all, and deny his ignorance in many things.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(3077.) What good will it do a man tormented with the gout, or stone, or by miserable poverty, to know the names of various herbs, or to read the titles of the apothecaries' boxes, or to read on a sign-post, "Here is a good ordinary"? And what good will it do a carnal, unsanctified soul that must be in hell for ever, to know the Hebrew roots or points, or to discourse of "Cartesius's Materia Subtilis," and "Globuli Ætheriei," &c.? Or of "Epicurus and Gassendus Atoms," or to look on the planets in Galileus' glasses, while he casteth away all his hopes of heaven by his unbelief, and his preferring the pleasures of the flesh? Will it comfort a man that is cast out of God's presence, and condemned to utter darkness, to remember that he was once a good mathematician, or logician, or musician, or that he had wit to get riches and preferments in the world, and to climb up to the height of honour and dominion? It is a pitiful thing to hear a man boast of his wit, while he is wadly rejecting the only felicity, forsaking God, esteeming vanity, and damning his soul: the Lord deliver us from such wit and learning!

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(3078.) To avoid mistakes and cavils, remember, that I take no true knowledge as contemptible. And when I truly say that he knoweth nothing as he ought to know, that doth not know and love his God, and is not wise to his duty and salvation, yet if this fundamental knowledge be presupposed, we should build all other useful knowledge on it to the utmost of our capacity: and from this one stock may spring and spread a thousand branches, which may all bear fruit. I would put no limit to a Christian's desires and endeavours to know, but that he desire to know only useful and revealed things. Every degree of knowledge tendeth to more: and every known fruit befriendeth others; and like fire, tendeth to the spreading of our knowledge, to all neighbour truths that are intelligible. And the want of acquaintance with some one truth among a hundred, may hinder us from rightly knowing most of the rest, or may breed a hundred errors in us. As the absence of one wheel or particle in a watch, or the ignorance of it, may put all the rest into a useless disorder. What if I say that wisdom lieth more in knowing the things that belong to salvation, to public good, to life, health and solid comfort, than in knowing how to sing, or play on the lute, or to speak or carry ourselves with commendable decency, &c. It doth not follow that all these are of no worth at all; and that in their places these little matters may not be allowed and desired: for even hair and nails are appurtenances of a man, which a wise man would not be without; though they are small matters in comparison of the animal, vital, and nobler parts. And indeed he that can see God in all things and hath all this sanctified by the love of God, should above all men value each particle of knowledge, of which so holy a use may be made; as we value every grain of gold.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

6. Should be the object of life-long pursuit.

(3079.) He that would make a real progress in knowledge must dedicate his age as well as youth—the latter growth as well as the first-fruits—at the altar of truth.

—Berkeley, 1684-1753.

(3080.) It is no more possible for an idle man to keep together a certain stock of knowledge, than it is possible to keep together a stock of ice exposed to the meridian sun. Every day destroys a fact, a relation, or an inference; and the only way of preserving the bulk and value of the pile is by constantly adding to it.

—Sydney Smith.

7. Is continually enlarging.

(3081.) In a seeing age, the very knowledge of former times passes but for ignorance in a better dress.

—South, 1633-1716.

8. Yet at the best is very limited.

(3082.) There is not so contemptible a plant or animal that does not confound the most enlarged understanding.

—Locke, 1632-1704.

9. "A little knowledge is a dangerous thing."

(3083.) Pride and self-conceitness is like the barm in the drink that seems to fill up the vessel, but indeed works it all over: this is the knowledge that puffeth up (2 Cor. viii. 1), like the pot that by boiling seemeth to be filled, that was half empty before, but it is empty in the bottom, and presently boils over, and is emptier than before. So is it with the self-conceited, that have a superficial knowledge, while they are empty at the bottom, and by the heat of pride, that little they have boileth over to their loss.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(3084.) Though in some sensible matters it is easy to convince men of a total ignorance, yet when they know anything, it is hard to convince them what more is to be known, and to keep them from false and hasty conclusions. A man that cannot read at all is easily convinced that he cannot read; but he that can read a little, is apt to think that he readeth rightly when he doth not. A man that never heard of physic is easily convinced that he hath no skill in it; but if he have read, heard of, and tried a few medicines, he is apt to grow conceited and venture men's lives upon his skill. A man that never saw building, navigation, or any art or manufacture, is easily convinced that he is ignorant of it; but if he have got some smattering knowledge, he is ready to think that it is more than it is, because he knoweth not what he wants.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(3085.) Some men, of whom I wish to speak with great respect, are haunted, as it seems to me, with an unreasonable fear of what they call superficial knowledge. Knowledge, they say, which really deserves the name, is a great blessing to mankind, the ally of virtue, the harbinger of freedom. But such knowledge must be profound. A crowd of people who have a smattering of mathematics, a smattering of astronomy, a smattering of chemistry, who have read a little poetry and a little history, is dangerous to the commonwealth. Such half-knowledge is worse than ignorance. And then the authority of Pope is vouched: Drink deep, or taste not; shallow draughts intoxicate: drink largely; and that will sober you. I must confess that the danger which alarms these gentlemen never seemed to me very serious; and my reason is this: that I never could prevail on any person who pronounced superficial knowledge a curse and profound knowledge a blessing to tell me what was his standard of profundity. The argument proceeds on the supposition that there is some line between profound and superficial knowledge similar to that which separates truth from falsehood. I know of no such line. When we talk of men of deep science, do we mean that they have got to the bottom or near the bottom of science? Do we mean that they know all that is capable of being known? Do we mean even that they know in their own especial department all that the smatterers of the next generation will know? Why, if we compare the little truth that we know with the infinite mass of truth which we do not know, we are all shallow together; and the greatest philosophers that ever lived would be the first to confess their shallowness. If we could call up the first of human beings, if we could call up Newton, and ask him whether, even in those sciences in which he had no rival, he considered himself as profoundly knowing, he would have told us that he was but a smatterer like ourselves, and that the difference between his knowledge and ours vanished when compared with the quantity of truth still undiscovered, just as the distance between a person at the foot of Ben Lomond and at the top of Ben Lomond vanishes when compared with the distance of the fixed stars.

—Macaulay, 1800-1859.

10. Why it should be sought.

(3086.) The mistaking or misplacing of the last or farthest end of knowledge is the greatest error of all the rest: For men have entered into a desire of learning and knowledge, sometimes upon a natural curiosity and inquisitive appetite; sometimes to entertain their minds with variety and delight; sometimes for ornament and reputation: and sometimes to enable them to obtain the victory of wit and contradiction; and most times for lucre and profession;—but seldom sincerely to give a true account of their gift of reason, to the benefit and use of men: As if there were sought in knowledge, a couch whereupon to rest a searching and restless spirit; or a terrace for a wandering and variable mind to walk up and down with a fair prospect; or a tower of state for a proud mind to raise itself upon; or a fort or commanding ground for strife and contention; or a shop for profit or sale;—and not a rich store-house for the glory of the Creator, and the relief of man's estate.

—Bacon, 1560-1626.

(3087.) Seldom was ever any knowledge given to keep, but to impart: the grace of this rich jewel is lost in concealment.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(3088.) [On the sight of a dark lantern.]

There is light, indeed; but so shut up, as if it were not: and when the side is most open, there is light enough to give direction to him that bears it, none to others; he can discern another man, by that light which is cast before him; but another man cannot discern him.

Right such is reserved knowledge: no man is the better for it but the owner. There is no outward difference betwixt concealed skill and ignorance: and when such hidden knowledge will look forth, it casts so sparing a light, as may only argue it to have an unprofitable being; to have ability, without will to do good; power to censure, none to benefit. The suppression or engrossing of those helps, which God would have us to impart, is but a thief's lantern in a true man's hand.

O God, as all our light is from Thee, the Father of Lights, so make me no niggard of that poor rush-candle Thou hast lighted in my soul: make me more happy, in giving light to others, than in receiving it into myself.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

11. An important caution for those engaged in its pursuit.

(3089.) The knowledge we acquire in this world, I am apt to think, extends not beyond the limits of this life. The beatific vision of the other life needs not the help of this dim twilight; but, be that as it will, I am sure the principal end why we are to get knowledge here, is to make use of it for the benefit of ourselves and others in this world; but if by gaining it we destroy our health, we labour for a thing that will be useless in our hands; and if by harassing our bodies (though with a design to render ourselves more useful) we deprive ourselves of the abilities and opportunities of doing that good we might have done with a meaner talent, which God thought sufficient for us, by having denied us the strength to improve it to that pitch which men of stronger constitutions can attain to, we rob God of so much service, and our neighbour of all that help which in a state of health, with moderate knowledge, we might have been able to perform. He that sinks his vessel by overloading it, though it be with gold and silver and precious stones, will give his owner but an ill account of his voyage.

—Locke, 1632-1704.

12. It makes men humble.

(3090.) It is an empty knowledge, and falsely so called, that puffs up; as the empty ears of corn are pert, and raise up themselves; but those which are big and full, droop and hang down their heads; so it is only ignorance that is proud, and lifts men up; but true knowledge makes men humble.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

II. RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE.

1. In what it consists.

(3091.) I heard two persons on the Wengern Alp talking by the hour together of the names of ferns; not a word about their characteristics, uses, or habits, but a medley of crack-jaw titles, and nothing more. They evidently felt that they were ventilating their botany, and kept each other in countenance by alternate volleys of nonsense. Well, friend, they were about as sensible as those doctrinalists who for ever talk over the technicalities of religion, but know nothing by experience of its spirit and power. Are we not all too apt to amuse ourselves after the same fashion? He who knows mere Linnæan names, but has never seen a flower, is as reliable in botany, as he is in theology who can descant upon supralapsarianism, but has never known the love of Christ in his heart.

"True religion's more than doctrine, Something must be known and felt."

—Spurgeon.

(3092.) Says the apostle, "Add to your faith, or in your faith, virtue; in other words, develop out of your faith virtue—that is, practical godliness; and in your virtue, or from out of your virtue, develop knowledge." By this is not meant, evidently, that knowledge which we gather by our senses—scientific knowledge, ideas, facts; but a higher knowledge—that subtle intuition of truth which men have who live high and noble lives. A man of great conscience has a sense, a knowledge, of principle which is higher than any law or custom can point out. A man who cultivates his taste has a finer sense and knowledge of beauty than a man who does not. A man who dwells largely in figures and mathematics has a sense of numbers and proportions which does not belong to other men. The knowledge which is spoken of here is that knowledge which is in the nature of moral intuition.

—Becher.

2. Is not naturally desired by men.

(3093.) It is the peculiar nature of the inestimable treasure of Christian truth and religious knowledge, that the more it is withheld from people, the less they wish for it; and the more is bestowed upon them, the more they hunger and thirst after it. If people are kept upon a short allowance of food, they are eager to obtain it; if you keep a man thirsty, he will become the more and more thirsty; if he is poor, he is exceedingly anxious to become rich; but if he is left in a state of spiritual destitution, he will, and still more his children, cease to feel it, and cease to care about it. It is the last want men can be trusted (in the first instance) to supply for themselves.

—Whately, 1787-1863.

3. How it is to be acquired.

(1.) By diligent study.

(3094.) Study hard and search diligently and deeply, and that with unwearied patience and delight. Unpleasant studies tire and seldom prosper. Slight running thoughts accomplish little. If any man think that the Spirit is given to save us the labour of hard and long studies, Solomon hath spent so many chapters in calling them to dig, ay, search, labour, wait for wisdom, that if that will not undeceive them, I cannot. They may as well say, that God's blessing is to save the husbandman the labour of ploughing and sowing, and that the Spirit is given to save men the labour of learning to read the Bible, or to hear it, or to think of it, or to pray to God. Whereas the Spirit is given us to provoke and enable us to study hard, and read, and hear, and pray hard, and to prosper us herein.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2.) By systematic and orderly study.

(3095.) In common matters, you can see that you must learn and do things in their due order, or else you will but make fools of yourselves. Will you go to the top of the stairs or ladder without beginning at the lower steps? Will you sow your ground before you manure or plough it? or can you reap before you sow it? Will you ride your colt before you break him? Will you rear a house before you frame it? Or will you teach your children Hebrew and Greek and Latin before they learn English? or to read the hardest books before they learn the easiest? Or can they read before they learn to spell, or know their letters? No more can you learn the difficult controversies in divinity (as about the exposition of obscure prophecies, or doctrinal doubts) till you have taken up before you those many great and necessary truths that lie between. It would make a wise man pity them, and be ashamed to hear them, when young, raw, self-conceited professors will fall into confident expositions of Daniel, the Revelations, or the Canticles, or such like, or into disputes about free-will, or predestination, or about the many controversies of the times, when, alas! they are ignorant of a hundred truths (about the covenants, justification, and the like) which must be known before they can reach the rest!

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(3.) By giving our closest and most constant attention to the most important truths.

(3096.) You must grow into a higher esteem of truths. All this you have to do besides your growing in the number of truths. And I must tell you, that as it was the essentials of Christianity that were the instrumental causes of your first conversion, and more needful and useful to you than ten thousand others, so it is the very same points that you must always live upon, and the confirmation and growth of your souls in these, will be more useful to you than the adding of ten thousand more truths, which yet you know not. And, therefore, take this advice, as you love your peace and growth; neglect not to know more, but bestow many and many hours in labouring to know better the great truths which you have received, for one hour that you bestow in seeking to know more truths which you know not; believe it, this is the safe and thriving way. . . . If you had already a hundred pounds in gold, and not a penny of silver, it will more enrich you to have another purse full of gold, than a purse full of silver. Trading in the richest commodities, is likelier to raise men to greater estates, than trading for matters of a smaller rate. They that go to the Indies for gold and pearls, may be rich if they get but little in quantity; when he may be poor that brings home ships laden with the greatest store of poor commodity. That man that hath a double measure of the knowledge of God in Christ, and the clearest, and deepest, and most effectual apprehensions of the riches of grace and the glory to come, and yet never heard of most of the questions in Scotus, or Ockum, or Aquinas's sums is far richer in knowledge, and a much wiser man, than he that hath those controversies at his finger's ends, and yet hath but half his clearness and solidity of the knowledge of God and Christ, of grace and glory. Those be not the wisest men that can answer most questions; but those that have the fullest intellectual reception of the infinite wisdom. You will confess that he is a wiser man that hath wisdom to get and rule a kingdom, than he that hath wit enough to talk of a hundred trivial matters, which the other is ignorant of. That is the wisest physician that can do most to save men's lives; and not he that can best read a lecture of anatomy, or is readiest in the terms of his art. Knowledge is to be esteemed according to the use of it, and the dignity of its object, and not according to the number and subtlety of notions. And, therefore, I beseech you all, that are young and weak in the faith, take much more pains to grow in the fuller acquaintance with that same faith which you have received, than to be acquainted with smaller controversial truths which you never knew.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

4. Should be ever increasing.

(3097.) Rest not in thy present knowledge; 'tis like thou know'st much to what once thou didst, but thou know'st little to what thou mayest. Some books are learnt at one reading, but the gospel is a mystery that will take up more than thy life-time to understand it. Mysteries are here sown thick; thou diggest where the springs rise faster upon thee, the further thou goest. God tells not all His secrets at once; "here a little and there a little"; "men shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased." The merchant's ship takes not in all her lading at one port, but sails from one to another for it; neither doth the Christian enrich himself with this heavenly treasure all at one time, or in one ordinance. The true lover of learning gives not over his chase and pursuit for a little smattering knowledge he gets, but rather having got the scent how sweet learning is, puts on with fuller cry for what he wants. The true doctor studies harder than the fresh-man, because as he knows more of learning, so by that knowledge he understands his own deficiency better; for the higher he ascends the hill of learning, the more his prospect enlargeth, while the other standing at the bottom, thinks he knows all in his little.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3098.) The tree that does not thrive will soon rot, and the tradesman that does not increase his stock will soon be out at heels, and he that does not improve his knowledge will prove a spiritual bankrupt. And such a wilful darkness which men bring upon themselves by their perversity, is but one step from destruction. The plague of darkness upon the Egyptians did immediately precede the slaying of their first-born, and the destruction of the flower of their militia in the Red Sea.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3099.) Let us increase the knowledge of whole God and whole Christ. View all the perfections of God. Be not only intent upon some of the first magnitude, but on those that seem the lesser sparks, which have an influence one time or other upon the souls and lives of men. He is not worthy of the name of an astronomer, who gazes only upon one or two planets, with a neglect of the rest, which have their particular excellency as well as the other heavenly bodies. As there is nothing in the heavens, so there is nothing in God and Christ but is worthy of our understanding and consideration, and affords matter of instruction and matter of consolation one time or other. Let us not satisfy ourselves with a knowledge of God in the mass; a glance upon a picture never directs you to the discerning the worth and art of it.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3100.) All true knowledge is alluring. The first sight of a mystery is transporting, and also alluring to a further inquiry. "A wise man will hear and will increase learning;" he will arise to more sublime thoughts and discoveries. He will be adding, as in arithmetic, figure to figure till he comes to a just sum, deducing one rule from another till he come to the utmost; as the branch grows from the body of the tree, and one branch from another. It is the nature of all true knowledge to sharpen the mind far more. He that has found a mine will follow the vein till he masters it. The scholar that has a taste of any curious learning will not leave the pursuit till he has pierced into the bowels of it, and by turning over books, and stretching his thoughts, has increased his stock. It is also the nature of spiritual knowledge to put an edge upon the appetite, and open the understanding wider, that it may be filled with more. The voice of it is that of the grave, Give, give.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3101.) We find persons acquainted with the fundamental doctrines of religion, and we are glad. But a year afterwards we converse with them again, and find them just the same. Two years elapse, and we come into contact with them again, but still no progress can be perceived, till at length the sight of them reminds us of a piece of wood-work carved in the form of a tree, rather than a living production of nature; for there are no fresh shoots, nor any new foliage to be seen: on the contrary, the very same modes of speech, the same views and sentiments upon every point, and the same limited sphere of spiritual conception; no enlarged expansion of the inward horizon; not a single addition to the treasury of Christian knowledge.

—Salter.

(3102.) It is melancholy to observe how content certain followers of the Saviour are with the "first principles of the oracles of God." They stop at the alphabet of theology. The barest elements in the glorious science of Christian doctrine are all that they have, and with these, strange to say, they are perfectly satisfied. They look upon the Bible as a shallow, small pond, which they have netted and dragged to such an extent as to have exhausted it of its treasures. Is that a fair representation of God's word? It is rather like the great Atlantic, fathomless in some parts, and containing more than has ever been brought out of it. It is a "mountain of the Lord" whose summit is far from us, whose loftiest heights we have not reached.

"Upward we press, the air is clear,
And the sphere-music heard;
The Lord hath yet more light and truth
To break forth from His word."

However long we may have studied the Scriptures, there is much still for us to discuss. When Michael Angelo was an old man he was found by a cardinal walking in the Coliseum, solitary amidst its ruins. When asked what he was doing, the aged sculptor replied, "I go yet to school, that I may continue to learn." Even so, however advanced in life we may be, there is something for us still to learn in the Coliseum of revelation.

—T. R. Stevenson.

8. Should be reduced to practice.

(3103.) The end of all arts and sciences is the practice of them. And as this is to be confessed in all other arts, so it cannot be denied in divinity and religion, the practice whereof doth in excellency surmount the knowledge and theory, as being the main end whereunto it tends. For to what purpose do men spend their spirits and tire their wits in discerning the light of truth, if they do not use the benefit of it to direct them in all their ways?

Why do they rise betimes to see the sun, if they mean to sit idly still and do nothing, which better suits with palpable and Egyptian darkness?

Why do they with such care and labour heap up these rich treasures of learning and knowledge, if, miser-like, they only look upon them, and never make use of them for the benefit of themselves and others?

Why do they spend their whole lives in sowing the seed, and never reap the crop? Or having brought in the harvest and filled their barns and granaries, what good will all this do them, if they let it there must and mould, and never eat the fruit of their labours?

—Downname, 1642.

(3104.) How vain is their practice who spend all their strength in polemical disputes, to evince error, and find out the truth, if, when they have found it, they will not walk in this light, nor let it be the guide of their lives! Like herein to foolish boys who strive for a ball, which when they have gotten with much sweat, and have no competitor to contend further for it, they cast into a corner with careless neglect; or having fought even unto blood to beat others off a mole-hill, as from a fort of strength, make no further use of it when they have gotten quiet possession.

—Downname, 1642.

(3105.) Hearty obedience will not only show that your religion is deeper than mere opinion, but it will also advance it to a greater purity, and root it more deeply than it was before. A man that hath studied the art of navigation in his closet, may talk of it almost as well as he that hath been at sea; but when he comes to practise it he will find that he is far to seek; but let this man go to sea, and join practice and experience to his theory, and then he may have a knowledge of the right kind. So, if a man that hath only read over military books, would be a true soldier; or a man that hath only studied physic, would be a true physician, what better way is there, than to fall to practice? And so you must, if you would have a religion that shall save your souls, and not only a religion that will furnish you with good opinions and expressions.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(3106.) Knowledge and practice do mutually promote one another. Knowledge prepares and disposeth for practice, and practice is the best way to perfect knowledge in any kind. Mere speculation is a very raw and rude thing in comparison of that true and distinct knowledge which is gotten by practice and experience. The most exact skill in geography is nothing compared with the knowledge of that man, who, besides the speculative part, hath travelled over and carefully viewed the countries he hath read of. The most knowing man in the art and rules of navigation is nobody in comparison of an experienced pilot and seaman. Because knowledge perfected by practice is as much different from mere speculation, as the skill of doing a thing is from being told how a thing is to be done. For men may easily mistake rules, but frequent practice and experience are seldom deceived. Give me a man that constantly does a thing well, and that shall satisfy me that he knows how to do it. That saying of our blessed Saviour, "If any man will do my will, he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself," is a clear determination of this matter, namely, that they understand the will of God best who are most careful to do it. And so likewise the best way to know what God is, is to transcribe His perfection in our lives and actions, to be holy, and just, and good, and merciful as He is.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(3107.) How vain is knowledge without practice! as if one should know a sovereign medicine and not apply it.

—Watson, 1696.

(3108.) What is it to hear one's duty, and not do it? As if a physician write a good prescription but the patient doth not take it.

—Watson, 1696.

(3109.) Many a man's knowledge is a torch to light him to hell. Thou who hast knowledge of God's will, but doth not do it, wherein dost thou excel an hypocrite? Nay, wherein dost thou excel the devil, "who transforms himself into an angel of light?"

—Watson, 1696.

(3110.) In the region of revealed truth, increasing knowledge will not always be increasing conviction, unless that knowledge be progressively reduced to practice. If knowledge be merely speculative, in extending it a man may only "increase sorrow;" for it is "with the heart that man believeth unto righteousness," and it is to the "doers" of His Father's will that the Saviour promises assuring knowledge of His own "doctrine." The mind needs tonics. For the body, next to wholesome food, the best toning is vigorous exercise; and if long cradled in a luxurious repose, the penalty is paid at last in so many imaginary ills as constitute a real one. And just as the child of sloth is haunted by visionary fears, as he dreads that his pulse will stop or the firmament fall in: so the man who arrests his moral activities and lets his fancy wander at its will; the man who is doing no service to God and no good in the world will soon become an intellectual hypochondriac.

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

(3111.) Beware of letting the head grow at a great rate while the arm is shrivelled. Knowledge involves a responsibility which will end in many stripes for disobedience. It is treason for a commander to be well versed in military tactics, and to be great in arms, and yet to refuse to defend his country and suffer the empire to go to ruin. Practical Christianity alone is true Christianity.

—Spurgeon.

6. Divorced from experience and practice is worthless.

(3112.) The thoughtless man, even if he can recite a large portion (of the law), but is not a doer of it, has no share in the priesthood, but is like a cowherd counting the cows of others.

—Buddha.

(3113.) It is well known that the great doctors of the world by much reading and speculation attain to a great height of knowledge, but seldom to sound wisdom, which has given way to that common proverb, "The greatest clerks are not always the wisest men." It is not the studying of politics that will make a man a wise counsellor of state, till his knowledge is joined with experience, which teaches where the rules of state hold, and where they fail. It is not book-knowledge that will make a good general, a skilful pilot, no not so much as a cunning artisan, till that knowledge is perfected by practice and experience. And so surely, though a man abound never so much in literal knowledge, it will be far from making him a good Christian, unless he bring precepts into practice, and by feeling experience apply that he knows to his own use and spiritual advantage. —Joshua Shute, 1629.

(3114.) As he is not rightly called a rich man that can tell how and by what means a man may be exceeding rich, but he that hath riches of his own : so he is not a good Christian that can, according to knowledge, dispute and reason of virtue and godliness, and can describe and define the same ; but he that is endued with virtue and possessed with true godliness, and doth most willingly practise the same in the whole course of his life.

—Caudray, 1598-1664.

(3115.) You read of the heathens, when they sacrificed to their gods, they were wont to hang a garland upon the head of the beasts, and to crown them with roses ; so they were led on to sacrifice. Many may have garlands upon their heads, ornaments of knowledge, yet are going on to destruction.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(3116.) Experimental knowledge is the true ballast of the soul, when mere sound and air is a rolling and moveable thing. Mere head professors are as light as a cork dancing upon every dash of water.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3117.) Desire after God springs not from a bare speculation, but a strong impression, a spiritual taste ; for a bare speculation has no more strength to make a motion in the will than the poetical descriptions of far countries can persuade a potent prince to take a long voyage for the conquest, or a merchant to venture his stock thither for a trade.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3118.) A knowledge of God by revelation the Jews had in the Old Testament, who yet rejected the Son of God ; a knowledge of Christ many learned men professing Christianity have, who know Christ in the bark of the letter, not in the sap of the spirit : as the Jews know Him under the veil of types, but were ignorant of His person when He came among them. This is such a knowledge which men have of a beautiful picture, or a comely person with whom they have no acquaintance ; or as an astronomer knows the stars without receiving any more special influence from them than other men, or the inanimate creatures.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3119.) A man may be theologically knowing and spiritually ignorant. Nicodemus was none of the lowest sect, a Pharisee, nor of the lowest form among them, a ruler among them, had the knowledge of the law above the vulgar, yet was ignorant of the design of the Messiah, and the mystery of the new birth. A man may be excellent in the grammar of the Scripture, yet not understand the spiritual sense of it. As a man may have so much Latin as to construe a physician's bill, and tell the names of the plants mentioned in it, yet understand nothing of the particular virtues of those plants, or have any pleasure in the contemplation of them ; so we may discourse of God, and the perfections of God, and the intendments of the great things of Christ, without a sense of them. Though this be a good preparatory to a spiritual knowledge, yet is insufficient of itself without some further addition. It does not heal the soul's eye, nor chase away the spiritual darkness.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3120.) The highest rational knowledge of God cannot profit without the knowledge of faith. This general and common knowledge of Christ is but a knowing after the flesh, not in the power of His Spirit, and can no more advantage than the Jews knowing Him, or Judas his living with Him, did them or him without believing. In the Scripture, Christians are not called knowing persons, but believers. It is a pleasure to a physician to consider the nature of a medicine, and pierce into the quality of each ingredient in it ; but if he be invaded by the disease for which that medicine is proper, all his knowledge of it and delight in it will be no support to his body, unless he takes it and joins it in a close contest with the distemper. All the pleasure he has had in the search and contemplation of it, and the experience of the strength of it upon his patients, will not check the malady of his vitals, or stop the rage of the humour, though his knowledge were as large as Solomon's, without application of the remedy. Christ is the remedy for our spiritual diseases, faith is the application.

A man is no more a Christian by knowing the nature of God and Christ in a notional way, or being able to unfold the mysteries of redemption in generous strains, than a philosopher, who can discourse accurately of the nature of metals and jewels, can be said to be rich, when he has never a penny in his purse. The knowledge entitles him to a natural wisdom, but the possession to wealth. If he were a slave in the galleys, the riches of his knowledge would never strike off the weight of his chains. One jewel in possession to pay for his redemption would be of more value than all his philosophy. And just such a person is he that delights in the knowledge of his bags and quantity of gold, but makes not application of it to his present indigences ; it is as if he had none, but were the poorest beggar that craves an alms from door to door. There is as great difference between this notional and fiducial knowledge as there is between the knowledge of an angel, who comes under the wing of Christ for his confirmation in his happy estate, and the knowledge of a devil.

(3121.) Unholy knowledge is but a carcass, a shadow, the activity of a vain mind, or a means without the end, and unfit to attain it. A map is not a kingdom, nor doth it much enrich the owner. The names of meats and drinks will not nourish you : and to know names and notions, giveth you no title to the things so named. You may as well think to be saved for being good musicians, physicians, or astronomers, as for being learned divines, if your knowledge cause not holy love ; it may help others to heaven, but it will be but vanity to you ; and you be as "sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal." You glory in a lifeless picture of wisdom ; and hell may shortly tell you, that you had better chosen anything to play the fool with, than with the notions and words of wisdom mortified.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(3122.) The bare knowledge of God's will is inefficacious, it doth not better the heart. Knowledge alone is like a winter sun, which hath no heat or influence ; it doth not warm the affections, or purify the conscience. Judas was a great luminary, he knew God's will, but he was a traitor.

—Watson, 1696.

(3123.) Young is, of all other men, one of the most striking examples of the disunion of piety from truth. If we read his most true, impassioned, and impressive estimate of the world and of religion, we shall think it impossible that he was uninfluenced by his subject. It is, however, a melancholy fact—that he was hunting after preferment at eighty years old, and felt and spoke like a disappointed man. The truth was pictured on his mind in most vivid colours. He felt it, while he was writing. He felt himself on a retired spot ; and he saw Death, the mighty hunter, pursuing the unthinking world. He saw redemption—its necessity and its grandeur ; and, while he looked on it, he spoke as a man would speak whose mind and heart are deeply engaged. Notwithstanding all this, the view did not reach his heart ! Had I preached in his pulpit with the fervour and interest that his "Night Thoughts" discover, he would have been terrified. He told a friend of mine, who went to him under religious fears, that he must go more into the world !

—Cecil, 1748-1810.

(3124.) Belief is not intellectual but moral : "with the heart man believeth unto righteousness," so that religion is not a question of mere notions, but the expression of the entire spiritual life. It would be as logical to contend that a man is going a journey because he can explain the construction of an engine as to contend that a man is going to heaven because he can correctly answer theological questions.

—Parker.

7. Its present imperfection.

(3125.) Our knowledge is but in part, and imperfect ; the most of what we know, is the least of what we do not know. The Gospel is as a rich piece of arras, rolled up ; this God hath been unfolding ever since the first promise was made to Adam, opening it still every age wider than other ; but the world shall sooner be at an end, than this mystery will be fully known. Indeed as a river (which may be breaks forth at first from the small orifice of a little spring) does widen its channel, and grows broader, as it approacheth nearer to the sea ; so the knowledge of this mystery doth spread every age more than other, and still will, as the world draws nearer to the sea of eternity, into which it must at last fall. The Gospel appeared but a little spring in Adam's time, whose whole Bible was bound up in a single promise ; this increased to a rivulet by Abraham's time, and this rivulet enlarged itself into a river in the days of the prophets ; but when Christ came in the flesh, then knowledge flowed in again ; the least in the Gospel-state is said to be greater than the greatest before Christ : so that in comparison of the darker times of the law, the knowledge Christians now have, is great ; but compared with the knowledge they shall have in heaven, 'tis little, and but peep of day.

—Gurnall.

(3126.) Man's knowledge is but as the rivulet ; his ignorance as the sea.

—Eliza Cook.

8. Its future perfectness.

(3127.) "Whether there be knowledge, it shall vanish away" (1 Cor. xiii. 8). Although it be no marvel that prophecies and tongues should fail, that knowledge shall be done away, this is what may cause some perplexity. What then ? are we then to live in ignorance ? Far from it. Nay, then specially it is probable that our knowledge is made more intense. Wherefore also he said, "Then shall I know, even as also I am known." For this reason, if you mark it, that you might not suppose this to be done away equally with the prophecy and the tongues, having said, "Whether there be knowledge, it shall vanish away," he was not silent, but added also the manner of its vanishing away, immediately subjoining the saying, "We know in part, and we prophesy in part. But when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away." It is not therefore knowledge that is done away, but this circumstance, that our knowledge is in part. For we shall not only know as much, but even a great deal more. But that I may also make it plain by example ; now we know that God is everywhere, but how, we know not. That He made out of things that are not the things that are, we know ; but of the manner we are ignorant. That He was born of a virgin, we know, but how, we know not yet. But then shall we know somewhat more and more clearly concerning these things.

—Chrysostom, 347-407.

(3128.) The cessation of our present mode of knowing, is but the cessation of our ignorance and imperfection : as our wakening endeth a dreaming knowledge, and our maturity endeth the trifling knowledge of a child : for so saith the Holy Ghost (1 Cor. xiii. 8-12). Love never faileth, and we can love no more than we know ; but whether there be prophecies they shall fail (that is, cease) ; whether there be tongues they shall cease ; whether there be knowledge, notional and abstractive, such as we have now, it shall vanish away : "When I was a child I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child ; but when I became a man, I put away childish things. For now we see through a glass (per speciem) darkly," as men understand a thing by a metaphor, parable, or a riddle, "but then face to face ;" even creatures intuitively as in themselves naked and open to our sight. "Now I know in part (not rem sed aliquid rei ; in which sense Sanchery truly saith, nilhil scitur) , "but then I shall know even as I am known ; not as God knoweth us : "for our knowledge and His must not be so comparatively likened ; but as holy spirits know us both now and for ever, we shall both know, and be known by immediate intuition.

If a physician be to describe the parts of a man, and the latent diseases of his patient, he is fain to search hard, and bestow many thoughts of it besides his long reading and converse, to make him capable of knowing; and when all is done, he goeth much upon conjectures, and his knowledge is mixed with many uncertainties, yea, and mistakes; but when he openeth the corpse, he seeth all, and his knowledge is more full, more true, and more certain; besides that it is easily and quickly attained, even by a pre-ent look. A countryman knoweth the town, the fields, and rivers, where he dwelleth, yea, and the plants and animals, with ease and certain clearness, when he that must know the same things by the study of geographical writings and tables, must know them but with a general, an unsatisfactory, and oft a much mistaking kind of knowledge. Alas! when our present knowledge hath cost a man the study of forty or fifty or sixty years, how lean, how poor, how doubtful and unsatisfactory is it, after all! But when God will show us Himself and all things, and when heaven is known as the sun by its own light, this will be the clear, pure, and satisfactory knowledge: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God" (Matt. v.). "And without holiness none can see Him" (Heb. xii. 14). This sight will be worthy the name of wisdom, when our present glimpse is but philosophy, a love and desire of wisdom. So far should we be from fearing death, through the fear of losing our knowledge, or any of the means of knowledge, that it should make us rather long for the world of glorious light, that we might get out of this darkness and know all that with an easy look, to our joy and satisfaction, which here we know with troublesome doubtings, or not at all. Shall we be afraid of darkness in the heavenly light, or of ignorance, when we see the Lord of glory?

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

9. The sources of knowledge will never be exhausted.

(3129.) The thought occurred to some that if, as the Scriptures appear to intimate, we learn more rapidly in the future than in the present life, and are to have our existence prolonged through eternity, a time will come when the sources of knowledge will be exhausted, and the enjoyments of heaven, having lost the charm of novelty, will in consequence become insipid. There would be reason in this thought, were it not that we have to become acquainted with a boundless universe, and a God of infinite perfections. It is said "that the traveller who ascends slowly the steep side of the Andes, when, stage after stage, he looks beneath and around him, and gazes at each advance upon a wider horizon than before, convinces himself that he is actually attaining a great elevation above the common level of earth whence he started. And yet, when he looks upward to the starry vault, and sees it now in all its amplitude and through a more translucent medium, so as that, more distinctly than before, he is conscious of the vastness and distance of the heavenly system, his impression is not that he is getting nearer to the stars; but rather that, though actually he rises, they are drawing back to a greater remoteness, and condemning his feeble efforts to climb on high." Just so will it be with our knowledge in the future state. Though sensible of a constant progression, when we look to the untrodden heights which lie beyond us, they will appear the vaster the higher we ascend. Our augmented knowledge will make us more sensible of our own ignorance. The more we learn of God, the more shall we be convinced that we cannot comprehend His infinitude. Thus, my brethren, provision is made for our eternal improvement. And though what we shall ultimately become does not yet appear, cannot yet appear, the thought of what we may be after millions of years are past, is enough to thrill you with emotions of delight, and to make the heart bound within you, enough to gratify the loftiest ambition, and to satisfy the most enlarged desires.

—Landels.

III. THE KNOWLEDGE OF GOD.

1. Its importance.

(3130.) First know God and then serve Him. He can never shoot right that takes his aim contrary. The understanding directs all the inferior powers of the soul; if that is infected with error, the affections must necessarily move out of order. A blind horse may be full of mettle, but it is ever and anon apt to stumble; and therefore, "without knowledge the heart is not good."

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(3131.) Knowledge of God is a necessary preface to a spiritual joy in Him (Ps. civ. 34). First, by a sweetness tasted in meditation, and then a delight in God, the object of it; and according to the apprehension we have of the object, are the degrees of our delight in it. It is all one to a blind man, be he in a palace richly furnished, or a dungeon hung with cobwebs.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3132.) The brightest needles move quickest, and stick fastest to the loadstone. The clearer our knowledge, the closer our adherence. He that spiritually knows God and Christ, will rest upon God's bare word with more steadfastness than if he had the strongest assurances of all the princes in the world for a great estate.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3133.) Whatsoever other knowledge a man may be endowed withal, he is but an ignorant person who doth not know God, the author of his being.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(3134.) We must know God's will before we can do it; knowledge is the eye to direct the foot of obedience. The papists make ignorance the mother of devotion, but Christ makes ignorance the mother of error (Matt. xxii. 29). "Ye err, not knowing the Scripture." We must know God's will before we can do it aright, there is no going to heaven blindfold. In the creation, light was the first thing that was made; so it is in the new creation: knowledge is the pillar of fire that goes before us, and lights us into the heavenly kingdom. It is light must bring us to the "inheritance of the saints in light."

—Watson, 1696.

(3135.) Will you reject knowledge because some abuse it? Why, that is as ridiculous as to say, "Because many die, who have both food and physic, and plenty of means for preserving life: therefore, I will use no means, for preserving of my life at all. They that have food and physic may die; but they that have none of them cannot live; so, whoever perish, ignorant persons, that slight the means, are sure to perish."

—Erskine, 1683-1752.

(3136.) When St. Columban said to Lucinus, concerning his ardent devotion to learning, "My child, many out of undue love of knowledge have shipwrecked their souls," "My father," replied the boy with deep humility, "If I learn to know God I shall never offend Him, for they only offend Him who know Him not." —F. W. Farrar.

2. Its insufficiency.

(3137.) Knowledge gives us a sight, and love gives us a possession; we find God by knowledge, but we enjoy Him by love. Let us improve our knowledge of Him for inflaming our affections to Him, that we may be prepared for the glory of our eternal life. The understanding is but the door of the heart; to let God and Christ stick there, and not bring them into the heart, is to give a cold entertainment to that which deserves the best.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

3. Its delightfulness.

(3138.) It is a durable delight when all others wither. Other knowledge is as a rainbow, pleasant to behold but quickly vanishing, like the sound of music in the ear, which pleases and expires.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3139.) A Christian rejoices in the knowledge of God. What music is to the sensitive and susceptible ear, what beauty is to the eye, what health is to the frame and sweetness to the taste, all this, and more than this, the knowledge of God, through apprehension of the everlasting gospel, is to the true Christian.

—Cumming.

4. Should be progressive.

(3140.) It is a progressive knowledge, still aiming at more knowledge and more improvements of it. Though the knowledge of God be at first infused into us by the inspiration of the Spirit, yet neither that in the head, nor grace in the heart, have their full strength at their first birth, but attain their stature gradually. Natural knowledge, which is a common work of God upon men, arrives not at its growth in a moment, but in a tract of time. He that first found out the inclination of the loadstone to the pole did not presently apprehend all the virtues of the loadstone, nor was able to sail about the world by it, though this afterwards grew up from the first invention. We go up a mountain step by step. Christ does not perform all the parts of His prophetic office at once; there is a further declaration of the name of God to succeed the first. "I have declared Thy name and will declare it, that the love wherewith Thou hast loved me may be in them."

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

5. Is impossible to the inconstant.

(3141.) Light and inconstant spirits have not the knowledge of God, any more than running water can receive the force of a sunbeam, which glides away from one after another, and remains under the power and force of none. You can never set a stamp upon a floating cork till you take it out of the water.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

6. Its humbling effects.

—Ersine, 1685-1752.

IV. SAVING KNOWLEDGE.

1. Its nature.

(3143.) The knowledge of God and Christ, which is saving, differs not from other knowledge in regard of the object, but the manner of knowing and the effects of knowledge. One knows by a natural understanding, and knows God in the Scripture as he would know a thing written in any other book: the other knowledge is by an understanding opened to take in more fully what is presented. The shutters which barred out the light are pulled down, whereby the light breaks into the room more clearly: "Then opened He their understandings" (Luke xxiv. 45). Two may behold the same picture, the object is the same; but one having a more piercing eye, and exacter judgment, will better discern the lineaments and beauty of the work, which the other cannot perceive, though he views the same object. Suppose a beast that knows his master and the servants that give him food, were changed into a man, and endued with a rational soul, he would have the same objects of knowledge; but he would know them in another manner, with an understanding given; whereas he knew before only by a customary sight, a strength of imagination.

And another kind of knowledge in the effects. A child of a year old may know his parents, his father, mother, and the servants; but when he grows up, though there is no change of the objects, yet there is in the effects of his knowledge. He knows them with more reverence, with more rational affections, with expressions of duty. So the knowledge of God differs in a sound Christian from the knowledge others have under the preaching of the Gospel; he knows God and Christ in a clearer manner, with a spiritual eye, and brings forth affectionate and practical fruits of that knowledge.

(3144.) Other knowledge discovers other things, but not a man's self; like a dark lantern, which shows us other persons and things, but obscures ourselves from the sight of ourselves; but the knowledge of God is such a light whereby a man beholds himself, as well as the way wherein he is to walk.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3145.) There is as great difference between the common knowledge of God in an unbelieving scholar and a believing Christian, as between the knowledge that a gardener has of plants and flowers in his master's garden: he knows how to dress them, knows the names and nature of every particular plant, and flower there; but though the knowledge of the owner of it does not extend to all those particularities, yet he knows it to be his, conveyed to him, and of right belonging to him. Another man delights in a beautiful field and garden, pleases himself with the variety of the flowers and pleasures of the walks; the owner delights in it upon this account too, loves to consider the nature of the trees and plants; but he has a knowledge of it, and delight in it above the others; because of his property, he knows the possession of it, and the commodities arising from it to be his.

This knowledge is always with some glimmering of hopes that God and Christ are his, according to the tenor of the covenant. Though there be not a full assurance, the title and evidence is not clear to him, and may seem to have some flaw in it which he has not yet overcome, yet all true faith has something of comfort and hope with it, for it is wrought by the Spirit as a comforter, convincing of the sufficiency as well as the necessity of the righteousness of Christ, upon which the soul in this saving knowledge flings itself, and follows this glimmering, till he comes to a greater light, whereby to read his own interest in Christ, as Paul did; "Who loved me, and gave himself for me."

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3146.) It differs from the knowledge of others, as the sight of a ship by an unskilful eye from that of the shipwright or pilot, who understands all the parts of the workman's skill; or the sight of a picture by a limner, and one ignorant of the art. One sees the hidden pieces of art, the other the outward figure and composure.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3147.) It is a firm knowledge. Some have a floating knowledge of God. Truth in their mind does dance as the image of the sun or stars in a pail, according to the motion of the water. Truth and error are like a pair of scales, sometimes up and sometimes down. But as true faith, so saving knowledge, is steadfast like a needle, sticking to the loadstone without wavering (Col. ii. 5).

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

2. Can be imparted to us only by the Spirit of God.

(3148.) The greatest part of the world, whether learned or unlearned, think that there is no need of purging and purifying of their hearts for the right knowledge of Christ and His Gospel: but though their lives be never so wicked, their hearts never so foul within, yet they may know Christ sufficiently out of their mere systems and bodies of divinity; although our Saviour prescribes His disciples another method to come to the right knowledge of Divine truths, by doing of God's will. "He that will do my Father's will (saith He), shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God." He is a true Christian, indeed, not he that is book-taught, but he that is God-taught; he that has "an unction from the Holy One" that teaches him all things: he that has the Spirit of Christ within him that searcheth out the deep things of God: "for as no man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of a man which is in him; even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God."

Ink and paper can never make us Christians, can never beget a new nature, a living principle in us; can never form Christ, or any true notions of spiritual things, in our hearts. Cold theorems and maxims, lean syllogistical reasonings, could never yet of themselves beget the least glimpse of true heavenly light, the least sap of saving knowledge, in any heart. All this is but the groping of the poor dark spirit of man after truth, to find it out with his own endeavours, and feel it with his own cold and benumbed hands. Words and syllables, which are but dead things, cannot possibly convey the living notions of heavenly truths to us. The secret mysteries of a Divine life, of a new nature, of Christ formed in our hearts, they cannot be written or spoken; language and expressions cannot reach them; neither can they be ever truly understood, except the soul itself be kindled from within, and awakened into the life of them. A painter that could draw a rose, though he may flourish some likeness of it in figure and colour, yet he can never paint the scent and fragrantcy; or if he would draw a flame, he cannot put a constant heat into his colours: he cannot make his pencil drop a sound, as the echo in the epigram mocks at him—

Si vis similem pingere, pingere sonum.

All the skill of cunning artisans and mechanics cannot put a principle of life into a statue of their own making. Neither are we able to enclose in words and letters the life, soul, and essence of any spiritual truths, and as it were to incorporate it in them.

—Cudworth, 1617-1688.

3. Its blessedness.

(3149.) Speculative knowledge is as the light of torches, guiding, not heating; this is as the sun, which both directs and warms; a fire felt as well as seen; truth known, and truth used as a compass to sail by. When the knowledge of the nature of God is impressed upon us for imitation, and is, as the conference of Christ with His disciples, inflaming the heart (Luke xxiv. 32), and driving away the cold affections towards God; when righteousness is understood as well as judgment, and that as a path, and a good path to walk in; when we are not only directed to the path, but are pleased with the goodness of it, and the approving wisdom enters into the heart, and the knowledge of it becomes pleasant to the soul (Prov. ii. 9, 10); when there is not only a knowledge of God, but a liking to retain it; a sight of the sun, and a delight in its beams; a knowledge of the fire, and approach to its heat; a mighty pleasure in God and Christ, as a sweet ointment poured forth; when God is known and embraced as the chief good and ultimate end; Christ known and embraced as the way to be at peace with God, and an honourer of Him: such a knowledge as is not only like animal spirits in the brain, but vital spirits in the heart enabling for action; not like a cloud hanging in the air, but distilling in fruitful showers for the assistance of the earth.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3150.) This kind of knowledge is necessary to happiness, for without it we can have no clear nor worthy notions of God, but more likely disparaging ones; as a man that never saw the stateliness of London, or any city like it, cannot mount higher in his conceptions of it than that it may be a little better than the best market town which he has seen in his country, but he is not like to have conceits of it according to the greatness of the place, the magnificence of the buildings, the gallantry of the people. When he once comes to behold it, he will find his former conceptions of it to be vastly short of the beauty of the place. He would scarce be convinced of it without a sight. Indeed, this knowledge of God is imperfect here because of our present state. But some experience there is here answering to the vision hereafter, as a map of that which the soul is travelling to a sight of. This kind of knowledge of God is banished from the unclean spirits; they have lost the savour of what they knew of God, and feel nothing but the power of His wrath.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3151.) There is an excellency in Divine knowledge that cannot be discovered by the tongues of men or angels; an experience and spiritual sensation renders a man more intelligent than all discourses can. As the natural sense best judges of sensible objects, so does the spiritual sense of divine. He that has tasted honey has a more lively knowledge of it than the most learned man that never tasted the sweetness, or felt the operations of it. Nor can any conceive so clearly of the excellency of the sun, by the discourses of the richest fancies, as by seeing its glory and feeling the warmth of its beams. A man's own sense will better inform him of the beauty of the heavens than the elevated reasonings of philosophers. Divine truth acted upon the heart, and felt in its influence, is more plainly known than by discourse and reason.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3152.) A speculative knowledge is like that of the Queen of Sheba at a distance; an experimental is like her sight of the order and glory of Solomon's court, that left no more spirit in her.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

4. By whom it is possessed.

(3153.) Experience giveth us a far more satisfactory manner of knowledge, than others have that have no such experience. To know by hearsay, is like the knowing of a country in a map; and to know by experience, is like the knowing of the same country by sight. An experienced navigator, or soldier, or physician, or governor, hath another manner of knowledge than the most learned can have without experience; even a knowledge that confirmeth a man, and makes him confident.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(3154.) The truths of Christ crucified are the Christian's philosophy, and a good life is the Christian's logic—that great instrumental introductive art that must guide the mind into the former. And where a long course of piety, and close communion with God, has purged the heart, and rectified the will, and made all things ready for the reception of God's Spirit, knowledge will break in upon such a soul, like the sun shining in his full might, with such a victorious light, that nothing shall be able to resist it.

If now at length some should object here, that from what has been delivered, it will follow, that the most pious men are still the most knowing, which yet seems contrary to common experience and observation, I answer, that as to all things directly conducing, and necessary to salvation, there is no doubt but they are so; as the meanest common soldier, that has fought often in an army, has a truer and better knowledge of war, than he that has read and writ whole volumes of it, but never was in any battle.

Practical sciences are not to be learned but in the way of action. It is experience that must give knowledge in the Christian profession, as well as in all others. And the knowledge drawn from experience is quite of another kind from that which flows from speculation or discourse. It is not the opinion, but the "path of the just," that the wisest of men tells us, "shines more and more unto a perfect day." The obedient, and the men of practice, are those sons of light, that shall outgrow all their doubts and ignorances, that shall ride upon these clouds, and triumph over their present imperfections, till persuasion pass into knowledge, and knowledge advance into assurance, and all come at length to be completed in the beatific vision, and a full fruition of those joys, which God has in reserve for them, whom by His grace He shall prepare for glory. —South, 1633-1716.

5. How its possession is to be proved.

(3155.) There is a caro and a spiritus, a flesh and a spirit, a body and a soul, in all the writings of the Scriptures. It is but the flesh and body of Divine truths that is printed upon paper; which many moths of books and libraries do only feed upon; many walking skeletons of knowledge, that bury and entomb truths in the living sepulchres of their souls, do only converse with; such as never did anything else but pick at the mere bark and rind of truths, and crack the shells of them. But there is a soul and spirit of Divine truths that could never yet be congealed into ink, that could never be blotted upon paper, which by a secret traduction and conveyance, passes from one soul into another, being able to dwell or lodge nowhere, but in a spiritual being, in a living thing, because itself is nothing but life and spirit. Neither can it, where indeed it is, express itself sufficiently in words and sounds, but it will best declare and speak itself in actions; as the old manner of writing among the Egyptians was, not by words, but things. The life of Divine truths is better expressed in actions than in words, because actions are more living than words. Words are nothing but dead resemblances and pictures of those truths, which live and breathe in actions; and the kingdom of God consists not in word, but in life and power. Sheep do not come and bring their fodder to their shepherd, and show him how much they eat; but inwardly concocting and digesting it, they make it appear by the fleece which they wear upon their backs, and by the milk which they give. And let not Christians affect only to talk and dispute of Christ, and so measure our knowledge of Him by our words; but let us show our knowledge concocted into our lives and actions; and then let us really manifest that we are Christ's sheep indeed, that we are His disciples, by that fleece of holiness which we wear, and by the fruits that we daily yield in our lives and conversations: for "herein," says Christ, "is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit; so shall ye be my disciples."

—Cudworth, 1617-1688.

LAW.

1. THE EXTENT AND BLESSEDNESS OF HER SWAY.

(3156.) Of law there can be no less acknowledged than that her seat is the bosom of God, her voice the harmony of the world. All things in heaven and earth do her homage,—the very least as feeling her care, the greatest as not exempted from her power; both angels and men and creatures, of what condition soever, though each in different sort and manner, yet all with uniform consent, admiring her as the mother of their peace and joy.

—Hooker, 1553-1600.

(3157.) Since the time that God did first proclaim the edicts of His law upon the world, heaven and earth have hearkened unto His voice, and their labour hath been to do His will. "He made a law for the rain;" He gave His "decree unto the sea, that the waters should not pass His commandment." Now, if nature should intermit her course, and leave altogether, though it were for a while, the observation of her own laws, if these principal and mother elements of the world, whereof all things in this lower world are made, should lose the qualities which they now have; if the frame of that heavenly arch erected over our heads, should loosen and dissolve itself; if celestial spheres should forget their wonted motions, and by irregular volubility turn themselves any way as it may happen; if the prince of the lights of heaven, which now, as a giant, doth run his unwearied course, should, as it were, through a languishing faintness, begin to stand, and to rest himself; if the moon should wander from her beaten way, the times and seasons of the year blend themselves by disordered and confused mixture, the winds breathe out their last gasp, the clouds yield no rain, the earth be defeated of her heavenly influence, the fruits of the earth pine away, as children at the withered breasts of their mother no longer able to yield them relief;—what would become of man himself, whom these things do now all serve? See we not plainly, that obedience of creatures unto the law of nature is the stay of the whole world?

—Hooker, 1553-1600.

II. HUMAN LAWS.

1. Their foundations.

(3158.) In reality there are two, and only two, foundations of law; and they are both of them conditions without which nothing can give it any force: I mean equity and utility. With respect to the former, it grows out of the great rule of equality, which is grounded upon our common nature, and which Philo, with propriety and beauty, calls the mother of justice. All human laws are, properly speaking, only declaratory; they may alter the mode and application, but have no power over the substance, of original justice. The other foundation of law, which is utility, must be understood, not of partial or limited, but of general and public, utility, connected in the same manner with, and derived directly from, our rational nature; for any other utility may be the utility of a robber, but cannot be that of a citizen,—the interest of the domestic enemy, and not that of a member of the commonwealth.

—Burke, 1728-1797.

2. Are needful for the weak and the wicked.

(3159.) When the state is most corrupt, then the laws are most multiplied.

—Tacitus.

(3160.) Laws are simply aids to weak folks, to tell them where to go, to help them to go, and to make them remember the next time if they do not go. Laws are men's servants; and they are servants which serve them in that way. But if a man has a direct inspiration of God; or if his culture has gone so high that he does not need these external stimulants; or if he has another sphere of influences which lead him to the same things from a higher point of view, the lower ones drop, not because they are wrong, but because the man is doing the same things better by a different set of instruments. Therefore it is, that there is no law to some men. A man who needs a law is yet a child.

There is not one man in a hundred who ever does live by the laws of the land that he is in. We do not live by the laws of our land. You do not know one quarter of the laws that are on our statute books. A virtuous and honest man does not need to know what the laws are. The greatest proportion of men live and die without hearing once in all their life a tenth or a hundredth part of the laws that pertain to good conduct. They do right of their own accord, and therefore the law has no force on them. So it is in respect to true manly living. As far as a real, upright man goes, he goes voluntarily. He does from spontaneity and from choice what men lower down do from necessity, or from fear of punishment. The consequence is, that men live toward freedom in proportion as they live toward fidelity.

—Becher.

(3161.) A principle is better than a rule; yet we are not to despise rules, for they are leading-strings intended to bring us along the path of life to principles. A rule is like a mould. You pour in the wax; and when it is pressed, it comes out, and the mould is left behind. The end of a rule is to bring the man out from the rule. Rules are like sepals around a rose-bud—good to keep the bud through its first stages; but when it opens, and comes to the perfect flower, then they fall off, and are useless. The highest type of character is that which is made up of feelings so luminous that the man takes a more elevated path than he could ever do if he were bound down to rules and precedents.

—Becher.

3. Are not the standard of righteousness.

(3162.) To say that there is nothing just or unjust except what laws expressly enjoin or forbid, is the same as if we were to maintain that all radii were not equal before the circumference of the circle had been traced.—Montesquieu, 1689-1755.

4. How they are to be estimated.

(3163.) They are the best laws by which the king hath the justest prerogative and the people the best liberty.

—Lord Bacon, 1560-1626.

(3164.) A law is valuable, not because it is law, but because there is right in it; and because of this rightness it is like a vessel carrying perfume—like the alabaster enclosure of a lamp.

—Becher.

5. Should not be too minute and restrictive.

(3165.) The framers of preventive laws, no less than private tutors and schoolmasters, should remember, that the readiest way to make either mind or body grow awry, is by lacing it too tight.

—S. T. Coleridge, 1772-1834.

(3166.) Laws are like grapes, that being too much pressed, yield a hard and unwholesome wine.

—Eliza Cook.

6. Should be carried into effect.

(3167.) A good law without execution is like an unperformed promise.

—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

7. "Going to law."

(3168.) To go to law for revenge we are simply forbidden, that is, to return evil for evil; and therefore all those suits which are for vindictive sentences, not for reparative, are directly criminal.

—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

(3169.) To go to law is for two persons to kindle a fire at their own cost to warm others, and singe themselves to cinders; and because they cannot agree as to what is truth and equity, they will both agree to unplume themselves, that others may be decorated with their feathers.

—Felltham.

III. THE LAWS OF NATURE.

1. Some of their characteristics :—

(1.) They are enduring.

(3170.) The Author of Nature has not given laws to the universe which, like the institutions of men, carry in themselves the elements of their own destruction. He has not permitted in His works any symptom of infancy or old age, or any sign by which we may estimate either their future or their past duration. He may put an end, as He no doubt gave a beginning, to the present system at some determinate period of time : but we may rest assured that this great catastrophe will not be brought about by the laws now existing, and that it is not indicated by anything which we perceive.

—John Playfair.

(2.) They are inexorable and indiscriminating.

(3171.) Law is not only inexorable, but blind and pitiless. It is affected neither by age, ignorance, or knowledge. It wrings to the last pang its penalty out of every violator. Law does not lessen its penalty because its violator is a child, or its violation is involuntary or in ignorance. Poison is not a whit less poisonous because it was taken ignorantly or by mistake. If my arm is broken it makes no difference whatever in the physical result, whether it was effected in justifiable defence of my own person and property, or in a criminal assault upon the person and property of another. If I am beheaded, the physical result is the same whether my name is haloed with the glory of a martyr, or branded with the infamy of a culprit.

The general laws of nature march straight on, without discrimination in the execution of their purposes, whether they bear upon man, woman, or the child that knows not its right hand from its left. In the awful catastrophe that overwhelmed Pompeii and Herculaneum, in the terrible plague that converted London into a charnel-house, in the famines and pestilences that have blighted whole lands, was there any discrimination between innocence and guilt, between maturity and infancy? Did the terrible earthquakes of South America, that gorged themselves with tens of thousands of human beings, make any distinction? Do the destructive, irresistible hurricanes that sweep the ocean discriminate between the pirate and the merchantman, the privateer and the transport? —Chapman.

(3.) They are irresistible.

(3172.) Submits to no permanent modification. There may seem to be exceptions to this. In the vegetable world, for example, life, whatever this may be, lays hold on matter, takes it out from under the control of law, draws it to itself, combines it in new forms and quantities, and thus seems to suspend, violate, bid defiance to law. But this is only briefly and apparently so. Gravitation never lets go its hold upon a single particle of matter, however used by life, and the laws of chemical action never suspend their operation. For a while, and within certain fixed limits, their action is modified. Vegetable life will lift matter aloft in the tree; but gravitation contests every inch, and keeps perpetually pulling upon it. Briefly, life seems to have the best of it. But wait, and you will find that that law will drag down to the earth the loftiest and most stalwart tree of the forest, and the laws of chemical action will reduce it to its original condition and elements, and these will be scattered as they were before life seized upon them. And thus law will demonstrate its permanent sovereignty over matter. It never lets go its hold, never admits any lasting interference with its reign.

Man may briefly control the action of the laws of his physical system. The remedial agencies that are at his command, and the self-repairing power of his body, neutralise the action of the law of dissolution and hold it in abeyance. Remedial agencies aid in arresting or modifying the results of the violation of some physical laws, but only for a while. The time will come when no remedial agency will even for one moment stay or modify the action of law, when law will laugh to scorn the profoundest skill of science and the most potent virtues of medicine. The vital force may for a while succeed in withstanding the ravages of law; and yet at last it must yield, and law have its full satisfaction. For a time life is constantly building up the system, and law tearing it down. For years life builds faster than law can take down. But then life will soon begin to falter in the unequal contest; grow weary and weakly, and law obtain the ascendancy and reduce the system to dust.

—Chapman.

2. They are merely modes of Divine operation.

(3173.) The laws of nature are the rules according to which effects are produced; but there must be a cause which operates according to these rules. The rules of navigation never steered a ship, nor the law of gravity never moved a planet.

—T. Reid, 1710-1796.

(3174.) Let it be granted that everything in the universe, from the rain-drop to a rolling world, is controlled by the laws of nature, we have still to ask by whom these laws were ordained, and are sustained and enforced. "Nature," what is that? Is it that which gives laws, or that which obeys them? It is a law of nature that fire shall burn : how did it come to be so? Did fire at some far off time consult with itself and resolve how it would act through all coming ages? Fire burns as intensely to-day as it did a thousand years ago : does it do so of set purpose, and that it may be always consistent with itself? In accordance with a law of nature, autumn has now succeeded summer : who enforced that law? Is the universe a vast clock, with countless wheels and infinite complications, that goes on for ever without needing to be wound up? All this talk about the laws of nature is in plain truth nothing but an attempt to evade the denial or recognition of the being and agency of God. The laws of nature are simply so much as we have discovered of God's method of working. By Him they were ordained, and by Him they are sustained and enforced. "The Lord hath prepared His throne in the heavens; and His kingdom ruleth over all." "Praise ye Him, all ye stars of light. Praise Him, ye heavens of heavens. Let them praise the name of the Lord : for He commanded, and they were created. He hath also stablished them for ever : He hath made a decree which shall not pass. Praise the Lord from the earth, ye dragons, and all deeps : fire, and hail; snow, and vapours; stormy wind fulfilling His word."

—K. A. Bertram.

(3175.) Speaking correctly and philosophically, the general laws of nature are just rules which God has laid down for the regulation of His own procedure. It is not that, as a Being omnipresent and omnipotent, ever watchful and ever active, He needs those helps which man requires in consequence of his infirmities. The Almighty can never be weighed down under the burden of His government. He adopts the mode of procedure by general laws, not for His own convenience, but for that of His intelligent creatures. —M^r Cosh.

(3176.) The half-learned man is apt to laugh at the simple faith of the clown or savage, who tells us that rain comes from God. The former, it seems, has discovered that it is the product of certain laws of air, water, and electricity. But truly the peasant is the more enlightened of the two, for he has discovered the main cause, and the real Actor; while the other has found only the second cause, and the mere instrument. It is as if a friend were to send us a gift of ingenious and beautiful workmanship, and just as our gratitude was beginning to rise to the donor, some bystanders were to endeavour to damp it all, by telling us that the gift is the product of certain machinery he had seen.

"I call," says Sir Thomas Browne, "the effects of nature the works of God, whose hand and instrument she only is; and therefore to ascribe His actions unto her, is to devolve the honour of the principal agent upon the instrument, which if with reason we may do, then let our hammers rise up and boast that they have built our houses, and our pen receive the honour of our writings."

It is surely possible for us so to expand our minds as to discover both the agent and the instrument—to discover the goodness of God in the blessing sent, and the wisdom of God in the means, so adapted to our state, through which the blessing comes.

—M^r Cosh.

3. Their regularity is a reason for thanksgiving.

(3177.) It is the regularity of the laws of nature which leads us to put confidence in them, and enables us to make profitable use of them. Without such order and uniformity man could have no motive to industry, no incentive to activity. Disposed to action, he would ever find action to be useless, for he could not ascertain the tendency, and much less the exact effect of any step taken by him, or course of action adopted. Suppose that, instead of rising regularly at a known time, the sun were to appear and disappear like a meteor, no one being able to say where, or when, or how, all human exertion would cease in a feeling of utter hopelessness. If, instead of returning in a regular manner, the seasons were to follow each other capriciously, so that spring might be immediately succeeded by winter, and summer preceded by autumn, then the labour of the husbandman would be at an end, and the human race would perish from the earth. In such a state of things mankind would not have sufficient motive to do such common acts as to partake of food, for they could not anticipate that food would support them. With such a system, or rather want of system, pervading the world, suspicion and alarm would reign in every breast; man would sink into indolence, with all the accompanying evils of reckless audacity and vice; "fears would be in the way," and he would dread the approach of danger from every quarter; feel himself confused as in a dream, or lost as in darkness; or rather, after leading a brief and troubled existence, he would disappear from the earth.

How unreasonable, then, as well as ungrateful, the conduct of those who fail to discover the presence of God in His works, and that because of these laws, so beautiful in themselves, and benignant in their aspect towards us. Every person sees that the blessings which God lavished upon the Hebrews, in that desert which now supports but four thousand of a population, but was made to support upwards of two millions and a half for a period of forty years, were not the less, but all the more the gifts of God, from the circumstance that they were bestowed in a somewhat regular manner. No one will affirm that the manner was the less bountiful proof of the care of God, because, in order to suit the convenience of the Israelites, it did not fall irregularly, but at periodical intervals, and was gathered every morning, that those who partook of it might be strengthened for the journey of the day. And will any one maintain that our daily food is less the gift of God, because it is sent not at random, but in appointed ways, and at certain seasons, that we may be prepared to receive it? Was the water of which the Israelites drank less beneficent because it followed them all the way through the wilderness? No one will affirm that it was: and yet there are persons who feel as if they did not require to be grateful for the water of which they drink, because it comes to them from the clouds of heaven, and the fountains which gush from the earth.

We condemn the Hebrews when we read of their ingratitude, and yet we imitate their conduct. When the manna first fell, and they saw abundance of food on the previously bare face of the desert, gratitude heaved in every breast; but how short a time elapsed till they began to look upon the manna in much the same light as we look upon the dews of the evening, or the crops in harvest—as something regular and customary, the denial of which might justify complaint, but the bestowal of which was not calculated to call forth thankfulness! Because the water flowed with them through all their journey, so that the heat of a burning sun could not exhale it, nor the thirsting sand of the desert drink it up, just because it continued all the time as fresh and as cool as when it leapt from its parent rock, they came to regard it with as little wonder as we do the stream which may run past our dwelling. The pillar of cloud hung continually before them, so that the rays of a meridian sun could not dissipate it, nor the winds of heaven drive it away; and they came at last to be no more grateful for it, than we usually are for the light of the sun returning every morning. Just because this pillar of cloud was kindled into a pillar of fire every evening, they became as familiar with it as we are with the stars which God lights up nightly in the firmament. The younger portion of the people, born in the desert, and long accustomed to these wonders, may have come to look upon them as altogether natural, and would no more be surprised at the sight of the fiery pillar casting its lurid glare upon the sands, than we are with the meteor that flashes across the evening sky. Does it not appear as if it were the very frequency of the gift, and the regularity of its coming, which lead mankind to forget the Giver? It is as if a gift were left every morning at our door, and we were at length to imagine that it came alone without being sent. It is as if the widow whose meal and oil were blessed by the prophet, had come at length to imagine that there was nothing supernatural in the transaction, just because the barrel of meal did not waste, and the cruse of oil did not fail. —M'Cosk.

4. Their relation to Providence.

(3178.) We are not jealous of the introduction and widest extension of general laws; for in their harmonious adjustment, they acquire a plastic power which enables them to fulfil each of the providences of an all-wise God. While the fixed nature of the laws gives to providence its firmness, the immense number and nice adaptation of these laws, like the innumerable rings of a coat-of-mail, give to it its flexibility, whereby it fits in to the shape and posture of every individual man.

A vessel is launched on the ocean, fitted, so far as human sagacity can discover, to reach its destination. But when it has reached a particular place, a great rarefaction of the air is produced by heat in a particular region of the world; the wind rushes in to fill up the vacuum, lashes the ocean into fury, bears down upon the vessel, and hurrying it furiously along, dashes it upon a rock which is in the way, and scatters the whole crew upon the wide waste of waters. The greater number perish; but some two or three are able to lay hold of portions of the floating wreck, and are borne to the rock, where they find refuge till another ship, opportunely passing by, picks them up, at the very time when they were ready to die of hunger. Now, it is surely conceivable that an all-wise and an omnipotent God might have every link in this long and complicated chain adjusted, with the special view of bringing about each of these ends—the drowning of some, and the saving of others, after having designedly exposed them to danger. Nor in all this would there be any violation of the sequences of nature, nor any suspension of general laws; there is merely such a skillful disposition as to secure the special ends which God from the first contemplated.

—M'Cosk.

5. Their relation to prayer.

(3179.) A question has been sometimes started: how specific answers to prayer can comport with the regularity of Providence, and the government of the world by appointed laws. Unquestionably, this is one of the deep secrets passing our limited knowledge, and belonging to an Infinite mind. It is no deeper, nor harder to reconcile, than a hundred other facts in the Divine economy, which yet we must admit, or deny sense and faith both; such, for example, as the fact that we are all free to choose how we shall act, and yet are completely bound in the hands of Omnipotence; that God is almighty and all-good, and yet leaves His children liberty to do wrong. These are transcendent mysteries, simply because they are the doings of a transcendent being—God. In the end we shall find, I suppose, that there is no more contradiction between a fixed order of laws and special answers to our asking, than there is between a general household arrangement for their children's good, on the part of earthly parents, and their daily favours granted in answer to particular requests.

—F. D. Huntington, D.D.

(3180.) The intervention of a higher intelligence does not interfere with the existence or the action of laws already enacted. Put a new agent into contact with any machinery, and you may direct and modify it, but you do not therefore destroy and supersede it. When an intelligent will, however limited the power of that will, comes into connection with mere matter and the laws of matter, it cannot but influence and act upon them. The arm, which lifts a weight, modifies the law of gravity. The physician, who ministers medicine, modifies the law of life, and arrests the law of dissolution. The lightning-rod, which draws off the electricity, uses one power of nature to direct the force of another.

And if we acknowledge that, besides the finite intelligences with which we visibly have to do, there be in the universe, and interested in its progress, other and higher beings, why should we think it unreasonable, that other and higher agencies should sometimes be at work? If even our own forethought can often guard us against dangers, which we cannot but encounter, if we can by care neutralise the poison of infected airs, or restore health to a diseased frame, or protect lofty buildings from the lightning and the thunderbolt; why should we question but that, without miraculously suspending His own laws, the great Mind, which pervades and governs all things, may shelter where He willeth from the storm and tempest, may ward off the arrow that flieth by day and the pestilence that walketh in the darkness, may strike down the blasphemer in his blasphemy, or make a high road for His redeemed through the sea?

There is indeed another view of this subject, on which some have reasoned, which seems, but perhaps only seems, opposed to a Providential government. If God foresees all things, and formed all things from the first according to His foreknowledge, how can we suppose, that He would ever interfere to remedy defects in His own ordinances, which must in all things have been perfect, and which could never fail? Is it not more true to say, that from the beginning He so planned the whole scheme and mechanism of the universe, so knit together the purposes of predestination, that everything should turn out as it is meet it should, that every need should but precede its supply, every emergency should already be anticipated, every foreseen prayer should find an answer waiting for it, and that no new intervention should be needed to make all things work together after the good pleasure of His will? Let it be so. Practically it can matter nothing to us, whether our prayers were anticipated and their petitions answered before God laid the foundation of the deep: or whether there be an Ear ever open in Heaven, and a mighty Hand ever ready upon earth.

—Harold Browne.

(3181.) We are told that the uniformity of the laws of nature forbids us to expect any answer to prayer—that the universe is governed by un-deviating laws, and that no alteration in the movement of the great machine is possible. But natural laws are merely the resemblances we trace in the phenomena of nature: and these are the works of God. Laws themselves have no power to work. God works—but is He so bound by the methods which He has generally adopted, that even His Omnipotence cannot act in any other way? Is not the Creator greater than the creation—the Ruler than His laws? Is He shut out from the work of His own hands? Will philosophers limit the Almighty? He did actually interfere at the Creation. The world is not eternal. It indicates successive acts of intervention. All things have not continued as they were from the beginning. He who has interposed already may assuredly interpose again. Why, then, may He not so far interpose as to "deliver us" when we "call upon Him in the day of trouble"?

It is sometimes said that intervention on the domain of natural laws is a miracle, and that as miracles do not take place now, if they ever did, there can be no intervention. But is this principle sound? Do we not ourselves interpose in connection with the operation of natural laws, and yet perform no miracle? We say that it is by gravitation this book falls thus upon the desk. Yet when next it falls I may, by an exercise of will, stretch forth my hand and stop it—thus. It is a natural law that bodies at rest remain at rest. Yet by my volition I move this hand which moves this book. Thus my will has intervened in the operation of natural laws—yet without a miracle. Cannot the Creator intervene?

Your child is falling from a window. By the action of a natural law he will be killed. But he cries out for help—"Father! father!" Hearing his call, in this his day of trouble, you rush forth and catch him in your arms. Your child is saved. Natural law would have killed him, but you interposed, and, without a miracle, saved him. And cannot the great Father of all do what an earthly parent does? And if in the day of adversity we, while falling, cry to Him for succour, can He not deliver us? You are ill. The disease, unchecked, will cause death. Natural law, unless interfered with, must be your destruction. But you call in a physician, and he, by his skill, by his volition, interposes with his remedies, and the disease is cured. Cannot God do what man does? Is the Great Physician more limited than His creatures? And when we call on Him in the day of the sickness of ourselves or of our friends, can He not in like manner, and without a miracle, help and heal us?
—Newman Hall.

(3182.) This everlasting twaddle of infidelity about fixed natural laws is simple foolishness.

I should like to know, now, if man even has not as much power over natural laws wherever they touch him, as natural laws have over him. True, God says to man, in one place, "Obey," but in other places He says, "Command!"

Nature can work roughly and coarsely in generalities; but she needs men's intellect and will to give effect to what she does. Through hundreds and thousands of years she tried her hand at making apples, and they were but crab-apples at last. Man said, "I will help you;" and by his industry and wisdom, the sour, miserable fruit soon covered all the hills with luscious apples.

I have power over nature's laws to make them work for my own and my children's good. I can make the lightning my amanuensis and my messenger. I can make the sun himself my artist; but when did ever the unassisted sun paint a picture? Man whispers to him, "Come down here, and I will tell thee something that thou knowest not," and the sun obeys. "Go through there," says man, and the sun goes through, and finds himself painting pictures. I should like to see him try to do that alone. I can say to the sea, "Wait on my will," and it obeys me; to the stream, "Thou lazy thing, flow no longer down hill, but up," and it flows up. When I turn it into a machine, I say to the water, "Grind," and it grinds my food. Natural laws are God's horses, and He says to man, "Vault," and he who can ride them is their master. By working them according to their nature, we can make them to do a million things that they could never do without us: By obeying, we command. They are the blind giants which our will and wisdom guide. Is not this true? Have I perplexed you with metaphysics? Have I not rather showed you plain facts, which you can follow out to almost any extent?

Remember, the question between me and the infidel naturalist is not, "Does God disturb natural laws in order to answer the prayers of His people?" or, "Does He do violence to nature that He may do any man good?" but it is this, "Is it or is it not likely that He is able to do for those who call upon Him and whom He loves as well as man can do by means of natural law for those dear to him?" In other words, "Is it likely that one who has given to His creatures such wonderful power over laws of His own creating, should be Himself so bound and hampered by them that there should be with Him no possibility of any modification of their working to suit circumstances?" The idea is absurd, and they are fools who indulge it.
—Becher.

6. Their relation to human activity.

(3183.) Human activity bears the same relation to natural laws that the rider does to the horse. It is the horse that performs. It is the rider that steers and guides him. Natural laws, of themselves, are brute forces, wandering wide, and doing little. It is not until great natural laws, if I may say so, are inspired by human volition and human intelligence, that they become productive of good—that they know how to converge and co-operate so as to multiply blessings upon the earth. Without natural laws man is utterly helpless. Without men natural laws are largely useless.
—Becher.

IV. THE MORAL LAW.

1. Is the only standard of righteousness.

(3184.) The laws of men are not our rule. "Tis too narrow and short to commend us to God, to be punctual to the laws of men and no more. Men make laws as tailors do garments, to fit the crooked bodies they serve for, to suit the humours of the people to be governed by these laws: surely they are not a sufficient rule to convince us of sin, and to guide us to true happiness. It is God's prerogative to give a law to the conscience, and the renewed motions of the heart. Human laws are good to establish converse with man, but too short to establish communion with God; and therefore we must consult with the rule which is the law of the Lord, that we may not come short of true blessedness.
—Manton, 1620-1667.

2. The loftiness of its standard.

(3185.) Every one of God's commandments enjoins more than man, in his native state of infirmity, can accomplish: nay, many of them enjoin far more than man, when he first bears them, can even understand or conceive. An infant will stretch out its little hand to lay hold on the stars: the uneducated fancy they are stuck in the blue vault, a few miles off over their heads! and only by the researches of science carried on for century after century have we been able to discover their enormous distance, and that each little speck of light is a world. So it is with God's law. Some of its commandments are within the reach of all: there are some that all may keep; and by keeping them we find out how many there are that we have not kept, and cannot keep: the further too we advance in any part of it, the further the horizon recedes before us.

Hare, 1796-1855.

3. Why so high a standard is set before us.

(3186.) But here some man may object and say: "Is any man able to do this that God requires? and if he be not, why then does God command us that which we cannot perform?" Herein Almighty God deals with us, as a father deals with his children. If a man have a son of seven years of age, he will furnish him with bow and arrows, and lead him into the fields. He sets him to shoot at a mark that is twelve score paces off, promising to give him some goodly thing if he hit the mark. And though the father knows that the child cannot shoot so far, yet he will have him aim at a mark beyond his reach, thereby to try the strength and forwardness of the child. And though he shoot short, yet the father will encourage him. Even so Almighty God has furnished us with judgment and reason, as it were with certain artillery, whereby we are able to distinguish between good and evil, and sent us into this world, as it were into the open fields, and sets His law before us as a mark, as David speaks, promising to give us the kingdom of heaven, if we hit the same. And albeit He knows that we cannot hit this mark, that is, keep the law which He has set before us; yet for the exercise of our faith, and for the testifying of our duty and obedience towards Him, He will always have us be aiming at it. And though we come short of that duty and obedience which He requires at our hands, yet doth He accept and reward our good endeavour.

—Henry Smith, 1560-1591.

4. Its sacredness.

(3187.) The apostle St. James says, "Whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, is guilty of all." This seems hard measure—to make a man offender for a word—to treat him for breaking one commandment as one that had broken all the ten. It looks at first sight as if the unprofitable servant who hid his master's talent in a napkin, had some reason for speaking of him as an "austere" man. How do we justify that? We might leave God to justify Himself? We might ask, "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" And leaving this and many other mysteries to be solved at the last day, or in that world where, with eyes purified from the mists of sin, we shall see as we are seen, and know as we are known, we might answer with St. Paul, "Who art thou, O man, that repliest against God? Shall the thing made say to Him who made it, Why hast thou made me thus?" But the case is not without a parallel in our own judicial proceedings; and as done in our courts of law, who thinks the practice wrong? A witness is giving evidence in a case where a man is on trial for his life. He states many, as lawyers say, damning facts, and makes out a case against the accused clear as daylight. What need of further witnesses? The jury lay down their pens, the judge throws himself back in his seat, and the spectators, turning to the poor, pale wretch at the bar, look on him as a dead man, feeling as sure that he will be hanged as that the sun shall rise to-morrow. And yet he is not hanged—the tables are turned an instant. The witness whose evidence had brought him to the scaffold, and to the very brink of ruin, tells a lie—one clear, deliberate falsehood. It may be on a very small point; it does not matter. All his other evidence may be true as the gospel—it does not matter; that one lie nullifies all his other testimony. Convicted of perjury on one point, his evidence is dealt with as if he had been guilty of perjury in all; and that for this good reason—that one capable of swearing to a single lie, is capable of swearing to twenty. Even so—though you may start at the bold assertion, and when you think of some gross and horrid sins may be ready to exclaim, "Is thy servant a dog that he should do such a thing?" the man who is capable of breaking one of God's commandments is capable of breaking them all, in mind and spirit; "he that offendeth in one point is guilty of all."

There are degrees, no doubt, of guilt, as there are degrees of glory. Still there is no degree of guilt but is fatal; sin is a poison of which the smallest drop kills; the law is so sacred, that one offence, one breach of any of its commandments, exposes us to the wrath of God as certainly as a thousand. The case finds its apt illustration in yonder arch which spans the waters that reflect its bending, beautiful form—drive out not ten stones, but one, and the whole pile tumbles into a mass of ruins. Or to vary the figure, a woman's virtue is certainly lost by one fall as by twenty; and he is as certainly a thief who steals a penny as he who steals a pound—who filches but a farthing from a ragged beggar, as he who plunders a bank of its gold, or robs a king of his crown. "He who offendeth in one point is guilty of all."

—Cuthrie.

5. Is inexorable.

(3188.) God's law is His manifested will for the government of His creatures. It is the reflection cast down on earth of His own holiness. It is holy, and just, and good; it is perfect as its Author; it knows of no compromise; it cannot bend, by a hair's-breadth, to keep a whole world of human kind from sinking into everlasting perdition.

Observe the steadfastness of God's laws, as applied to material things. The ocean is under law to God, and by that law it would engulf the whole human race, without swerving from its even course, if they were cast upon it without protection. It is God's law, and His laws are all sure; they are not "yea, yea, and nay, nay."

His moral law, ruling spirits, is as inexorable as His physical law, ruling matter. It knows of no yielding, no compunction.

The ocean would submerge a million of men, and the next moment its waves would roll and play in the same regular succession as before; there would be no staggering of resolution, no change of purpose. He who made the sea may miraculously walk on the waves and stretch out His hand to the perishing; but the sea's law is changeless and pitiless. If another million should be thrown upon the water, they would be swallowed up in the same way.

Such also is God's law for moral beings; it has no softness for indulged sins. Yourselves may have a partiality for them, and think it hard that wrath should come upon them to the uttermost; but the law of God does not participate in that tenderness for favourite lusts. It meets you there like the ocean: "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." It never changes, and never repents. If you sin and perish, its waves roll over you unchanged, to meet the next comer with the same demand: "The soul that sinneth, it shall die."

The law never saved a sinner; if it did, it would be no longer a law. If it softened and yielded at any one point, it were absolutely annulled. If any sin or any sinner is allowed to pass, where is the justice of punishing any sin or any sinner? To bend any commandment for the accommodation of a defaulter is to blot out the law. The law, by its very nature, can have no partialities and no compunctions. It never saves those who transgress; and never weeps for those who perish. It is hard for a man with warm life in his body to sink beneath the waves, and struggle a while, and be choked, and die in the deep unseen; yet though the case is pitiable, no one expects that the sea will become pitiful, and shrink back refusing to be the executioner. So God's other law knows no relenting; transgressors are reckoning without their host when they expect to escape by its softness in "that day."

—Arnot.

6. Is binding even on fallen man.

(3189.) Righteousness is a debt the creature, as a rational creature, owes to God, and cannot refuse the payment of it without a crime. Who deprived him of the power of paying? Himself. Should this voluntary embezzlement prejudice God's right of exacting that which the creature cannot be excused from? A debtor, who cannot pay, remains under the obligation of paying. The receipt of a sum of money brings him into the relation of a debtor, and not his ability to pay what he has received. Such a doctrine would free all men who were unable to pay from being debtors, though the sums they owed were never so vast. That judge would be unjust that would excuse a prodigal debtor because he could not pay when sued by his creditor. No doubt the devils are bound to serve God and love Him, though by their revolt they must have lost will to obey Him. If because we have no present power, our obligation to turn to God and obey Him ceased, there would be no sin in the world, and consequently no judgments. Who will say, that if a prince had such rebellious subjects that there were little hopes to reclaim them, he should be therefore bound not to command them to return to their duty and obedience? If it be reasonable in a prince, whose rights are limited, shall it not be reasonable in God to exact it, who has an unbounded right over His creature? Either God must keep up His law or abrogate it; or, which is all one, let it lie in the dust. His holiness obliges Him to keep up His law; to abrogate it, therefore, would be against His holiness. To declare a willingness that His creature should not love Him, should not obey Him, would be to declare that which is unjust, because love is a just debt to an amiable object and the chief good, and obedience, to a sovereign Lord. Must God change His holiness because man has changed his estate? —Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3190.) Though weakened through the flesh, God may justly command His fallen creatures to keep His commandments diligently. If we have lost our power, there is no reason God should lose His right. If your servants should fall into habits of drunkenness, would you admit this for a plea for neglecting your business, or coming short in it? At such times he is unable to do his master's work, but he is bound to it. It is altogether unreasonable that another should suffer through my default.

—Salter.

7. In what sense it is "the occasion of sin."

(3191.) To call the law impotent would oftentimes express a part of the mischief whereof it was the occasion. The commandment coming, would not seldom of itself stir up the opposition which was slumbering before, awake up for the first time a rebellious principle in the heart of man, so that the very forbidding him to do the thing should arouse in him the desire to do it. This, the irritating power of the law, provoking by a spirit of contradiction the very evil which itself forbade,—just as a rock flung into the bed of some headlong stream, would not arrest the stream, but only cause it, which ran swiftly yet silently before, now furiously to foam and fret round the obstacle which it found in its path,—this irritating power of the law, itself a most fearful testimony of the depth of man's fall, St. Paul often dwells on, above all in the seventh chapter of the Romans: "I was alive," he says there, "without the law once," counted myself alive, was not conscious of the deep antagonism between my will and the will of God: "but when the commandment came, sin revived," started up from its seeming trance into fierce activity, into an open rebellion, "and I died." So, too, in another place, "The motions of sins which were by the law, did work in our members to bring forth fruit unto death."

—Trench.

8. Its ministration of condemnation.

—Cawdrey, 1609.

(3193.) Let a boy who is unskilled in the use of tools take a board and try to plane it straight, and then let him take a straight-edge and lay it on. A rat could run between that edge and the board in a dozen places! A man seems all right to himself while he measures himself by conceit and self-love; but let him take God's law as a straight-edge, and lay it alongside of his faculties, and according to that test every one of them is crooked—not one of them is straight.

—Becher.

(3194.) "By the law is the knowledge of sin." In delineating his spiritual life, in all its struggling and victories, through all the phases which moral being could assume, the apostle gives us to understand how law operated in the settlement of his convictions and duties: "I had not known sin but by the law; for I had not known lust except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet."

The simplest of illustrations shall bring the meaning of the assertion, that law defines and limits liberty, within the comprehension of a child. For a length of time you have been in the habit of regarding certain fields as common property ; again and again you have struck your course across them to shorten or vary a journey. You were totally indifferent as to their proprietorship. The idea that you were trespassing never occurred to you. So far as you knew, there was no law whatever in the case. In process of time, however, the proprietor determines to assert his right to his own land. With this end in view, he gives public intimation that all persons found upon his property will be dealt with as trespassers. He proclaims a law. He sets up in his field a ministration of condemnation. From that hour the whole question of your liberty undergoes a fundamental change. The altered circumstances compel all who have been in the habit of traversing the land with impunity to say, in effect, "In this case we had not known transgression, except the law had said, Thou shalt not trespass."

—Joseph Parker.

(3195.) Let me suppose that as heads of houses you had not for a long time felt the necessity of requiring all the members of your households to be at home by a fixed hour. Had they returned at seven, eight, or nine, they would have been received with equal cordiality. In the working of your family life, however, you find it necessary to determine an hour at which every child shall be with you. To that effect you proclaim your law. In the process of events, I further suppose, one of your children is a mile off when the well-known hour strikes. What is the consequence in his own experience? He hears stroke after stroke without alarm, until, alas! the legal hour is pealed off. How that stroke shakes him! how harsh the vibration: how reproachful the shivering tone! A week before, he could have heard the same hour strike, and could have sung to it. Nothing would have alarmed him. No ghostly accuser would have been upon his track. He now feels that the law is "the ministration of condemnation." He says, "I am late; I should have been at home; my father's eye will reprove me: I had not known sin but by the law, for I had not known irregularity in time, except the law had said, Thou shalt be punctual."

—Joseph Parker.

9. Is terrible only to transgressors.

(3196.) To the unrenewed man the law comes to condemn and to slay, and no man can see beauty in his executioner. The poignard that is lifted up to strike us dead may be beautifully chased. Its hilt may be one blaze of precious stones. It may be wielded by a stalwart hand. But the deadly point of the thing fascinates us. The chasing and the jewellery are all lost upon us. So it is with the man whom the law approaches only to condemn and to slay. He sees the dart; he hears the threat; he is conscious of the uplifted arm; all the beauty is hid from his fascinated vision. But the renewed man not only has the faculty by which beauty is perceived restored to active exercise: his relation to the law is so rectified that his mind can calmly take in the whole impression of it. The beauty of the law is spread out before him—the beauty of the Law of God.

—Alexander Hannay.

(3197.) "Your appearance is very formidable," said the Drum to the great Gun upon the ramparts. "I am made of stern metal," replied the Gun.

"It is very terrible to hear your voice sometimes," the Drum remarked.

"I can speak in words of thunder when necessary," answered the great Gun.

"True—when necessary," said the Drum.

"In case of rebellion, and to foes, I carry destruction and death," it replied; "but towards all others my disposition is quite pacific, and I am perfectly harmless."

"I am the more sensible of my own utter helplessness in your presence," said the Drum with humility.

"You need, however, entertain no fears, seeing we are alike the liege subjects of the same sovereign," replied the great Gun.

The Law of God is the declaration of His holiness, truth, and justice, which was given to govern the world, and will inflict death upon all the disobedient. "Wherefore the law is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good." The law is peaceful toward sinners only in Christ Jesus. We have all rebelled against God by our sins; but the Gospel reveals the Atonement of the Lord Jesus Christ on behalf of all that believe. The Law is therefore on our side if believers, and we have nothing to fear from its power.

—Bowden.

10. In what sense it is a restraint.

(3198.) God's Word is certainly a restraint; but it is such a restraint as the irons which prevent children from getting into the fire.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(3199.) The liberty of the subject could never be preserved in a lawless state of society, but violence and tyranny would reduce to a slavish obedience the weak and the timid. The palladium of civil liberty is law; law well defined, excluding the fluctuations of caprice on one side, and of aggression on the other; law rigorously executed also, for the best code is a dead letter if it be not accompanied by a living and firm executive. So the liberty of the believer is secured by the law of God, when brought under its guidance and government. While living under the misrule of his fallen nature, he is the sport of every capricious imagination, and successively the slave of his predominant passions (Rom. vi. 16). But let Christ's government be set up, and he becomes Christ's freeman; "sin has no longer dominion over him;" he is no longer its wretched captive, but is under gracious law, for "where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty."

—Salter.

11. Has its source in love.

(3200.) It is worthy our observation, that all the virtues that God requires us to exercise, which respect ourselves, are not only pleasing to Him, but are profitable and conducive to our present well-being and tranquillity; such as temperance, chastity, meekness, contentedness, &c. And all the vices He has forbidden have a direct tendency to our ill-being and disquiet; such as gluttony, drunkenness, anger, envy, &c.

—T. Fuller, 1608-1661.

(3201.) The spring of the law is love. With its "Thou shalt not do this," and "Thou shalt not do that," the law presents rather an ungracious aspect. We like ill to be bidden, but worse to be forbidden. But does Love never forbid? A mother, does she never forbid her child; but, on the contrary, indulge every caprice and grant all its wishes? How disastrous the fate and brief the life of a child denied nothing, indulged in everything—allowed to play with fire, or fire-arms; to devour the painted but poisonous fruit—to bathe where the tide runs like a racehorse or the river rushes roaring into the black swirling pool. And he who frets against the restraints of God's holy law because it forbids this and the other thing, is no wiser than the infant who weeps, and screams, and struggles, and perhaps beats the kind bosom that nurses it, because its mother has snatched a knife from its foolish hands.

—Guthrie.

12. Is not burdensome to those who love God.

(3202.) To a saint, Christ's laws are no more burdensome than wings are to a bird.

—Watson, 1696.

13. Insufficiency of its work.

(1.) It reveals true bliss, but does not enable us to attain it.

(3203.) Like as if a man should show a needy body a bag of gold upon the top of a high tower, and yet not lend him a ladder wherewithal he might climb up to the top and fetch down the bag: even so doth God's law only point men to the sovereign good, without showing us how we may come by it, seeing that no man fulfilleth the law.

—Cudworth, 1609.

(2.) It reveals sin, but does not save the sinner.

(3204.) A rock at mid-channel of a river, protruding above the surface, reveals the current by opposing it. An obstruction makes known both the direction and the velocity of the river's flow. But the rock that detects the movement did not produce it. Such is the relation between sin in the soul, and the law which reveals it. Life is rolling downward like a river,—one great volume of enmity against God. Because all is sin, the self-deceived man does not notice that there is any. When the law of God gets a footing within, a commotion round the point of contact suddenly makes it known that hitherto the whole life has been "without God in the world."

Further: as the rock in the river's bed did not cause, neither is it able to reverse, the current. It can only show that there is a stream, giving some indication of its direction and its speed. Although impeded and chafed into foam at the spot, the river rises to the difficulty, and rushes down more rapidly than before. It is thus with the commandment when it opposes sin in a human heart. If it remain alone, although it has power to disturb, it has not power to renew.

—Arnot.

(3205.) Though the law, like flaming fire and stormy winds, becomes God's messenger to run His errands of mercy, yet the saved owe their salvation all to Christ.

I awake from a swoon, alone. The fathomless sea is beneath me, the fathomless sky above me, and I am clinging convulsively to some broken bits of wood. The burning, sinking ship—the shrieking, drowning crowd,—I can scarcely be said to remember: a dim, faintly-outlined image of them hovers like mist about my troubled brain. The sky grows dark, the wind grows stormy, the waves leap higher, the little raft is rending; I am sink—sinking in the sea alone. Will these terrors drive me from my frail resting-place? In these extremities will I let my failing foothold go? Yes, if I see the life-boat bearing down upon me, and feel a line from her bows falling athwart my body, and hear a brother's shout above the storm, "Hold fast by this and you are safe!" The storm above, the waves around, the rending beneath me, will not drive me off my bits of broken wood, unless the life-boat is by my side. Although I know my standing to be unsafe, although I feel it going asunder, I will cling to it and perish with it, if nothing better is within my reach.

If I am saved to-day, I owe much to the law which taught me that I was lost, but more to Christ who became my Saviour.

—Arnot.

(3.) It terrifies and deters, but does not renew.

(3206.) If the ice be broken but over night by the husbandman, when he comes the next day he finds it frozen up again; but let the sun dart on it his warm beams, and then it runs down in streams: so the breaking of the heart by the terrors of the law, is but like the breaking of the ice with a pole by the husbandman to give the cattle drink; but when the love of God comes to the heart, then the corruptions of the heart dissolve, even as the ice dissolves when the warm beams of the sun rest upon it.

—Burroughs, 1599–1646.

(3207.) A legally-convicted person would only be freed from the pain, an evangelically-convicted person from the sin, the true cause of it. Like swine, they would not have the cudgel, but they would have the mire; would have a freedom from the lash of the law, but hate to come under the yoke of Christ. They hate the iron that is come into their side, but not the crime, as a malefactor does the gaol or a thief the gibbet. Such a one had rather have a rotten heart than a painful rack; he had rather have a putrid than a deep incision. The one cries for a plaster to ease his conscience, the other for an axe to be laid to the root of his sin.

—Charnock, 1628–1680.

(3208.) A legal conviction does not of itself soften, but rather harden; an evangelical is melting and submissive. The making a fleshy heart and disposing it to such a frame, is the incommunicable property of the covenant of grace, and was never within the verge and compass of the law. The law, like a cannon, thunders only bullets and cursing, not a word of a promise but to perfect righteousness; therefore a legal conviction cannot be attended with any melting fruit. It is like a hammer that may break a stone in pieces, yet every part retains its hardness. After a mere legal conviction, the heart is commonly harder, as water, if it grow cold after it is heated, freezes harder than it would have done if it had retained its native cold without the interruption of a contrary quality. All those strivings of the Spirit with the old world abated nothing of those evil imaginations which lodged in the heart continually. And it is observed, that though the Israelites heard the thunder, saw the lightning, the mountain burning with fire, the blackness, darkness, and tempest, as a preparation for giving the law, which made them tremble, yet before forty days were over, they had not only forgotten that law, but they sin against that God whose power they feared, renounced God and His power over them, and make themselves a golden calf (Exod. xxxii. 1, 4). The scorching of the law makes the burned place more brawny after the fire is out. The understanding may be soundly convinced, yet the heart not melted; the one is from the undeniable evidence of truth, the other is from the kindly influence of the Spirit. But when the Spirit convinces the heart in a spiritual method, it shines like the sun in the heavens, which thaws the cold and frozen earth, and makes a man to be as melting wax before God.

(3209.) Though the course of sin may be repelled for a season by the dispensation of the law, yet the spring and fountain of it is not dried up thereby. Though it withdraws and hides itself for a season, it is but to shift out of a storm, and then to return again. As a traveller in his way meeting with a violent storm of thunder and rain, immediately turns out of his way to some house or tree for his shelter, but yet this causes him not to give over his journey,—so soon as the storm is over he returns to his way and progress again; so it is with men in bondage unto sin. They are in a course of pursuing their lusts; the law meets with them in a storm of thunder and lightning from heaven, terrifies and hinders them in their way. This turns them for a season out of their course; they will run to prayer or amendment of life, for some shelter from the storm of wrath which is feared coming upon their consciences. But is the course stopped? are their principles altered? Not at all; so soon as the storm is over, so that they begin to wear out that sense and the terror that was upon them, they return to their former course in the service of sin again. This was the state with Pharaoh once and again.

In such seasons sin is not conquered, but diverted. When it seems to fall under the power of the law, indeed it is only turned into a new channel; it is not dried up. If you go and set a dam against the streams of a river, so that you suffer no water to pass in the old course and channel, but it breaks out another way, and turns all its streams in a new course, you will not say you have dried up that river, though some that come and look into the old channel may think, perhaps, that the waters are utterly gone. So is it in this case. The streams of sin, it may be, run in open sensuality and profaneness, in drunkenness and viciousness; the preaching of the law sets a dam against these courses,—conscience is terrified, and the man dares not walk in the ways wherein he has been formerly engaged. His companions in sin, not finding him in his old ways, begin to laugh at him, as one that is converted and growing precise; professors themselves begin to be persuaded that the work of God is upon his heart, because they see his old streams dried up; but if there has been only a work of the law upon him, there is a dam put to his course, but the spring of sin is not dried up, only the streams of it are turned another way. It may be the man is fallen upon other more secret or more spiritual sins; or if he be beat from them also, the whole strength of lust and sin will take up its residence in self-righteousness, and pour out thereby as filthy streams as in any other way whatever. So that, notwithstanding the whole work of the law upon the souls of men, indwelling sin will keep alive in them still.

(4.) The reason of its inability to sanctify us.

(3210.) To the law there belongs a native power and efficiency, in all its lessons and all its enforcements, which is admirably fitted to work out a righteousness on the character of those to whom it is addressed. For this purpose, there is no want of force or of fitness in the agent; but there may be a want of fitness in the subject upon which it operates. It is no reflection on the penmanship of a beautiful writer, that he can give no adequate specimen of his art on the coarse or absorbent paper which will take on no fair impression of the character that he traces upon its surface. Nor is it any reflection on the power of an accomplished artist, that he can raise no monument thereof from the stone that crumbles at every touch, and so is incapable of being moulded into the exquisite form of his own faultless and finished idea. And so of the law, when it attempts to realise a portrait of moral excellence on the groundwork of our nature. It is because of the groundwork, and not of the law, that the attempt has failed; and so when Paul tells us of what the law could not do, lest we should be left to imagine that this was from any want of force or capacity in the law, he adds, "In that it was weak through the flesh" (Rom. viii. 3.)

—Chalmers, 1780-1847.

V. THE MOSAIC LAW.

1. Its benevolence.

(3211.) Men criticise the law in the Old Covenant which bids put out "an eye for an eye" and "a tooth for a tooth;" and straightway they insult and say, "Why, how can He be good who speaks so?"

What, then, do we say in answer to this? That it is the highest kind of philanthropy. For He made this law, not that we might strike out one another's eyes, but that fear of suffering by others might restrain us from doing any such thing to them. As, therefore, He threatened the Ninevites with overthrow, not that He might destroy them (for had that been His will He ought to have been silent), but that He might by fear make them better, and so quiet His wrath; so also has He appointed a punishment for those who wantonly assail the eyes of others, that if good principle dispose them not to refrain from such cruelty, fear may restrain them from injuring their neighbour's sight.

And if this be cruelty, it is cruelty also for the murderer to be restrained, and the adulterer checked. But these are the sayings of senseless men, and of those that are mad to the extreme of madness. For I, so far from saying that this comes of cruelty, should say, that the contrary to this would be unlawful, according to men's reckoning. And whereas thou sayest, "Because He commanded to pluck out 'an eye for an eye,' therefore He is cruel;" I say, that if He had not given this commandment, then He would have seemed, in the judgment of most men, to be that thou sayest He is.

For let us suppose that this law had been altogether done away, and that no one feared the punishment ensuing thereupon, but that license had been given to all the wicked to follow their own disposition in all security, to adulterers, and to murderers, to perjured persons, and to parricides; would not all things have been turned upside down? Would not cities, market-places, and houses, sea and land, and the whole world, have been filled with unnumbered pollutions and murders? Every one sees it. For if, when there are laws, and fear, and threatening, our evil dispositions are hardly checked; were even this security taken away, what is there to prevent men's choosing vice? and what degree of mischief would not then come revelling upon the whole of human life?

The rather, since cruelty lies not only in allowing the bad to do what they will, but in another thing quite as much; to overlook, and leave uncared for, him who has done no wrong, but who is without cause or reason suffering it. For tell me, were any one to gather together wicked men from all quarters, and arm them with swords, and bid them go about the whole city, and massacre all that came in their way, could there be anything more like a wild beast than he? And what if some other should bind and confine with the utmost strictness those whom that man had armed, and should snatch from those lawless hands them who were on the point of being butchered, could anything be greater humanity than this?

Now then, I bid thee transfer these examples to the law likewise; for He that commands to pluck out "an eye for an eye," has laid the fear as a kind of strong chain on the souls of the bad, and so resembles him who detains these assassins in prison; whereas he who appoints no punishment for them, all but arms them by such security, and acts the part of that other, who was putting the swords in their hands, and letting them loose over the whole city.

Seest thou not, how the commandments, so far from coming of cruelty, come rather of abounding mercy?
—Chrysostom, 347-407.

(3212.) Now, what does the law say about revenge? Does it allow it? Does it approve it? Does it exhort men to exact an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth? Not at all; just the contrary.

The law does indeed speak about exacting an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, but this was to be done by the magistrate, and as the extreme penalty of the law. This very enactment was directed against private and indiscriminate vengeance. It no longer left men to be judges in their own causes and fixed the extreme limit of the punishment. The English statute-book says that burglary is punishable with transportation, but this does not mean that every convicted burglar must be transported. It means that he may be transported, and that he must not be hanged. So in the Mosaic statute-book, "a tooth for a tooth, an eye for an eye," means that the judge might exact that penalty, but nothing more.
—R. A. Bertram.

(3213.) The law of Moses, with its strict commands and stern punishments, was not an organised tyranny over the consciences of men: it was the means of bringing them back to a sane state, to a complete consciousness. It set up and kept before them the claims of God and of conscience. When once they had confessed that sin was in them, and that the wages of sin is death, then the work for which the law was appointed was done. It was a great system, having for its one object to bring men to confess. But that act of confession restored men to themselves, gave them back their own nature; reminded them of three words which they were too pleased to forget,—of God, of duty, of hereafter. The physician that sees upon a patient the symptoms of a perilous disease, of which the patient knows nothing, that sees him eating the most baneful food, and courting the airs that are to such an ailment most destructive, does well to lay his hand upon his arm, and tell him, though the sufferer's cheek grow white before him, that the poison is there, undermining his life. He is not a malignant enemy for whispering, "The path you are walking on leads to sure death." If the tidings, harsh as they are, give the man a sense of his real position, if they save him from acting like a madman, and set him thinking upon the means of recovery, they are the words of a friend. And such a friend to man was the law of Moses.

—Archbishop Thomson.

2. Its suitableness for its season.

(3214.) God was pleased for a long time to dispense the Covenant of His grace to the Church of the Jews by many ceremonies, types, and figures, because this kind of teaching was the more fit for that infantine, puerile state of the Church. They were to be instructed by the sight of their eyes as well as by the hearing of their ears. It has been God's method to carry on His Church gradually from a lesser degree of light to a greater degree (Heb. i. 1). Children are taught first the letters, then to spell, and afterwards to read. God would have His Church to begin with the spelling-book of types and ceremonies, and so to be brought on to a higher form, and to a more spiritual way of teaching. When little children are taught to go, their mothers or nurses first lead them by the arms, get standing stools for them, that so they may afterwards go of themselves. God was pleased to use this method to the Church of the Jews; He provided the standing stool for them as being most suitable to their puny state. The apostle gives this reason for this way of teaching the Church (Gal. iv. 1-3): the Church was not then come to its full age, it was in its long coats, and therefore it was kept in bondage under those worldly rudiments, as the young heir is under tutors and governors, until he come to a perfect man.
—Robinson, 1599.

3. A preparation for Christianity.

(3215.) You may perhaps, by examining, be able to find a stalk of wheat that has but a single kernel. Now the stately growth of straw, the beautiful form of the head, the closely-packed array of husk, are all for the sake of the kernel within. The head of the wheat shoots out into beauty, and almost in a day attains a perfect form. But closely enveloped in the very centre of the ear, if you dissect it, you will find the smallest bulb, a mere point, discoverable only by careful search, and yet that bulb is the only important thing in the whole; that is the child of promise; all else to be thrown away; by that the life of the world is to be sustained. Nevertheless, the husk is for weeks of the utmost importance; it is to protect the kernel, wrap it up as a mother does a child, from evening damps, from noon-day heats, from drenching rain, from withering frosts. Here, then, are two counter processes. The husk springs at once to full life, but soon enters on its period of decay; the parts are early detached from each other; it loses its beauty of form, loses utility, and in harvest is rudely torn off and scattered as worthless chaff. The kernel begins in feebleness, on the summit of which it is lodged, but it increases while the husk decreases; it grows to a fulness and rotundity that crowds off its swaddling clothes, and in its maturity it is garnered with the most scrupulous care, while its pretentious and gay envelopment is left to be trodden under foot, having accomplished its mission in bringing to perfection the modest and concealed grain that nestled within its folds.

This counter process, one part increasing as the other decays, one perfect when the other is at its point of greatest imperfection, is a process found in all the works of nature, and in all the providential arrangements of the universe. It seems to be the universal method of the divine working. In no part of revelation, however, is this method more obvious than in the two laws which God has ordained, known as the ceremonial law and the moral law. These two laws are one. The former was for the sake of the latter. It was the husk in which the rule of morals and the law of love came to perfection.

At Mount Sinai God ordained certain imposing ceremonies, after a pattern shown to Moses in the mount. The symbols of a mysterious religion were arrayed in stately forms, to arrest the eye and captivate the imagination. There was the tabernacle, wrapped in gorgeous curtains, and scarlet, and purple, and fine-twined linen, wrought with cherubim and cunning work; there were curtains of goat's hair; and badger's skins dyed red like flowing robes adown its sides and along the ground; there was an entrance vail to conceal the sanctuary from all vulgar gaze; there was a partition vail to secure the most holy place from even priestly eyes; there was a golden candlestick, with its seven unquenchable fires; there was a table of shewbread; there was an ark, and a mercy-seat with cherubim upon it, and the visible Shechinah, the fiery presence of God; there was the court of the tabernacle, an enclosure for the Israelites within fine-wrought curtains, hanging upon bars and posts of precious wood joined by sockets of silver; there was an altar of sacrifice, on which victims to the Divine Ruler sent up the propitiation of life offered for sin; there were instituted imposing forms of priestly pomp, and long-stoled officials with teraphim, phylactery, and ephod moved grandly through their appointed functions, fulfilling a mission appointed them of heaven. We can but look on all this array with admiration—silver and gold, purple and scarlet, the burning oil and the lives of oxen, sheep, and goats, and the orders of consecrated priests were not too gorgeous or too costly an envelope in which to convey to after ages God's message of love to men.

But within the most holy place, concealed in an ark, externally of great beauty and expense, overlaid with gold, were two tables of stone, written over with a few brief sentences by the finger of God. Thus closely enveloped from view was the kernel which was to grow to maturity, and become the food of the world. It seemed the barest point now, hardly a speck within its gorgeous husk. The world would have looked on the revelation of God, and not have noticed this as a part of it. The Jews were delighted with their ritual, and did not know which part was to decay, which is to come to maturity, and be the fruit, the bread of God, that came down from heaven. They were right in looking on all this as one revelation, but they found the value in the husk, while it was the ten commandments hidden in the ark that were the substance and the soul of the divine teaching.

Through all the discipline of the Jews the law ruling over the heart, the law of morals, was continually making its worth felt. The prophets and the Psalmist soon learned to believe it of more importance than ritual service; to do justice and love mercy they learned to estimate as of more value than thousands of sacrifices, and ten thousands of rivers of oil; the husk was slowly, gradually disengaged from its content; the age of its decay began; the effects of age were visible; Judaism was falling in contempt, when suddenly there emerged from the golden ark, the law in its full maturity—Jesus Christ—the law drawn out in living characters. He burst the shell of formalism. He scattered the swathing bands of religion as chaff in the wind. He stood forth Himself, as the only real revelation, the fruit that had been so long coming to maturity, the bread of God that descended from heaven. The ten commandments were the point toward which all God's revelation centered; they were the salient point from which God's power in the earth went forth, and round which His revelation ensphered itself, forming a body, yet a spiritual body—Jesus Christ the Righteous. Henceforth Jesus Christ is our revelation and our religion; all we can know of God centres in Him; from Him you may go, by a direct line of connection, to all that is divine in the world: "Thou hast created all things, and for Thy pleasure they are and were created."

—G. N. Boardman.

4. Compared with Christianity.

(3216.) The new law is better than the old. You may compare these two laws or covenants in this way. Think of a city which has been the scene of great outbreaks and tumults, so that soldiers are sent there, and martial law proclaimed, and the very first token of disaffection is most severely punished. Men are not allowed to wear certain colours in their dress, nor to play the tunes of certain songs, nor to be abroad late at night, because suspicion attaches to all these things. Such a condition is a hard one, and yet a useful and beneficent one. It is hard, because it is full of suspicion and repression, and because its rules are vexatious and its punishments prompt and inexorable. But it is useful too, because the worst evil in a city is disorder, and that is checked, and the well-disposed can pursue their callings, and rapine and murder dare not show their face. Now that is like the Mosaic law. It is a sore burden in one point of view, because its rules are many and troublesome, so that no man can keep them all: and they are checks to our free action, and we would rather be free from them altogether. But the law was also holy and good; yes, precious beyond all precious things that God had yet given His creatures; because it showed that over our tumultuous race there was still a living Jehovah, and that He hated disorder, which is sin, and would not suffer it to endure. It did not make the Jews holy, or well-affected towards their great King. But it did wonders for them in that respect, when you set them beside other nations. Others hewed idols out of every tree and every quarry, and studied sensual wickedness with an abstruse and hideous ingenuity. Amongst the Jews was ever present a true, and a prevailing witness for the one God, and against the sins which He abhorred, and they were saved thereby from idolatry and from infinite excess. But now imagine that in that city, with its silent streets and watchful sentries, there is a happy home, where a kind and wise father governs his children by the mere force of love. None of them wishes to conceal a thought from their father ; they have no fear of him ; they ask his advice in all things ; they love the room where he sits ; they are ashamed when they have done anything that brings a look of pain into his face. In that house, though there reigns far more peace than in the city without, no one thinks that there is any law. Love is the life of that happy dwelling ; love is its light ; love has driven out of it corruption of morals and slavish fear. It wants no other law. That house, my friends, is an image of the kingdom of God. The law did much in preventing crime and idolatry, but to earnest souls there was an incurable void in it. The more they looked into and saw God's perfection, the more did they feel their own misery and deformity. It was like a poor, ragged leper, with his scales and blotches, standing in the doorway of a banqueting hall, and seeing all the fair and splendid apparel, all the noble and beautiful guests, and shrinking back miserable into the outside darkness, knowing that if he entered all would fall back in terror and disgust from him. The earnest man would say, "The law bids me to all that is good—would raise me to great heights of goodness, if I could love it and observe it. Unhappily, I cannot love it, and so fail to observe it." "Oh, wretched man that I am !" (these are St. Paul's words on the subject) "who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" St. Paul knew the answer, he only asks the question on purpose to answer it. The Lord had told him. "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden." Come unto me, that is, you in whom conscience has begun to work and struggle, and to try to deliver herself from the load of sin that sits on her bowed neck. "I will give you rest." I give you comfort in feeling that even sin is not too great for me to deal with. They should know Him as the divine Son, and yet their friend. They should feel that He had taken them by the hand and admitted them to all the love and the peace of the family of God. Jews brought near their divine Law-giver shook with terror. "If we hear the voice of the Lord God any more, we shall die." Christians, full of affection for their Lord, cling to Him in their trouble, and say, "Lord, to whom shall we go ? Thou hast the words of eternal life."

—Archbishop Thomson.

LIFE. HUMAN.

1. Its emblems.

(1.) A voyage.

(3217.) We are like vessels tossed on the bosom of the deep ; our passions are the winds that sweep us impetuously forward ; each pleasure is a rock, the whole of life is a wide ocean. Reason is the pilot to guide us ; but often it allows itself to be led astray by the storms of pride.

—Metastasio.

(2.) A pilgrimage.

(3218.) If men have been termed pilgrims, and life a journey, then we may add that the Christian pilgrimage far surpasses all others in the following important particulars :—in the goodness of the road—in the beauty of the prospects—in the excellence of the company—and in the vast superiority of the accommodation provided for the Christian traveller when he has finished his course.

—Salter.

(3219.) Here thou art but a stranger travelling to thy country ; it is therefore a huge folly to be afflicted because thou hast a less convenient inn to lodge in by the way.

—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

(3.) A drama.

(3220.) In a hundred years the world will still subsist in its entirety ; there will be the same theatre, and the same decorations ; there will no longer be the same actors. All who have been gladdened by some favour, or saddened and thrown into despair by a refusal, will have vanished from the scene. At this moment there are entering upon the theatre of life other men, who are going to play in a similar piece the same characters, they will vanish in their turn, and those who are not yet in existence will also be no more ; new actors have taken their place. What a mere mummer in a comedy is man !

—La Bruyère.

(4.) A rainbow.

(3221.) Life is like the rainbow ; it is a thing of sunshine, and it is a thing of showers.

2. Its limitations.

(3222.) "Nothing new under the sun." I compare life to a little wilderness, surrounded by a high dead wall. Within this space we muse and walk in quest of the new and happy, forgetting the insuperable limit, till, with surprise, we find ourselves stopped by the dead wall : we turn away, and muse and walk again, till, on another side, we find ourselves close against the dead wall. Which ever way we turn—still the same.

—John Foster, 1770-1843.

3. Is divinely ordered.

(3223.) Our life is a web woven by the hand of God, the thread reaching from our birth unto our death. The woof is trouble, but still runs with it a weft of interwoven comforts.

—Adams, 1653.

(3224.) If the architect of a house had one plan, and the contractor had another, what conflicts would there be ! How many walls would have to come down, how many doors and windows would need to be altered, before the two could harmonise ! Of the building of life, God is the architect, and man is the contractor. God has one plan, and man has another. Is it strange that there are clashings and collisions ?

—Becker.

(3225.) At an artist's reception one day I saw a picture of a mountain sunrise, and I wondered at its marvellous depths, richness, and splendour of shade and colour, till the artist told me how he had toned down the picture and softened its colouring into its subdued harmony of tint ; and I thought how often our life was growing to be like that picture of a mountain sunrise. God's unseen hand is before the easel, sketching here and shading there. The life-picture looks to us unfinished, fragmentary, and imperfect now, but each new joy-light, each sorrow-shade is toning it down through all its gloom and glory into harmony with God's great ideal. He will frame it at last in such a setting of events as He chooses, and we shall find in that great gallery above, that the light has been in the right place, and the shadow too.

(3226.) What do the Scriptures show, but that

God has a particular care for every man, a personal interest in him, and a sympathy with him and his trials, watching for the uses of his one talent as attentively and kindly, and approving him as heartily, in the right employment of it, as if He had given him ten; and, what is the giving out of the talents itself, but an exhibition of the fact that God has a definite purpose, charge, and work, be it this or that, for every man.

They also make it the privilege of every man to live in the secret guidance of God; which is plainly nugatory, unless there is some chosen work, or sphere, into which he may be guided, for how shall God guide him, having nothing appointed or marked out for him to be guided into? no field opened for him, no course set down which is to be his wisdom?

God also professes in His word to have purposes pre-arranged for all events; to govern by a plan which is from eternity even, and which, in some proper sense, comprehends everything. And what is this but another way of conceiving that God has a definite place and plan adjusted for every human being? And, without such a plan, He could not even govern the world intelligently, or make a proper universe of the created system; for it becomes a universe only in the grand unity of reason, which includes it. Otherwise, it were only a jumble of fortuitous without counsel, end, or law.

Turning now from the Scriptures to the works of God, how constantly are we met here by the fact, everywhere visible, that ends and uses are the regulative reasons of all existing things. This we discover often, when we are least able to understand the speculative mystery of objects; for it is precisely the uses of things that are most palpable. These are uses to God, no doubt, as to us, the significance of His works. And they compose, taken together, a grand reciprocal system, in which part answers actively to part, constructing thus an all-comprehensive and glorious whole. And the system is, in fact, so perfect, that the loss or displacement of any member would fatally derange the general order. If there were any smallest star in heaven that had no place to fill, that oversight would beget a disturbance which no Leverrier could compute; because it would be a real and eternal, and not merely casual or apparent disorder. One grain more or less of sand would disturb or even fatally disorder the whole scheme of the heavenly motions. So nicely balanced, and so carefully hung are the worlds, that even the grains of their dust are counted, and their places adjusted to a correspondent nicety. There is nothing included in the gross or total sum, that could be dispensed with. The same is true in regard to forces that are apparently irregular. Every particle of air is moved by laws of as great precision as the laws of the heavenly bodies, or, indeed, by the same laws; keeping its appointed place, and serving its appointed use. Every odour exhales in the nicest conformity with its appointed place and law. Even the viewless and mysterious heat, stealing through the dark centres and impenetrable depths of the worlds, obeys its uses with unflinching exactness, dissolving never so much as an atom that was not to be dissolved. What, now, shall we say of man, appearing, as it were, in the centre of this great circle of uses. They are all adjusted for him; has he, then, no ends appointed for himself? Noblest of all creatures, and closest to God, as he certainly is, are we to say that his Creator has no definite thoughts concerning him, no place prepared for him to fill, no use for him to serve which is the reason of his existence.

There is, then, I conclude, a definite and proper end or issue, for every man's existence; an end, which, to the heart of God, is the good intended for him, or for which he was intended; that which he is privileged to become, called to become, ought to become; that which God will assist him to become, and which he cannot miss, save by his own fault.

—Bushnell.

4. Importance of starting well.

(3227.) It is of vast moment to be "just right" when starting. At Preston, at Malines, at many such places the lines go gently asunder, so fine is the angle that at first the paths are almost parallel, and it seems of small moment which you select. But a little further on one of them turns a corner or dives into a tunnel, and now that the speed is full, the angle opens up, and, at the rate of a mile a minute, the divided convoy flies asunder; one passenger is on the way to Italy, another to the swamps of Holland; one will step out in London, the other in the Irish Channel. It is not enough that you book for the better country; you must keep the way, and a small deviation may send you entirely wrong. A slight deflection from honesty, a slight divergence from perfect truthfulness, from perfect sobriety, may throw you on a wrong tack altogether, and make a failure of that life which should have proved a comfort to your family, a credit to your country, a blessing to mankind.

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

5. Should not be dissipated in the pursuit of trifles.

(3228.) They who are most weary of life, and yet are most unwilling to die, are such who have lived to no purpose,—who have rather breathed than lived.

—Earl of Clarendon, 1608-1673.

(3229.) There are some pursuits which do not deserve to be called a business. Æropus was the king of Macedonia, and it was his favourite pursuit to make lanterns. Probably, he was very good at making them; but his proper business was to be a king, and therefore the more lanterns he made, the worse king he was. And if your work be a high calling, you must not dissipate your energies on trifles, on things which, lawful in themselves, are still as irrelevant to you as lamp-making is irrelevant to a king.

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

(3230.) You may be very earnest in a pursuit which is utterly beneath your prerogative as an intelligent creature, and your high destination as an immortal being. Pursuits which are perfectly proper in creatures destitute of reason may be very culpable in those who not only have reason but are capable of enjoyments above the range of reason itself.

We this instant imagined a man retaining all his consciousness transformed into a zoophyte. Let us imagine another similar transformation: fancy that, instead of a polypus, you were changed into a swallow. There you have a creature abundantly busy, up in the early morning, for ever on the wing, as graceful and sprightly in his flight as he is tasteful in the haunts which he selects. Look at him zigzagging over the clover-field, skimming the limpid lake, whirling round the steeple, or dancing gally in the sky. Behold him in high spirits, shrieking out his ecstasy as he has bolted a dragon-fly, or darted through the arrow-slits of the old turret, or performed some other feat of hirundine agility; and notice how he pays his morning visits, alighting elegantly on some house-top, and twittering politely by turns to the swallow on either side of him, and after five minutes' conversation, off and away to call for his friend at the castle. And now he has gone upon his travels, gone to spend the winter at Rome or Naples, to visit Egypt or the Holy Land, or perform some more recherché pilgrimage to Spain or the coast of Barbary. And when he comes home next April, sure enough he has been abroad;—charming climate—highly delighted with the cicadas in Italy, and the bees on Hymettus;—locusts in Africa rather scarce this season, but upon the whole much pleased with his trip, and returned in high health and spirits.

Now, dear friends, this is a very proper life for a bird of the air, but is it a life for you? To flit about from house to house; to pay futile visits, where, if the talk were written down, it would amount to little more than the chattering of a swallow; to bestow all your thoughts on graceful attitudes and nimble movements and polished attire; to roam from land to land with so little information in your head, or so little taste for the sublime or beautiful in your soul, that, could a swallow publish his travels, and did you publish yours, we should probably find the one a counterpart of the other; the winged traveller enlarging on the discomforts of his nest, and the wingless one on the miseries of his hotel or his chateau; you describing the places of amusement, or enlarging on the vastness of the country and the abundance of the game, and your rival eloquent on the self-same things. Oh! it is a thought, not ridiculous, but appalling. If the earthly history of some of our brethren were written down; if a faithful record were kept of the way they spend their time; if all the hours of idle vacancy or idler occupancy were put together, and the very small amount of useful diligence deducted, the life of a beast of the field or a fowl of the farmament would be a truer one—more worthy of its powers and more equal to its Creator's end in forming it. Such a register is kept. Though the trifler does not chronicle his own vain words and wasted hours, they chronicle themselves. They find their indelible place in that book of remembrance with which human hand cannot tamper, and from which no erasure save one can blot them out. They are noted in the memory of God. And when once this life of wondrous opportunities and awful advantages is over—when the twenty or fifty years of probation are fled away—when mortal existence, with its facilities for personal improvement and serviceableness to others, is gone beyond recall—when the trifter looks back to the long pilgrimage, with all the doors of hope and doors of usefulness past which he skipped in his frisky forgetfulness—what anguish will it move to think that he has gambolled through such a world without salvation to himself, without any real benefit to his brethren, a busy trifter, a vivacious idler, a clever fool!

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

(3231.) The mere lapse of years is not life. To eat, and drink, and sleep—to be exposed to darkness and the light,—to pace round in the mill of habit, and turn thought into an implement of trade, —this is not life. In all this but a poor fraction of the consciousness of humanity is awakened; and the sanctities will slumber which make it worth while to be. Knowledge, truth, love, beauty, goodness, faith, alone can give vitality to the mechanism of existence. The laugh of mirth that vibrates through the heart; the tears that freshen the dry wastes within; the music that brings childhood back; the prayer that calls the future near; the doubt which makes us meditate; the death which startles us with mystery; the hardship which forces us to struggle; the anxiety that ends in trust; are the true nourishment of our natural being.

—James Martineau.

6. Should be devoted to great purposes according to a settled plan.

(3232.) The end of life is to be like unto God; and the soul following God will be like unto Him; He being the beginning, middle, and end of all things.

—Socrates, B.C. 469-39.

(3233.) No life can be low where great ends are followed; and the spirit that will not work its mission within the trammel of circumstance will never be a true servant of that Master who came to found a kingdom of heaven upon earth, and who had to associate with Him in the work men of another spirit than His own, and even the traitor who sold away His life.

—J. H. Thoma.

(3234.) Men do not go on a journey aimlessly. No man goes out walking that he does not follow his thought. No man ever travels, and then ascertains where he has travelled to during the day. A traveller is one that marks out for himself the object for which he seeks. He selects a destination, and then travels with a distinct purpose toward it. No man ever builds accidentally, taking here a stone, and there a brick, and putting them down with the trowel and mortar by chance, and then looking to see what the sum of all his separate acts amounts to. It would amount to a confused heap, and to no building. One selects a place, he chooses a plan, he lays the foundation according to a prescribed idea, and then builds tier upon tier definitely and purposely.

And as it is with the industrial avocations of life, so it is with character and condition. Men ought not at least to live aimlessly, as travellers that follow their own footsteps, and not a plan that guides their footsteps; nor as builders that build chancedly, and not after a prescribed form. Men should have before them a distinct idea of character, of what it shall be, and of how it shall be formed. They should have a settled purpose of life.

—Beecher.

(3235.) A man's purpose of life should be like a river, which was born of a thousand little rills in the mountains; and when at last it has reached its manhood in the plain, though, if you watch it, you shall see little eddies that seem as if they had changed their minds, and were going back again to the mountains, yet all its mighty current flows, changeless, to the sea. If you build a dam across it, in a few hours it will go over it with a voice of victory. If tides check it at its mouth, it is only that when they ebb it can sweep on again to the ocean. So goes the Amazon or the Orinoco across a continent—never losing its way or changing its direction for the thousand streams that fall into it on the right hand and on the left, but only using them to increase its force, and bearing them onward in its resistless channel.

—Becher.

(3236.) In plan, include the whole : in execution, take life day by day. Men do not know how to reconcile the oppugnant directions that we should live for the future, and yet should find our life in fidelities to the present ; but the last is only the method of the first. True aiming, in life, is like true aiming in marksmanship. We always look at the fore-sight of a rifle through the hind-sight.

—Becher.

(3237.) It is no small thing for a man to have a rule in his mind by which to judge every part of his life, even though every part of his life may not always conform to that rule.

If you have stood by the pilot of a ship, and watched him as he steered it, you know that such is the build of the ship, such its equipoise, and such is the unequal motion given to it by the waves and winds, that no man can hold it exactly to its course. No sooner is it brought into steering line than it is carried to the right or to the left. One minute it is too far inland. The next minute it is too far in the opposite direction. The pilot is obliged to be constantly turning the wheel to meet the various forces that oppose him. The steering of a ship is marked by a succession of imperceptible zigzags ; a man's life certainly is whether a ship's steering is or not ; but where the voyage is as wide as the breast of the Atlantic, where it is the whole of our earthly existence, and where a man has a definite purpose which constitutes his steering line, and he comes to that in the end, it amounts to a straight voyage.

We see the same thing demonstrated in daily life. We see supreme purposes which men have formed running through their whole career in this world. A young man means to be a civil engineer. That is the thing to which his mind is made up : not his father's mind, perhaps, but his. He feels his adaptation to that calling, and his drawings toward it. He is young, forgetful, inexperienced, accessible to youthful sympathies, and is frequently drawn aside from his life-purpose. To-day he attends a picnic. Next week he devotes a day to some other excursion. Occasionally he loses a day in consequence of fatigue caused by overaction. Thus there is a link knocked out of the chain of this week, and a link knocked out of the chain of that week. And in the course of the summer he takes a whole week, or fortnight, out of that purpose. Yet, there is the thing in his mind, whether he sleeps or wakes. If you had asked him a month ago what he meant to be in life, he would have replied, "I mean to be a civil engineer." And if you ask him to-day what has been the tendency of his life, he will say, "I have been preparing myself to be a civil engineer." If he waits and does nothing, the reason is that he wants an opportunity to carry out his purpose. That purpose governs his course, and he will not engage in anything that would conflict with it.

Now, this sovereign purpose of a man to live for certain great moral principles and moral ends ; this sovereign purpose of a man to live for the eternal world ; this realisation by a man of God's existence and God's government ; this determination of a man to be governed by God's law—this is itself a settling of the soul in a way that lays the foundation for satisfaction and for peace. It gives singleness, simplicity, sincerity—for these three words cluster around the same central idea. It brings the whole life to aim at one thing ; it brings the whole mind under one government ; and however much the separate parts may rebel, it yet holds a man to one direction, and reduces all things to simple tests of right or wrong by a given and acknowledged standard ; but as age advances, victories are gained, education ripens into fixed habits, the very conflict ceases, and the whole body is full of light !

—Becher.

(3238.) What are you living for? You are hurrying and whirling forward at a tremendous rate, your brain teems with conceptions, your hand hardly knows a moment's rest, you pursue the hubbly, you jostle and compete and envy, you flatter and are flattered, you hoard and you dispense. What does it all mean? Who sketched the map by which you regulate your pilgrimage? What account can you give of yourself to those who ask the name of your guiding spirit? Take the subject in the light of everyday affairs, and the singular absurdity of not knowing on whose business you are engaged will instantly appear. You meet a traveller who is professedly in business ; you ask him what is his business, and he cannot answer ; you ask him whose interests he represents, and no reply is forthcoming ; you ask him whether he is bound, and he returns the inquiry with a look of vacancy ;—to what conclusion can you come respecting such a person? You instantly feel that the man is a child, and that the child has gone astray. The same thing holds true in the deeper and vaster concerns of life ; and he who is wisely and profoundly anxious to know on what basis he is proceeding in commercial transactions, should look beyond the mere detail, and face the great question—upon what principle is my intellectual, emotional, moral, and spiritual life proceeding?

—Joseph Parker.

(3239.) We very often miss the end of life by having no object before us. Years ago—when we were a boy, a pupil in an old frame schoolhouse by the foot of a hill to the south of the village—we went with a number of boys one afternoon in winter to have some sport. A meadow was distant half a mile away. A light snow had fallen, and the company desired to make the most of it. It was too dry for snow-balling, and was not deep enough for coasting. It did very well to make tracks in.

It was proposed that we should go to a tree, near the centre of the meadow, and that each one should start from the tree, and see who could make the straightest track—that is, to go from the tree in the nearest approach to a straight line. The proposition was assented to, and we were all soon at the tree. We ranged ourselves around it with our backs toward the trunk. We were equally distant from each other. If each had gone forward in the right line, the paths we made would have been like the spokes of a wheel, the tree representing the nave. We were to go till we reached the boundaries of the meadow, when we were to retrace our steps to the tree.

We did so. I wish I could give a map of our tracks. Such a map would not present much resemblance to the spokes of a wheel.

"Whose is the straightest?" asked James Alison of Thomas Saunders, who was at the tree first.

"Henry Armstrong's is the only one that is straight at all."

"That's a fact," said James. "They look more like snake tracks than straight lines."

"How could we all contrive to go so crookedly when the ground is so smooth, and nothing to turn us out of the way?" said Jacob Small.

"How did you come to go so straight, Henry?" said Thomas.

"I fixed my eye on that tall pine-tree on the hill yonder, and never looked away from it till I reached the fence."

"I went as straight as I could, without looking at anything but the ground," said James.

"So did I," said another.

"So did I," said several others. It appeared that no one but Henry had aimed at a particular object.

We attempted to go straight without any definite aim. We failed. So it will be with men for ever, who have no mark in view. General purposes, general resolutions, will not avail. Multitudes of Christians go through life without having led one single soul to Christ, and all because they never had a single aim to His glory.

7. The importance of having and maintaining an ideal standard of excellence.

(3240.) There are those that ridicule these conceptions, and ridicule every attempt of the young to live a higher life than the average life of those by whom they are surrounded. Why, yes, I see now how the woodbine is claspings and clinging and clambering over every object within its reach. Wherever it can find some old and unsightly tree, how it shoots toward it, and throws itself a generous cloak around about it; and from every branch clear to the top it holds out a thousand little flags of leaves, and rejoices in its triumphs and achievements. About the root, there is an old mullen, that stands laughing at the woodbine, and saying, "You are a brave climber; but as for myself, I do not pretend to aairs. I stand here a good, plain, sensible mullen; and you will not find me mounting to such dangerous heights." There is that fence. It was bare last year, and it is bare this year, and it would be bare to all eternity, for anything that a mullen would do to cover its nakedness. But a generous vine cannot see a stump, or a stake, or a tree, but that it mounts upon it, and begins to spread its beauty all over it. Do not let the mullen give counsel to the vine. The vine is right. These tendrils, that represent yearnings, and this out-putting nature and prodigality of growth, are right. Let the things that must needs hover on the surface of the ground grow according to their nature; but let no man laugh you out of your ideals by calling them sentimentalisms.

—Becher.

(3241.) There are those who have a clear conception of the possibilities of human development, and who bring enough of reason with their imagination to give definiteness and purpose to their ideals. In this class we all should seek to be found. They use imagination conjointly with reason, not merely to make fancy-pictures, but to draw rules and standards and conceptions after which they strive, seeking to fill up the whole mosaic of their lives—for, as in the old Byzantine churches, the artists drew upon the fresh wall the outline of glorious and gorgeous pictures, and then took bits of coloured glass, and, with long patience, filled up the picture, until at last the mosaic set and solidified in its bed. They brought out the lines and lineaments of saints and angels, and of divinity itself; so men that have sketched in the future some bright outline should occupy themselves with the details of life in filling it up, and forming the glorious mosaic.

—Becher.

(3242.) Do not suppose, when you have formed an ideal, that you have then fulfilled the main purposes of life. Be sure of one thing—that, of all vexatious masters, a worthy ideal is the most uncomfortable one to live with. It never flatters you. It never praises you. It is always rebuking you. It put spurs into your side. It lays the whip upon you. It never says, "Well done." That is to be said in the other life. It is a piteous thing to see how men try, in the midst of adverse circumstances, to follow their ideal.

In a dark and stormy night a ship sees, afar off, the shining of the lighthouse, which, as it plunges beneath the wave, is lost; and as, struggling and rolling the water off from its deck, it comes trembling up again on the reflux wave, it gets a glimpse once more, only to lose it. So, in this world, men that propose bright aims to themselves in the midst of the turmoils of passion, the strivings of pride, and the biases of self-interest, in all the whirl of sympathy, and in the discords of human example, find that they sometimes forget and sometimes violate their ideals; and the fight to maintain our ideals is almost as much as life itself is worth. You must frame your ideal; but after you have done that, you are like a man that makes a voyage. When you have marked the harbour, your work is not done. You have yet to bear hardness as good soldiers. Putting on your armour, you are to aim at things high and noble. And you must fight your way toward them through ten thousand hindrances. And only then shall you be crowned and laurelled when your victory is won, and you stand in Zion and before God.

—Becher.

(3243.) Let me beseech of you not to run upon one rock that is fatal to nobility. Because you have broken your purpose, do not allow it to go unattended. Even the heathen with so base a conception of divinity as Dagon was, when Dagon fell to the ground, lifted him up again and put him in his place. When, not your idol, but your bright ideal, falls to the ground, though its head and its feet be broken, lift it up and put it in its place again. Because you have broken faith and fealty to that which you meant to be, and meant to do, it is no reason why you should not swear again, and again go forward. There are those that begin life nobly, generously, purely; but that, as they experience the throes, and mischances, and pressures, and exigencies of life, and find that they cannot get along according to their ideals, resort to various expedients, the most fatal of which is to say, "I have set my mark too high. There is no such thing as disinterested benevolence. There is no such thing as living for spiritual ends. There is no such thing as purity with success." Men lower their ideal of life, their ideal of thought and feeling and character, and say, "I need not be so generous; I need not live according to such high precepts and maxims." But when a man lowers his ideal, you may be sure that the process of corruption is going on fast. "Let God be true, but every man a liar," is one of the sayings of Scripture. Let your ideal stand high and bright and pure, though by it every one of you is condemned, and cast down, as it were, to the very bottom of condemnation. Save that. Even though a man forsakes his purpose, though he is recreant to his ideal, though he through months and years goes knowingly wrong, let not his star set. If only there shines his polar star, when reason comes again, and the films of passion begin to clear away, he can take his observation once more, and resume his journey. But if his star has fallen he has nothing to steer by, and his voyage must end in shipwreck and disaster. Do not let your ideal go down. Keep that, like a star, bright, and pure, and high above the horizon; and then, though your voyage, though your labour, may intermit, you have that by which you can begin it again, and at whose sacred light you can kindle the quenched torch of your purposes. —Becher.

8. How nobility of life is to be attained.

(3244.) Every man's life lies within the present; for the past is spent and done with, and the future is uncertain. —Antoninus.

(3245.) Life is made up, not of great sacrifices or duties, but of little things, in which smiles and kindnesses and small obligations, given habitually, are what win and preserve the heart, and secure comfort. —Sir H. Davy, 1778-1829.

(3246.) Every man is to himself what Plato calls the Great Year. He has his sowing time and his growing time, his weeding, his irrigating, and his harvest. The principles and ideas he puts into his mind in youth lie there, it may be, for many years apparently unprolific. But nothing dies. There is a process going on unseen, and by the touch of circumstances the man springs forth into strength, he knows not why, as if by a miracle. But, after all, he only reaps as he had sown. —J. A. St. John.

(3247.) A noble and honourable life is not necessarily made up of great efforts—stupendous and exhausting attempts to achieve some dazzling victory—but of little acts of consideration, well-timed smiles of encouragement and hope, gentle words of sympathy, and generous interpretations of conduct. The sun does not wait until he can blaze forth in the pomp and glory of mid-day. First, the herald streak; the shaping off and fringing of the slumberous clouds; the purple beauty; the multiplying and conquering fire; until noon is king, and day has forgotten night. —Joseph Parker.

(3248.) Life is all great. Life is great because it is the aggregation of littles. As the chalk cliffs in the south, that rear themselves hundreds of feet above the crawling sea beneath, are all made up of the minute skeletons of microscopic animalcules, so life, mighty and awful, with its eternal consequences, life that towers beetling over the sea of eternity, is made up of trifling duties, of small tasks; and if thou art not "faithful in that which is least," thou art unfaithful in the whole. —Maclaren.

(3249.) See to it that each hour's feelings and thoughts and actions are pure and true; then will your life be such. The mightiest maze of magnificent harmonies that ever a Beethoven gave to the world, is but single notes, and all its complicated and interlacing strains are resolvable into individualities. The wide pasture is but separate spears of grass; the sheeted bloom of the prairies, but isolated flowers. —Becher.

(3250.) We sleep, but the loom of life never stops; and the pattern which was weaving when the sun went down is weaving when it comes up to-morrow. He who is false to present duty breaks a thread in the loom, and will find the flaw when he may have forgotten its cause. —Becher.

(3251.) You think that one hour buries another; but it is not so. You think that you have parted for ever from the things which have passed by you. No, you have not. There is much in your life that you think has gone which you never shall part from. It has stepped behind you; and there it waits. That which you have done is with you to-day; and that which you have done will be with you to-morrow. When the mason carries up the wall, the course of brick which he laid yesterday is the foundation on which he is laying another course to-day. And all that you do to-day on the structure which you are building will remain as a basis for that which you do to-morrow. —Becher.

9. "Seeing life."

(3252.) Those that are thoroughly arted in navigation do as well know the coasts as the ocean; as well the flaws, the sands, the shallows, and the rocks, as the secure depths in the most unperilous channel. So I think that those that are perfect men (I speak of perfection since the Fall) must as well know bad, that they may obtrude it, as the good, that they may embrace it. And this knowledge we can neither have so cheap, or so certain, as by seeing it in others with a pitiful dislike. Surely, we shall know virtue the better by seeing that which is not she. If we could pass the world without meeting vice, then the knowledge of virtue only were sufficient. But it is not possible to live and not encounter her. Vice is as a god in this world; whither can we go to fly it? It has a ubiquity, and rules too. I wish no man to know it, either by use or by intrusion; but being unwittingly cast upon it, let him observe for his own more safe direction. Thou art happy when thou makest another man's vices steps for thee to climb to heaven by. The wise physician makes the poison medicinal. Even the mud of the world, by the industrious Hollander, is turned to a useful fuel. If I light on good company, it shall either induce me to a new good, or confirm me in my liked old. If I light on bad, I will, by considering their dull stains, either correct those faults I have, or shun those I might have. As the mariner that has sea-room, can make any wind serve to set him forward in his wished voyage, so a wise man may take advantage from any company to set himself forward to virtue's region. —Felltham, 1668.

(3253.) As there is no feat of activity so difficult, but, being once done, a man ventures on it more freely the second time; so there is no sin at first so hateful, but, being once committed willingly, a man is made more prone for a reiteration. For there is more desire of a known pleasure, than of that which only our ears have heard report of. So far is ignorance good, that in a calm it keeps the mind from distraction; and knowledge, as it breeds desire in all things, so in sin. Bootless, therefore, shall ever be that cunning fetch of Satan, when he would induce me once to make a trial of sin, that I might thereby know more, and be able to fill up my mouth with discourse, my mind with fruition; bearing me in hand. I may at my pleasure give it the hand of parting, and a final farewell. Too often, alas! have I been deceived with this beguiling persuasion, of a power to leave, and a will to return at my will. Henceforth shall my care be to refrain from once. If I grant that, stronger persuasions will plead for a second action: it is easier to deny a guest at first, than to turn him out having stayed a while. Thou knowest not, senseless man, what joys thou lovest when thou fondly lashest into new offences. The world cannot repurchase thee thy pristine integrity: thou hast hereby lost such a hold of grace, as thou wilt never again be able to recover. A mind not conscious of any foul enormities is a fair temple in a dirty street; at whose door sin, like a throng of rude plebeians, knocks incessantly: while the door is shut, it is easy to keep it so, and them out: open that, but to let in one, thousands will rush in after him, and their trampings will for ever soil that unstained floor. While thy conscience is unspotted, thou hast that can make thee smile on the rack and amid flames; it is like Homer's Nephthe, that can banish the sadness of the mind; but when thou woundest that, thou buriest thy joys at once, and throwest a jewel from thee that is richer than the wealth of worlds. Fool that thou art, that, wandering in a dark wilderness, dost wilfully put out thy candle, and thinkest cold water can slake thy thirst in the burning fit of an ague; when it only breeds in thee a desire to pour in more. He that never tasted the pleasures of sin longs less after those baneful discontenting contents. What sweets of sin I know not, I desire still to be inexperienced in. I had rather not know, than by knowledge be miserable. This ignorance will teach me knowledge of an unknown peace. Let me rather be outwardly maimed, and want discourse, than be furnished of that, and possess a wound that bleeds within.

—Felltham, 1668.

(3254.) Hundreds of men are ruined by city exploration. They go to see for themselves. A man hears that lions are very dangerous. He says, "Is that so?" He opens the cage; and the monster with one stroke tells him, and with one craunch grinds up his skull. The lion never imagined that the man had come in to study natural history. Oh! the devil is mean. He says, "Come in and see." The man goes in to look for himself; the roaring lion grabs him, and he is gone. He learns human nature dearly who learns it at the risk of his immortal nature.

—Talmage.

(3255.) If there are any that have made up their mind to know life, I say to them, Stop! You may pay too dear for your knowledge. Men have looked into the crater of a volcano to see what is there, and gone down to explore, without coming back to report progress. Many and many a man has gone to see what was in hell, that did see it. Many and many a man has looked to see what was in the cup, and found a viper coiled up therein. Many and many a man has gone into the house of lust, and found that the ends thereof were death—bitter, rotten death. Many and many a man has sought to learn something of the evils of gambling, and learned it to his own ruin. And I say to every man, the more you know about these things, the more you ought to be ashamed of knowing; a knowledge of them is not necessary to education or manhood, and they ought to be avoided, because when a man has once fallen into them, the way out is so steep and hard. Many and many a man has begun to climb the giddy cliff of reformation; but, oh! how few have succeeded in getting over its brow! Methinks I see men sweltering in passions, and swimming out to the base of the cliff, and attempting to climb up. Some are higher than others. One after another falls back, or is plucked down by some fiendish hand. Some are half way up the cliff, and struggling hard to reach the top. Some turn ghastly pale when they look down at the abyss below; and they are filled with despair when they look up at the height above them. And where one goes over and is saved, ninety-nine fall back and are lost.

—Becher.

10. The love of life.

(3256.) The love of life is a powerful instinct. God has implanted it in the bosom wisely. And, during the natural years of life, this instinct holds us to it, as the stem holds an apple to the bough.

—Becher.

11. Long life.

(1.) The blessing of the godly.

(3257.) Long life and length of days is the blessing and gift of God, that which He promises and performs to all those who fear Him and walk in His ways.

Objection.—But many of the children of God die untimely, and live not long; how, then, is this true?

Answer.—This is not simply a blessing, as if he were happy that lives long, but as a symbol or sign of God's good favour and love. If, then, He shows His love to some rather by taking them out of this life, than by prolonging their days, He doth the rather perform His promise than break it. A man promises ten acres of ground in one field, and gives him a hundred in another, he has not broken his promise. So if God have promised long life, that is, a hundred years here, and after not give it him, but gives him eternity in the heavens, He has not broken His promise; for it not being promised as a blessing and happy thing in itself, but as a sign of His goodwill, which is greater sometimes to be taken out of this life; as Jeroboam's good son was, that he might not be infected with the sins of his father's house, and not afflicted with the sight of those horrible judgments that were to fall upon that graceless family; which was no ill bargain, to be taken from earth to heaven, from the conflict to the triumph, from the battle to the victory, from men to God, and to the company of His angels and saints.

—Stock, 1568-1626.

(2.) Is to the ungodly merely a reprieve.

(3258.) All mankind being condemned as soon as born, life is but a reprieve, a suspension of citation, a breathing time of mercy, a suspending of wrath—the sleeping of a storm, which is about to burst forth in floods of destruction on all who are not sheltered in Christ—it is the staying the almighty arm of Him who saith, "Vengeance is mine, I will repay." This is just what life is—a calm to usher in a mighty tempest.

12. How its length is to be estimated.

(3259.) Life is not to be numbered by its hours, but measured by cheerfulness, as moneys not by tale but value. A little piece of gold contains a great many pieces of silver. Manhood consists not in the bulk of bones, but in the mettle and spirits. Is not one week of a healthy man better than a year of a crazy; one sunshine hour, than a gloomy day? I have often mused how a man might come nearest to that life which Adam lost, and recompense in this latter age of the world (wherein the lives of men are so contracted) the longevity of those that lived before the flood. And this is the best help I find: to live well is to live twice. A good man doubles and amplifies his days; one may speak as much in a few words as another in many. Persius wrote more in a few leaves than Marsius in large volumes. One day led by the rules of faith is better than an immortality of vanity.

—Ward, 1577-1639.

(3260.) Life is to be measured by action, not by time; a man may die old at thirty, and young at eighty; nay, the one lives after death, and the other perished before he died.

—T. Fuller, 1608-1661.

(3261.) Seventy years of life may be much more important, and may, for all the purposes of living, be much longer at one period of the world than another. It is much more so now than it ever was or could be among savage tribes; than it was in ancient Egypt or Assyria; than it was or is in India or in China; than it was in Scotland, in England, in France, or in Germany previous to the Reformation; than it was in our own country during the last century. The discoveries which have been made in our own times—the inventions and improvements in the arts of living—have been equivalent to making life twice or thrice or four times as long as it once was. A man whose business it is to travel, who can pass over as much in his journey now in one hour as would on a camel, or on a horse, or on foot have occupied twelve hours, has in this respect added eleven hours in such a journey to his life. The unconscious powers of nature now accomplish a large part of what was done by human muscles, and do it better than it could have been done by the unaided hand of man. The mere lengthening of life to the period of Methuselah would not in itself be equivalent to what has been gained in this manner; and, for all the purposes of living, human life is now incomparably longer than it was in the time of the antediluvian patriarchs.

—Albert Barnes, 1790-1870.

(3262.) An eminent divine was suffering under chronic disease, and consulted three physicians. They declared, on being consulted by the sick man, that his disease would be followed by death in a shorter or longer time, according to the manner in which he lived; but they unanimously advised him to give up his office because, in his situation, mental agitation would be fatal to him.

"If," inquired the divine, "I gave myself up to repose, how long, gentlemen, would you guarantee my life?"

"Probably six years," answered the doctors.

"And if I continue in office?"

"Three years, at most."

"Your servant, gentlemen," he replied; "I should prefer living two or three years in doing some good to living six years in idleness."

13. Its brevity.

(3263.) My life is like the autumn leaf

That trembles in the moon's pale ray,

Its hold is frail—its date is brief,

Restless—and soon to pass away!

—R. H. Wilde.

(3264.) If a company that are bound out for some long voyage should strive who should be master and who master's mate, and who should have this or that office, they were not too much to be blamed; but when they are almost at home, within sight of land, when they shall begin to strike sail, to tack in all and go ashore, then, if they shall fall a-quarrelling for places, and use all the means they could make, it were a ridiculous thing. So it is with us; time was when a man came into the world by the course of nature, he might well say, "I have a matter of six, or seven, or eight hundred years to go on in my pilgrimage before I shall end my journey," and then if a man should greet the world, he might be excused. But now, since God hath contracted the time of our age, so that as soon as we begin our voyage we are ready to strike sail presently, that we have but a little time to continue here and a great deal of work to do for hereafter, to stand striving who shall be greatest, who shall rule all, to cry out of afflictions just when we are going ashore, is extreme folly and madness.

—Spencer, 1658.

(3265.) Though we seem grieved at the shortness of life in general, we are wishing every period of it at an end: the minor longs to be at age; then to be a man of business; then to make up an estate; then to arrive at honours; then to retire.

—Addison, 1672-1719.

(3266.) With a telescope directed towards one end of things created, and a microscope towards the other, we sigh to think how short is life, and how long is the list of acquirable knowledge. Alas! what is man in the nineteenth century! It is provoking that, now we have the means of learning most, we have the least time to learn it in. If we had but the longevity of the antediluvian patriarchs, we might have some hope, not of completing our education, but of passing a respectable previous examination prior to our admittance into a higher school.

—Household Words.

(3267.) How brief it is! Who stood sentinel by the gate of Shushan when the royal couriers, bearing hope to the Jews, dashed through, burying their spurs in their horses' flanks—who lately stood on the platform by the iron rails that stretch from Holyhead to London, when, signals flashed on along the line to stop the traffic and keep all clear, an engine and carriage dashed by with tidings of peace or war from America—saw an image of our life. The eagle poising herself a moment on the wing, and then rushing at her prey; the ship that, throwing the spray from her bows, scuds before the gale; the shuttle flashing through the loom; the shadow of a cloud sweeping the hill-side, and then gone for ever, nor leaving a trace behind; the summer flowers that vanishing, have left our gardens bare, and where were spread out the colours of the rainbow, only dull, black earth, or the rotting wrecks of beauty—these, with many other fleeting things, are emblems by which God through nature teaches us how frail we are; at the longest, how short our days. What need, therefore, there is to seize the passing moments—seeking the Lord while He is to be found. —Guthrie.

(3568.) Life, like a little lamp whose oil quickly consumes, is rapidly wasting away. Ever and anon we are deeply conscious of this. Not seldom time seems too fast for us. As a traveller journeying by express train is aroused from his sleep by arriving at his destination and exclaims, "I have got here sooner than I expected;" so are we tempted to exclaim as we reached various resting-places during life's pilgrimage. Certain stations come sooner than we thought they would. On birthdays, new years' days, and other anniversaries, we feel that we have "got there sooner than we expected."

—T. R. Stevenson.

14. Its vanity.

(3269.) Life consists not of a series of illustrious actions or elegant enjoyments: the greater part of our time passes in compliance with necessities, in the performance of daily duties, in the removal of small inconveniences, in the procurement of petty pleasures; and we are well or ill at ease as the main stream of life glides on smoothly, or is ruffled by small obstacles and frequent observation.

—Dr. S. Johnson, 1709-1784.

(3270.) My life is like the summer rose

That opens to the morning sky,
But ere the shades of evening close,
Is scatter'd on the ground—to die:

My life is like the prints which feet
Have left on Tampa's desert strand;
Soon as the rising tide shall beat,
All trace will vanish from the sand.

—R. H. Wilde.

15. Its uncertainty and transitoriness.

(3271.) Life is a dream, and a scene; and as on the stage when the scene is shifted the various pageants disappear, and as dreams flit away when the sunbeams rise, so here when the end comes, whether the universal or that of each one, all is dissolved and vanishes away. The tree that you have planted remains, and the house that you have built, it too stands on. But the planter and the builder go away, and perish.

—Chrysostom, 347-407.

(3272.) Like as one in a ship, whether he sit, stand, awake or asleep, is ever still carried forward, although he mark it not greatly, neither feel it; so our life is a continual motion, doth every twinkling of an eye steal forth, and privily creep to the end, though we mark not how the time passeth. David saith, "Our time goeth forth swiftly, as though we did fly." As if he would say, There can nothing run or fly away more swiftly. And Sirac saith, "Remember that death tarrieth not." Paul saith, "I die daily." For even "in the midst of life we are in death," yea, death daily, as soon as we are born, taketh away somewhat of our life. After this meaning writeth Augustine, "The time of this life is nothing else but a rounding unto death."

—Wermullerus, 1551.

(3273.) As it is with a man, being come to some great fair or market, with a considerable sum of money about him, who whilst he is walking in the throng, considering with himself how he should lay out his money to the best advantage, some sly fellow either cuts his purse or at unawares dives into his pocket, and there is an end of all his marketing; so it is with most men, that whilst they are in the midst of all their secular employments, and, as it were, crowded in the throng of worldly contrivances, how to secure such a ship, advantage, trade, compass such and such a bargain, purchase such and such lands, &c. (things in themselves with necessary cautions not unlawful), in steps death, cuts the thread of their life, spoils all their trade, and lays their glory in the dust.

—Marshall, 1655.

(3274.) Though in the course of undisturbed nature, young men may live longer than the old, yet nature hath so many disturbances and crosses, that our lives are still like a candle in a broken lanthorn, which a blast of wind may soon blow out.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

16. Its close.

(3275.) Life's evening, we may rest assured, will take its character from the day which has preceded it; and if we would close our career in the comfort of religious hope, we must prepare for it by early and continuous religious habit.

—Shuttleworth.

(3276.) You gladly now see life before you, but there is a moment which you are destined to meet when you will have passed across it and will find yourself at the farther edge. Are you perfectly certain that at that moment you will be in possession of something that will enable you not to care that life is gone? If you should not, what then?

—John Foster, 1770-1843.

(3277.) William the Conqueror established the ringing of curfew bells. The meaning of that curfew bell, sounded at eventime, was, that all the fires should be put out or covered with ashes, all the lights should be extinguished, and the people should go to bed. Soon for us the curfew will sound. The fires of our life will be banked up in ashes, and we shall go into the sleep, the long sleep, the cool sleep, I hope, the blessed sleep. But there is no gloom in that if we are ready.

—Talmage.

17. Its relation to eternity.

(3278.) This life was not intended to be the place of our perfection, but the preparation for it. As the fruit is far from ripeness in the first appearance, or the flower while it is but in the husk or bud; or the oak when it is but an acorn, or any plant when it is but in the seed; no more is the very nature of man upon earth. As the infant is not perfect in the womb, nor the chicken in the shell, no more are our natures perfect in this world.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(3279.) Natural life is like the river Jordan, empties itself into the Dead Sea; but spiritual life is like the waters of the sanctuary, which, being shallow at the first, grow deeper and deeper into a river, which cannot be passed through: water continually springing, and running forward into eternal life; so that the life which we leave is mortal and perishing, and that which we go into is durable and abounding.

—Salter.

(3280.) Considered as a state of probation, our present condition loses all its inherent meanness; it derives a moral grandeur even from the shortness of its duration, when viewed as a contest for an immortal crown, in which the candidates are exhibited on a theatre, a spectacle to beings of the highest order, who, conscious of the tremendous importance of the issue, of the magnitude of the interest at stake, survey the combatants from on high with benevolent and trembling solicitude.

—Robert Hall, 1764-1831.

(3281.) There are some who say, "What use is there in doing anything in this world? It scarcely seems worth while, in this brief span of life, to try to do anything." A man is placed in a high situation, receives an expensive education at school and college, and a still more expensive one of time and experience. And then, just when we think all this ripe wisdom, garnered up from so many fields, shall find its fullest use, we hear that all is over, he has passed from among us, and then the question, hideous in its suggestiveness, arises, "Why was he then more wise?"

Asked from this world's stand-point—if there is no life beyond the grave, if there is no immortality, if all spiritual calculation is to end here, why then, the mighty work of God is all to end in nothingness: but if this is only a state of infancy, only the education for eternity, in which the soul is to gain its wisdom and experience for higher work, then to ask why such a mind is taken from us, is just as absurd as to question why the tree of the forest has its first training in the nursery garden. This is but the nursery ground, from whence we are to be transplanted into the great forest of God's eternal universe.

—Robertson, 1816-1853.

(3282.) The one thing which saves this life from being contemptible is the thought of another. The more profoundly we feel the reality of the great eternity whither we are being drawn, the greater do all things here become. They are made less in their power to absorb or trouble, but they are made infinitely greater in importance as preparations for what is beyond. When they are first they are small, when they are second they are great. When the mist lifts and shows the summits of the "mountains of God," the nearer lower ranges, which we thought the highest, dwindle indeed, but gain in sublimity and meaning by the loftier peaks to which they lead up. Unless men and women live for eternity they are "merely players," and all their busy days "like a tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing." How absurd, how monotonous, how trivial it all is, all this fret and fume, all these dying joys and only less fleeting pains, all this mill-horse round of work which we pace, unless we are, mill-horse like, driving a shaft that goes through the wall, and grinds something that falls into "bags that wax not old" on the other side. The true Christian faith teaches us that this is the workshop where God makes men, and the next the palace where He shows them. All here is apprenticeship and training. It is of no more value than the attitudes into which gymnasts throw themselves, but as a discipline most precious. The end makes the means important; and if we believe that God is preparing us for immortal life with Him by all our work, then we shall do it with a will; otherwise we may well be languid as we go on for thirty or forty years, some of us doing the same trivial things, and getting nothing out of them but food, occupation of time, and a mechanical aptitude for what is not worth doing.

It is the horizon that gives dignity to the foreground; a picture without sky has no glory. This present, unless we see gleaming beyond it the eternal calm of the heavens above the tossing tree-tops with withering leaves, and the smoky chimneys, is a poor thing for our eyes to gaze at, or our hearts to love, or our hands to toil on. But when we see that all paths lead to heaven, and that our eternity is affected by our acts in time, then it is blessed to gaze, it is possible to love the earthly shadows of the uncreated beauty, it is worth while to work.

—MacLaren.

(3283.) This eternal life hangs on the small thread of the present. As we are now, so shall we be for ever. Eternal life is a synonym for character. "The child," it is said, "is the father of the man." This has a more solemn and awful—a more significant and truthful meaning with regard to a world to come. The childhood of time will determine the manhood of eternity. The passing moments of the present will colour the infinite future. Life in this world is the cartoon—the dim shadowy outline—which will be filled up and embodied in the life hereafter.

—Macduff.

(3284.) Men are seeking for only this life. A short life it is, and exceedingly imperfect and rudimentary, at best. It is like a road, which is good for travelling, but poor for sleeping. This world is magnificent for strangers and pilgrims, but miserable for residents. The very moment a man carries himself as though this were his home, and begins to build as though he would live here, that moment the world is not a fit place for a temporary residence for him. It is only when a man considers this world as a school-house, and not a dwelling, that it will serve the purpose it was intended to serve. The academy is not a place to live in. We go into it that in due time we may come out prepared for a higher sphere. What the anvil and the blacksmith's shop are to the sword of the warrior, that this world and its instrumentalities are to us. We are forged here to be used hereafter. We are to receive our perfect selves, and to come to the fruition of ourselves, only when God shall open the door of this world, and let us out. We are like a ship that, being built, lies high and dry, and whose sea-going qualities cannot be known till she is launched upon the ocean. We do not know our own powers. When at death we are launched upon the sea of eternal life, then we shall know what we are.

—Becker.

(3285.) A man who makes calculation and provision for this life only, is like the sea captain who, starting on a voyage to Europe, lays in provisions sufficient to last him only until he gets safe past the lighthouse, and out into the open sea.

—Becker

(3286.) Man is a creature of two worlds. In this world he is at his least estate. There be plants that require two summers to grow in. They make their root in the first one. They make their blossom in the second. And no man can wisely treat such a plant as that, who treats it only for one summer. The hollyhock is a familiar instance. If you plant the seed now, no amount of nourishment shall drive it forward to blossom before the frost overtakes it. You have leaves the first season, and that is all. But if you carry it through the winter, knowing its double nature, nourishing it and strengthening it, and planting it again in the coming spring, you shall see it lift up its gorgeous spire, stately and glowing, among the noblest objects of beauty in the garden.

Man is a creature that grows by leaf and root in this life only; and he that has an ideal of life that encompasses only this life, lives only for leaves. No man lives for blossoms that does not take in two lives, and that has not in his ideal, therefore, not only the elements that give respectability and standing here, but the elements that give dignity, and power, and spiritual purity in the life that is to come.

—Beecher.

(3287.) You have seen the tiny blossom of the fruit-tree opening in early spring. After basking a few days in the sun, it fades and falls. A germ is left behind on the branch, but it is scarcely discernible among the leaves. It is a green micro-copic speck that can scarcely be felt between your fingers. If a hungry man should pluck and eat it, the morsel would not satisfy. Although he dreams of eating, when he awakes his soul is empty. The germ, as to present use, is a sapless, tasteless nothing. Grasped now as an object and end, it is the most worthless of all things; but left and cherished as the germ of fruit, it is most precious. According as it fades or thrives will the husbandman have joy or sorrow in the harvest.

This life is the bud of eternity; if it is plucked and used as the portion of a soul, that soul will be empty now, and empty for ever. If the husbandman should gather all the germs green, while they are tiny, tasteless atoms hidden among the leaves, he would be disappointed at the time, and destitute at last. He would gather worthless things in spring, and have nothing to gather in harvest. This life, taken and used as the portion of an immortal being, is green and sour and hurtful. If you pluck it at this stage, you will taste no real sweetness at the time, and possess no ripened store at last. But while the present world thus abused is worthless, rightly used it is beyond all price. Here is generated, cherished, ripened, the life that will never die.

—Arnol.

18. Reviewed.

(3288.) In the years that are past, what have we done for God? We have had many, daily, innumerable, opportunities of serving Him, speaking for Him, working for Him, not sparing ourselves for Him who spared not His own Son for us. Yet, how little have we attempted; and how much less have we done in the spirit of our Saviour's words, Wist ye not that I must be about My Father's business? In the golden sheaves of harvests the soil, grateful for favours, returns to the husbandman all that it gets; and by the mouths of its ten thousand rivers the earth gives back her treasures to the sea—and hence the sea is always full. But how poor the return we have made to God! There is no moor in our country so barren as our hearts. They drink up God's blessings as the sands of the Sahara heaven's rain. Nor is it but here and there that our life shows any green spots with verdure to refresh the eye, and call for the grateful acknowledgment of the apostle, "By grace I am what I am,"—by the grace of God I have done what I have done! Alas, how few are the days, how few the deeds of the past, that will be remembered with any comfort on a death-bed! It is impossible even now to review our lives without feeling that there is no hope for us out of Christ; and that the best and the busiest have been unprofitable servants.

—Guthrie.

(3289.) Our Saviour's whole life, which, if written fully out, John says, would fill so many volumes that the world would not be able to contain them, is told in this one, brief sentence, "He went about doing good." In this work He lived; for this end He died. This drew Him down from the skies; "doing good" was "the joy set before Him," for which He wore the thorny crown, and bore His heavy cross. And mark this, that none are His but those that are baptized with this baptism;—not you, "unless the same mind is in you that was in Jesus Christ."

Suppose, then, that our blessed Lord, sitting down on Olivet to review the years of His busy life, had looked on all the works which His hands had wrought,—what a crowd, a long procession of miracles and mercies had passed before Him! How many sinners warned! how many mourners comforted! how many friends and neighbours counselled! how many griefs healed! how many sufferers relieved! what busy days, what blessed hours! His presence carrying sunbeams into darkened homes! mercies springing up like flowers all along His path from the cradle to the grave! With what truth and beauty might He have applied to Himself the words of the patriarch: "When the ear heard me, then it blessed me; and when the eye saw me, it gave witness of me; because I delivered the poor that cried, the fatherless, and him that had none to help him. The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me: and I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy." True of Job, how much more true are these words of the life of Jesus! He came in the form of a servant; and living, not to Himself, it was His meat and drink to do His Father's will. In that, He hath set us an example that we should follow His steps. And such an example! I believe there were more good works crowded into one single day of Christ's life, than you will find spread over the life-long history of any Christian.

Trying our piety by this test, what testimony does our past life bear to its character? Ages ago, two strangers belonging to other spheres alighted on our world; and both have left their footprints behind them. The poles are not so wide asunder as were their purposes. Rising on the smoke of the pit, Satan came from hell to ruin it: descending with a train of angels from the skies, Jesus came from heaven to save it. Each had his mission; and each performed it. We also have ours; and looking to the manner in which we have passed our lives, to which of the two do we bear the greatest resemblance? What have we been doing, what have we done in years gone by! Creeping like a serpent into some happy Eden, have we tempted others to their fall? or, Christ-like, have we sought to raise the fallen? The tree is known by its fruits. Judge ye. The Lord have mercy on you if, tempting others to sin, you have played the devil's part! Happy those who, at however great a distance, and in however imperfect a manner, have attempted to follow Christ! "Well done, good and faithful servant," shall reward the pains, and crown the prayers, that sought to raise the fallen and save the lost.

—Guthrie.

(3290.) "What a mercy for me that I have lasted so long," said the Old Quill Pen on the shelf, to itself. "I have lasted as long as any working Quill might reasonably expect with daily writing, and all the cutting, paring, and nibbing to which Pens are commonly subjected. Those attacks of the Knife, of course, served to shorten my existence, but no doubt improved me when I needed mending. So, it seems that those who used me, also took an interest in my well-being and work. I am only a poor Old Stump now! but though laid aside, let me humbly hope that my writings have done some good; which, of course, was the object intended when I was first made into a Pen, and is a comfort to my thoughts now that I can write no longer."

—Burdett.

12. The after revelation of its results.

(3291.) All development of the soul toward character takes place little by little. To-day in one direction, to-morrow in another; to-day by one instrumentality, to-morrow by another; and what the whole of these accumulating parts and results is to be doth not yet appear. It is an invisible process. It is a growth by parts toward a whole; but a growth which to the end of this life will still remain fragmentary.

Look upon some building in process of construction. All round about it are stones disconnected. The architect knows for what they were cut, but you do not. Whether it is cornice or window-cap, whether it is top of this column or of that, you do not know. Vast timbers, in the framer's mind fitted for their places, and brought together here, give to your eye no indication of their function or their position. They lie around in their several heaps. As the workmen hoist them to their places, some order seems to begin. Yet it doth not appear what the whole is to be; nor will the beauty and fairness of the whole appear until it is completed. And what a building is whose materials are gathered and gathering ready for construction, that is man in this world—a creature whose parts are yet under the hammer. This virtue, that grace; this self-denial, that restriction; this courage, that patience; this faith, that love; this sentiment, that affection—all these varied elements, touched now by one instrument, and now by another, form, little by little, but never shaped into a whole in this world, that structure which is to rise into perfectness in the other life.

—Becher.

(3292.) If you go into the great manufactories at Lowell and Lawrence, that which you see is that which you never see elsewhere; and that which you see elsewhere is what you almost never see there. You see there, not colours, but dirty dye-vats; wool rather than thread, or thread rather than fabrics. Instead of seeing rolls of finished carpeting or cloth, you hear the rattling of looms, spinning-jennies, and other machinery. These things, which absorb your attention, you leave behind you, when you go out; whereas it is in New York, in London, in the great commercial mart, that you see the fabric which is produced by them.

Now, this world is a great rattling manufactory, and all these physical things are but the stationary engines and looms. These are the things that men never carry with them from this world. And yet, how important they are! Our life, as it were, is placed in a loom, and woven by these things. It rolls up, and is hidden as fast as it is woven; and it is to be taken out of the loom only when we leave this world. We shall see the pattern of it only when we abandon the things which act upon us here.

—Becher.

(3293.) Every thought and feeling is a painting stroke, in the darkness, of our likeness that is to be; and our whole life is but a chamber, which we are frescoing with colours that do not appear while being laid on wet, but which will shine forth afterwards, when finished and dry.

Like those airy sprites in fairy tales who rear the building through the night, unseen in the process, but clear and distinct in the morning's completion, so years, and hours, and moments are silently rearing, in this world's darkness, a soul-structure whose proportions the sunlight of eternity shall reveal.

—Becher.

LORD'S SUPPER. THE

1. Various estimated by Christian men.

(3294.) All men speak honourable things of the sacrament, except wicked persons and the scorners of religion; and though of several persons, like the beholders of a dove walking in the sun, as they stand in several aspects and distances, some see red and others purple, and yet some perceive nothing but green, but all allow and love the beauties; so do the several forms of Christians, according as they are instructed by their first teachers, or their own experience, conducted by their fancy, and proper principle, look upon these glorious mysteries, some as virtually containing the reward of obedience; some as solemnities of thanksgiving, and records of blessings; some as the objective increase of faith; others as the sacramental participations of Christ; others as the acts and instruments of natural union; yet all affirm some great things or other of it, and by their differences confess the immensity and the glory. For thus manna represented to every man the taste that himself did like; but it had in its own potentiality all those tastes and dispositions eminently and altogether; it could speak of great and many excellences, and all confessed it to be enough, and to be the food of angels; so it is here, it is that to every man's faith, which his faith wisely apprehends; and though there are some of little faith, and such receive but a less proportion of nourishment, yet by the very use of this sacrament, the appetite will increase, and the apprehensions grow greater, and the faith will be more confident and instructed; and then we shall see more and feel more.

—Salter.

2. Its design.

(3295.) Christ has not instituted this sacrament for a fashion in His Church, to touch, and feel, and see, as we gaze upon pictures in the windows. But as the woman who had the bloody issue, touching the hem of Christ's garment, drew virtue from Christ Himself, because she believed; so Christ would that we, touching these signs, should draw virtue from Himself, that is, all the graces which these signs represent.

—Henry Smith, 1560-1591.

(3296.) The Lord's Supper is memorative, and so it has the nature and use of a pledge or token of love, left by a dying to a dear surviving friend. It is like a ring plucked off from Christ's finger, or a bracelet from His arm, or rather His picture from His breast, delivered to us with such words as these: "As oft as you look on this, remember Me; let this help to keep Me alive in your remembrance when I am gone, and out of sight."

—Flavel, 1627-1691.

(3297.) The Lord's Supper is not designed or adapted to be a converting ordinance. A man sits down at the table of communion. What is the design of it? Is it that he may be converted? Was Judas converted at that table? This is not its design. It is solely to commemorate what Christ has done, and to bring impressively before the mind the great events of His death. "Do this in remembrance of Me," is the command, and this implies that there is already such an attachment to Him as to make such a commemoration proper. Do we institute memorials for the purpose of creating an attachment to those whom we despise, or hate? Is not the very object of a memento to recall the image of one whom we love; to deepen attachment, to bind us more strongly to him or to his memory? The ring which we wear on the finger, or the hair of a friend that we preserve in a locket, is not to create love for that friend, but it is to bring it to remembrance and to perpetuate it.

—Barnes, 1798-1870.

3. Its symbolism.

—Henry Smith, 1560-1591.

(3299.) What, then, is there nothing in the sacrament but bread and wine, like a hungry nunchion? Nay, we say not that the sacrament is nothing but a base sign, or that you receive nothing no more than you see. For Christ saith that it is His body. And Paul says that it is the communion of Christ's body and blood. Therefore there is more in sacramental bread than in common bread. Though the nature is not changed, the use is changed. It does not only nourish the body as it did before, but also it brings a bread with which it nourishes the soul. For as sure as we receive bread, so sure we receive Christ; not only the benefits of Christ, but Christ, although not in a Popish manner. Yet we are so formed and united unto Him, even as though we were but one body with Him.

As the spouse does not marry with the lands and goods, but with the man himself, and being partaken of him, is made partaker of them; so the faithful do not only marry with Christ's benefits, but with Christ Himself; and being made partakers of Him, they are made partakers of His benefits. For Christ may not in any wise be divided from His benefits, no more than the sun from its light.

It is said, the Father gave us His Son (Rom. viii. 32), and so the Son gives us Himself. For as the bread is a sign of His body, so the giving of the bread is a sign of the giving of His body. Thus He lies before us like a pelican, which letteth her young ones suck her blood, so that we may say, the Lord invited us to supper, and He Himself was our meat.

But if you ask, "How is this?" I must answer, "It is a mystery." But if I could tell it, it would be no mystery. Yet, as it is said, when three men walked in the midst of the furnace, "One like unto the Son of God walked amongst them" (Dan. iii. 25), so, when the faithful receive the bread and wine, One like unto the Son of God seems to come unto them, which fills them with peace, and joy, and grace, that they marvel what it was that they received besides bread and wine.

For example, thou makest a bargain with thy neighbour for house or land, and receivest in earnest a piece of gold. That which thou receivest is but a piece of gold; but now it is a sign of thy bargain, and if thou keep not touch with him, haply it will clasp thee for all that thou art worth. So, that which thou receivest is bread, but this bread is a sign of another matter, which passeth bread.

—Henry Smith, 1560-1591.

(3300.) For the signs to be turned into the thing signified, is utterly against the nature of a sacrament, and makes it no sacrament, for there is no sign. For every sacrament doth consist of a sign, and a thing signified. The sign is ever an earthly thing, and that which is signified is a heavenly thing. This shall appear in all examples: as, in Paradise there was a very tree for the sign, and Christ the thing signified by it. In Circumcision there was a cutting off of the skin, and the cutting off of sin. In the Passover there was a lamb, and Christ. In the Sabbath there was a day of rest, and eternal rest. In the Sacrifices there was an offering of some beasts, and the offering of Christ. In the Sanctuary there was the holy place, and heaven. In the Propitiatory there was the golden covering, and Christ our cover. In the Wilderness there was a rock yielding water, and Christ yielding His blood. In the Apparition there was a dove, and the Holy Ghost. In the Manna there was bread, and Christ. In Baptism there is very water which washes us, and Christ's blood washing us. So in the Supper of Christ there is very bread and wine for the sign, and the body and blood of Christ for the thing signified, or else this sacrament is against the nature of all other sacraments.

—Henry Smith, 1560-1591.

(3301.) Like as, when a nobleman delivereth a letter of annuity to any one of his servants he saith he giveth him an annuity of ten pounds, no man is so simple to think that the letter is the money itself, but an assurance, sign, or gage, of such a sum of money, in such sort that, having such a letter, he is fully assured of the money. Every man doth well know that the signs have the names of the things which they signify; after this manner of speech, also, an ambassador of a prince, being demanded of the authority he hath received of his lord to deal in such or such a matter, is wont to show forth his letters of commission, and to say, "Here is my authority," albeit that the letters are not the power itself, but only the testimony of the same: even so the bread and the wine are the remission of sins, or the body and blood of Christ—to wit, they are as seals and letters, whereby we are assured that the body of Jesus Christ crucified, and His blood shed, have purchased unto us the forgiveness of sins and eternal life.

—Caudray, 1609.

(3302.) Nothing is more common in all languages than to give the name of the thing signified to the sign: as the delivery of a deed or writing under hand and seal is called a conveyance, or making over such an estate, and it is really so; not the delivery of mere wax and parchment, but the conveyance of a real estate, as truly and really, to all effects and purposes of law, as if the very material houses and lands themselves could be and were actually delivered into my hands: in like manner the names of things themselves made over to us in the new covenant of the gospel between God and man, are given to be signs or seals of that covenant.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(3303.) In the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ we are called to a familiar converse with God: He there appeareth to us by a wonderful condescension in the representing communicating signs of the flesh and blood of His Son, in which He hath most conspicuously revealed His love and goodness to believers: there Christ Himself with His covenant-grants are all delivered to us by these investing signs of His own institution; even as knighthood is given by a sword, and as a house is delivered by a key, or land by a twig and turf. Nowhere is God so near to man as in Jesus Christ: and nowhere is Christ so familiarly represented to us as in this holy sacrament.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

4. In what sense the elements are sacred.

(3304.) An instrument or conveyance of lands from one party to another, being fairly engrossed on parchment, with wax fastened unto it, is no more than ordinary parchment and wax: but when it comes once to be sealed and delivered to the use of the party concerned, then it is changed into another quality, and made a matter of high concernment. Thus, the elements of bread and wine are the same in substance with the other bread and wine, before and after the administration is past: the same in quality—the bread dry, the wine moist: the same in nature—the bread to support, the wine to comfort the heart of man; but being once separated (not by any spells or signing with the sign of the cross, not by any Popish, carnal, sensual transubstantiation, nor any Lutheran consubstantiation) from a common to a holy use, when Christ's name is set on them in regard of institution, consecration, operation, and blessing attending on them, then they become Christ's bread and God's wine, and the tables God's tables too—not the bread of the buttery, but of the Sanctuary; not the wine of the grape, but of the Vine Christ Jesus, sealing unto us the pardon and remission of our sins: so that in the right receiving thereof we must make it a work, not deus, but mentis—not so much to look on the elements what they are, but what they signify; look through the bush and see God, through the Sacrament and see Christ Jesus, to our comfort.

—Edlin, 1652.

5. The benefits of a believing reception of it.

(3305.) As a sick man feels no comfort or nourishment when he eateth meat, and yet it preserveth his life: so the weak Christian, though he feel himself not nourished at the Sacrament by Christ's body and blood, yet he shall see in time that his soul shall be preserved thereby unto everlasting life.

As a man, looking steadfastly on a dial, cannot perceive the shadow move at all, yet, viewing it after a while, he shall perceive that it hath moved: so, in hearing of the Word, but especially in the receiving of the Lord's Supper, a man may judge even his own faith, and other graces of God, to be little or nothing increased, neither can he perceive the motion of God's Spirit in him at that present, yet by the fruits and effects thereof, he shall afterward perceive that God's Spirit hath by little and little wrought greater faith and other graces in him.

—Caudray, 1609.

(3306.) The covenant of grace, founded upon this covenant of redemption, is sealed in the sacrament; God owns His standing to the terms of it: as the right of a house is made over by the delivery of the key, and the right of land translated by the delivery of a turf; whereby He gives us assurance of His reality, and a strong support to our confidence in Him. Not that there is any virtue and power of sealing in the elements themselves, no more than there is in a turf to give an infeoffment in a parcel of land; but as the power of the one is derived from the order of the law, so the confirming power of the sacrament is derived from the institution of God; as the oil wherewith kings were anointed did not of itself confer upon them that royal dignity, but it was a sign of the investiture into office, ordered by divine institution. We can with no reason imagine that God intended them as naked signs or pictures, to please our eyes with the image of them, to represent their own figure to our eyes, but to confirm something to our understanding by the efficacy of the Spirit accompanying them. They convey to the believing receiver what they represent, as the great seal of a prince, fixed to the parchment, does the pardon of the rebel, as well as its own figure. Christ's death, and the grace of the covenant, is not only signified, but the fruits and merit of that death communicated also.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3307.) Two friends, intimately united, lose sight, in some sense, of the difference which there may be between their respective conditions. This, too, is what the believer experiences at the Lord's table. On the one part, though there must ever be an immeasurable abyss between God and us, we go to Him as to our brother, as to our friend. . . . And on the other part, God is pleased to lay aside, in condescension to our weakness, if the expression be lawful, the rays of His divine majesty, with which the eyes of mortals would be dazzled into blindness.

—Sanwris.

(3308.) It was very tenderly considerate in the Lord to leave something visible and tangible whereby to lift us up to the Invisible. Just as in prayer, while the shut door, the bowed knees, the articulate words as towards God, have no efficacy, but nevertheless are a help to us; so the Lord's supper is a help at once to our faith and brotherhood. It draws us nearer to one another—it aids us to think what heaven is, where we shall "sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob." —Grosart.

6. Not to be neglected.

(3309.) If it be a token of divine goodness to appoint it, it is no sign of our estimation of divine goodness to neglect it. He that values the kindness of his friend will accept of his invitation, if there be not some strong impediments in the way, or so much familiarity with him, that his refusal upon a light occasion would not be unkindly taken. But though God put on the disposition of a friend to us, yet He loses not the authority of a sovereign; and the humble familiarity He invites us to, does not diminish the condition and duty of a subject. A sovereign prince would not take it well, if a favourite should refuse the offered honour of his table. The viands of God are not to be slighted.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3310.) He has left us this dark glass, wherein we may see His face till He return with a full glory; and is it an affection to Him never to look upon His picture, the medal of Himself, wherein He has engraven the tracks of His dying love; all that He did, all that He purchased, all His fulness, all His treasures, wherein we may behold Him as a Redeemer pouring out His blood for us, as a Sanctifier pouring His blood into us, as a Benefactor opening His enriching treasures to us, as a Supplier providing for all our wants? How can we say we love Him if we do not mind Him? What value have we for Him, if He be not in our thoughts?

Well, but we may remember Christ other ways without this ceremony? We may, but do we? Do you frequently ponder upon Him? are your thoughts of Him edged with choice and ravishing affections to Him? does not the body of death hinder you from thinking of the Lord of Life? But suppose you are not one minute forgetful of His love, does it consist with your professed affection to Him to choose your own ways of remembering Him, and neglect His? Suppose we had a friend who had redeemed us from the galleys, restored us from servitude, redeemed our lives, installed us in a large inheritance, and was to take a long journey, promising to return again, leaving with us his picture, which he would have us look upon at some special seasons, and express in that method a particular mindfulness of him. Though we could not without an excusable ingratitude forget him had we not that picture, yet it were but an unworthy return to deny the observance of so small an order to a friend to whom we owe ourselves. This is all the picture Christ has left of Himself; He never appointed any images or crucifixes, never imprinted the features of His face upon Veronica's napkin. Is it not ingratitude to neglect the remembrance of Him in His own method, when He might have put hard conditions upon us; and when it is not a mere sight of Him, but a spiritual feast with Him, wherein we may suck of His very blood into the veins of our souls, as well as the wine into those of our bodies? —Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3311.) It is undeniable that as sacraments are "generally necessary to salvation," whoever continues to live in the wilful neglect of the Lord's supper is under condemnation. He cannot be Christ's disciple, for he denies Him in the world. He presumptuously breaks one of God's commandments, and is therefore guilty as a transgressor of the whole law. But it is not merely the bare refusal of this sacrament, but the secret disposition and state of heart which such a neglect discovers—and of which it is the infallible mark, which proves his pretension to religion to be vain. Take the case of a man in whom the process of inward mortification is going on. This is not visible, and is altogether hid from general observation. But the black and livid spots on the limb distinctly mark the fatal disorder within. The patient's attention is confined to the part which is affected, and he little dreams of its connection with the work of death which is going forwards. But to the experienced eye the fatal process is fully disclosed by that little spot of livid flesh. It would not be there if mortification was not present. To the continued and resolute refusal to sup with Christ, though to the party himself, and to others, it may appear a venial matter, and to be accounted only as the neglect of one of the ordinances of the Church, yet, in the judgment of all who are taught of God, it is indicative of a fatally disordered state of the heart—it marks the universal indisposition to assume that sacred badge of discipleship and separation from the world. It proves the disaffection and disloyalty to Christ's government and institutions which reigns within, and that something is loved and cherished as better than obedience and love to the Saviour. For in the case under consideration, it is no other than an indisposition to commit ourselves by giving a pledge that we design that high and holy walk in life which belongs to Christ's disciples. We would not come under such a yoke. And just as there would be no living marks in the case supposed, where there was no mortification—so there would be no wilful refusal of the holy supper, were the disposition of our heart in a sound and healthy state. In both of these cases the process of death is going forwards.

—Salter.

7. Who are to partake of it.

(3312.) This sacrament is a sacrament of nourishment, unrenewed men therefore are not fit for it. They are dead (Eph. ii. 1); and what has a dead man to do with a feast? Men must be alive before they be nourished. It is eat, drink. The principal intent is not to eat corporally, but spiritually; words not to be spoken to a dead man. Meat and drink may be put into a dead man's mouth, but he can swallow down neither one nor other in a vital way, nor concoct either of them. He that wants the life of grace can make no use of the nourishment of grace; so that the sacrament is at best but a vain thing to such. But besides, the very end of the sacrament is perverted, when the richest viands are taken by a man spiritually dead; as the end of bread, which is to nourish the body, is perverted, and the creature abused by being used contrary to the end of it, when it is put into the mouth of a dead man to whom it can be no advantage. The body of Christ conveys strength and growth to His own members only; to living members, not to dead. Dead branches receive no sap from the vine.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3313.) The sacrament is appointed for nourishment, and that supposes life. A sacrament does not suppose the effect which it was instituted to produce, but this sacrament supposes grace in a participant. And indeed, bread and wine are not ordered to enliven a dead man, but to nourish and maintain life in a living man. The bellows kindle not the wood, but suppose the fire kindled before. This sacrament is instituted as a part of refreshment, with meat and drink; and though Christ, who is exhibited in this sacrament, can raise a dead man, yet He is offered in this ordinance for producing such effects which are agreeable to the nature of it. He is offered as spiritual food, and spiritual food supposes a new birth.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3314.) I see plainly by unquestionable experience, that either we must have churches without the discipline of Christ, and be rulers without ruling it; or else we must utterly undo our people, body and soul for ever, and plunge them into a desperate state, and make all our following labours in vain to multitudes of them: or else we must take another course, than to admit our parishes to adult church-membership, as was formerly done, without preparation and fitness for such a state.

And yet in their blindness, gentlemen, ministers, and all that plead for common church-membership, pretend to be charitable to the people's souls, when they are exercising this grievous cruelty. It is just as if in mercy to the schoolboys, you should set them that cannot read English in the highest form, where they must make orations in Latin and Greek, or else be whipped: would they thank you for such advancement? It is as if you should put an ignorant, unexercised, cowardly soldier, or one that is but learning to use his arms, into the front of the battle, for his honour: or as if you should prefer a pupil to be a tutor, or put a freshman in the doctor's chair, or admit a newly-baptized novice to be a pastor of the Church, where the blood of the people shall be required at his hands; or as if to honour him, you should admit any common mariner to the pilot's place, or any apothecary to play the physician to other men's ruin, and his own shame. If you set such children on horseback, while you pretend their good, you will break their necks. No man is safe out of his own rank and place. If the husbandman know that every sort of plants and grain, must have their proper soil and season, and the gardener knoweth that several herbs and flowers must be variously manured, or else they will not prosper; why should we be less wise in the work of God? As country schools are seminaries to the academics, so the catechumens or expectants is the seminary to the Church, and the state of infant church-membership the seminary to the state of the adult, into which they must be seasonably and solemnly transplanted when they are ripe and ready, and not before. Truly our merciful hastlings do but yoke untamed bullocks, that are fitter to strive and tire themselves than to plough; and do but saddle such wild, unbroken colts as are more likely to break their own and their rider's necks, than to go the journey which they are designed for. In the state of expectants, these men may profit by preparing ordinances, and the season may come when they may fitly be transplanted: but if we put them inter fideles, that are not prepared for the station, we bring them under a discipline which will exasperate them, and turn them to be malignant enemies, and undo them for ever. The disposition of the matter must go before the reception of the form; for indisposed matter will not receive it. As the operation followeth the being and the disposition, so we must employ every person and thing in such operations only as their being and qualification is capable of and suited to. A due placing of all according to their qualifications is the chief part of our government. Misplace but one wheel in your watch, and try how it will go. If any person or thing be not good in his own place, he will be much worse out of it, in the place of his superior. Fire is better in the chimney than in your bed, or upon your table; a good clerk may make but a sorry counsellor; and a good subject may make but an ill magistrate: and many a man becomes the seat of a justice, that would not become the prince's throne. If you would not undo men's souls by a discipline which they cannot bear, let them stay in the seminary of expectants till they are ripe for it.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(3315.) The profiting of our people will be much greater in their own place, when those that are not yet fit for adult-membership and privileges are kept in the place of catechumens or expectants. Everything doth thrive and prosper best in its own place: if you tear them not out of the Church's womb, till they are ready for the birth, they will prosper there, that else may perish. Your corn will best prosper in the cold earth, where it seems to be dead and buried, till the springing-time shall come. And you should not violently unhose the ears, till nature put them forth. The first digestion must be wrought before the second, and nature must have time allowed it, and the stomach must not too hastily let go the food, if you would have good sanguification and nutrition follow. Men think they do a great kindness to grossly ignorant or impious men to take them into the Church, before they are capable of such a station and the work or privileges thereto belonging; but, alas! they do but hurry them to perdition, by thrusting them out of the state where they might have thriven in preparation to a church-state, into a state which will set them abundance of work which they are utterly unfit for, and under the pretence of benefits and privileges will occasion abundance of aggravations of their sins. A boy in his A, B, C, will learn better in his own place among his fellows, than in a higher form, where he hath work set him which he is incapable of doing. —Baxter, 1615-1691.

6. We should prepare ourselves to receive it.

(3316.) Abraham, when he went to sacrifice his son on Mount Moriah, seeing the place afar off, said unto the young men that were with him, "Abide ye here with the ass, and I and the lad will go yonder and worship." He knew well enough, that if they had gone along with him, they would have distracted and hindered him in the sacrifice; and therefore, when he saw the place afar off, he prepared himself, and bade them stay behind. The like should our care be, when we should receive the sacrament; when we see the time draw near, we should set aside all worldly cares and employments, and bid them wholly stand aside, and suffer them not only not to go to the Mount with us, but not to go into our secret chambers with us, but shut them out of doors, make them dance attendance there, that we may perform the duty with more comfort and freedom.

—Dyke, 1644.

(3317.) We must not only examine whether we have a wedding-garment, but also whether it be well kept and brushed; whether no moths be got into it, no new spots dashed upon it. A rich robe may be sometimes so besmeared and daubed with mire, that none of the gold lace upon it may be visible, till cleansed. Graces are to be purified, as well as sins purged out; grace, as well as metal, for want of rubbing and exercise, will gather dust.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

9. The sin of not discerning the Lord's body.

(3318.) Like as, if a rebellious subject should no more regard his prince's seal than other common wax, or have it in no greater reverence than the seal of some private man, it might rightly be said that he maketh no difference of his prince's person—that is to say, that he doth no more esteem him than he doth other men, yet it needeth not that the king's person be there really present: so, when we come to the Lord's table, if we take irreverently the mystical bread and wine as other common meats appointed for the belly, then make we no difference of the Lord's body; we do not esteem the worthiness, price, and virtue of it, which in the holy mysteries is so freely and so liberally offered unto us; and therefore, if we receive this sacrament irreverently, not considering who is the Author of it, nor who it is that offereth Himself so mercifully and lovingly unto us, it is no marvel that the holy apostle saith that we are guilty of the body and blood of the Lord—that is to say, that we are before the seat of the Almighty God, because of our unthankfulness and irreverent handling of the holy mysteries, counted as guilty as if we had slain the body of the only-begotten Son of God, and shed His most precious blood upon the cross; or it is no marvel that, instead of grace, instead of forgiveness of our sins, and of life everlasting, we do eat and drink our own damnation; and yet it followeth not that the body and blood of Christ be really present there in the sacrament.

—Caudray, 1609.

10. Why so many derive so little profit from its observance.

(3319.) Abraham, when he went with his servants to sacrifice Isaac, said unto them, "Abide you here with the ass, and I and the lad will go yonder and worship, and come again to you." Thus too many do with their sins when they come to the sacrament; they do, in effect, say to their sins and lusts, "Stand you awhile aside; I must go to the sacrament and receive the communion. Do but stand by awhile, and when the sacrament is over, or, at farthest, as soon as the sacrament day is over, I will come again to you." Thus, the duty once over, and the sacrament a little forgotten, they and their sins are hail-fellow-well-met upon all occasions.

—Dyke, 1644.

(3320.) Let us see that we so come to Him, that we do not put Him to receive sins as well as sinners.

For though Christ is willing to make us part of His body, yet He is not willing to unite Himself to ulcers and putrefaction. And therefore He that comes hither with a Judas's heart and hypocrisy, will find a Judas's entertainment; and though he may receive the morsel from Christ's hand, yet he will find that the devil will enter and go along with it. It will be only the nutriment of his sin, and the repast of his corruption. He that comes to this dreadful duty profane, unclean, or intemperate, will go away with quicker dispositions and livelier appetites to those sins. Every corruption shall rise and recover itself, like a giant refreshed with wine. For Christ has given the devil full commission to enter into such swine, and to drive them headlong to their own destruction.

(3321.) "They that wait on the Lord shall receive strength." Thus God shall make good His promise, "As thy days are, so shall thy strength be." Why then, it may be asked, do men go from the house of God and from a communion table to be worsted, "as at other times before," by the devil, the world, and the flesh? Baptize a withering plant with water, and it lifts up its head, casts off the old leaves, and puts out a fresh crop of buds and blossoms; or carry a cup of water, or of wine, to the lips of a fainting man, and his pulse beats again; the blood returns to his cheek; he opens his eyes; he rises to his feet, if a racer, to resume the course; if a soldier, to renew the combat. And if it be true, that like water to a languishing flower, or wine to a fainting man, so are the ordinances of religion to the soul, why are men often no better of them? why are they like "clouds without rain" that give their shadows, but no showers, to brown, barren fields? This admits of an easy explanation.

The ordinances of religion are compared to wells of water; but then they are like Jacob's well. The water lies far below the surface; and to the man of the world, the mere professor of religion who has the name but not the faith of a Christian, we may say, as the woman said to our Lord, "Sir, thou hast nothing to draw with, and the well is deep." Faith is, as it were, the rope, and our souls the vessel, which we let down into this well to fill them with living water. But that they do no good to some, forms no reason why we should despise or neglect ordinances. It is no fault in the bread, that, thrust between a dead man's teeth, it does not nourish him. The truth is, that we must have spiritual life to get the benefit of religious ordinances. Water will revive a withering, but not a withered plant; wine will revive a dying, but not a dead man; the breath of your mouth, or the breeze of heaven, will rekindle the smouldering coal, but not the cold, grey ashes of the hearth. And it is only spiritual life that can derive benefit from such ordinances as are intended to revive the faint and give strength to the weary.

—Guthrie.

(3322.) Were they to speak their own experience, many who come to the church and go to the sacrament would say, What is the Lord that we should serve Him? what profit shall we have if we pray to Him? Still there is no genuine Christian but will set to his seal that God's promises are true; but has often found himself in times of trouble, in seasons of trial and temptation, greatly refreshed and strengthened by waiting on the Lord. What though the disciples, within a few hours of leaving the communion table, gave its vows to the winds; bent like reeds before the blast; and, instead of rallying round their Master as they had promised, played the part of cowards—flung away their weapons and fled the field? They had been waiting on the Lord; and was this all they got, or is it all we shall get by doing so? These questions may be asked; but they prove nothing against the truth of God's Word. It is not the fact that they went from the communion table to flee. That is not a correct statement of the case. They did not go from making vows, from professing that they would die with the Lord—one to deny, and all to desert Him. After supper they went to sleep; and from that, not from their knees, they rose to flee. The husbandman covers the seed when he has sown it; the workman rivets the nail when he has driven it; and had the disciples followed up the work of communion with the work of prayer, they would have risen from their knees, if need be, to die, but in no case to deny their Master. —Guthrie.

LOVE.

L ITS SOURCE.

(3323.) As one familiar with the sonatas and the symphonies of Beethoven, while passing along the street in summer, gets from out of the open window a snatch of a song, or of a piece that is being played, catching a strain here and another there, and says to himself, "Ah, that is Beethoven! I recognise that; it is from such and such a movement of the Pastoral," or whatever it may be; so men in life catch strains of God in the mother's disinterested and self-denying love; in the lover's glow; in the little child's innocent affections. Where did this thing come from? No plant ever brought out such fruit as this. Nature, dumb and blind, with her lizards, and stones, and thousand accumulations of matter, never thought anything like that. This and that harmony of light, the few hints which we see here and there—these have been sprinkled into life, dropping from above. And there is a fountain where exist elements and attributes of which these are but the souvenirs. And to me they all point back to something which we have not seen. As birds, when after moulting they begin to sing, break down in mid-song, and give only a snatch here and a snatch there of the full volume of their summer strains; so these hints, these little tinkling notes of love on earth, beautiful as they are in themselves, are not perfect, and are not understood until we trace them back, and feel that there is above somewhere One whose nature epitomises all these things.

Go and look on the south side of the Highlands. You shall see that, detached from the rocks there, and lying in a long trail, for miles and miles, are blocks of syenite, or of trap, or of granite, as the case may be. And there is many a block which, if you choose, you can trace back to the very spot where the ice pried it out, or from which the flood or the iceberg drifted it along the mountain side. Now, as it is with those blocks of stone, so it is with these scattered elements and traits that have drifted out, as it were, from the mountain of God, and sweetened the household, and refined civilised life. They are, after all, but the outflowing, the drift, as it were, of the great Divine Soul in this world. —Becher.

II. ITS EXCELLENCE.

1. It is the life of the soul and of the moral universe.

(3324.) The soul may sooner leave off to subsist than to love; and, like the vine, it withers and dies if it has nothing to embrace. —South, 1633-1716.

(3325.) It is the heat of the universe. Philosophers tell us that without heat the universe would die. And love in the moral universe is what heat is in the natural world. It is the great germinating power. It is the ripening influence. It is the power by which all things are brought steadily up from lower to higher forms. —Becher.

2. It is the bond that unites all holy intelligences.

(3326.) Crispus. I have been thinking of love as the band which unites all holy intelligence to God and one another; as that in the moral system which the law of attraction is in the system of nature.

Gaius. Very good; while the planets revolve round the sun as their central point, and are supremely attracted by it, they each have a subordinate influence upon the others: all attract and are attracted by others in their respective orbits; yet no one of these subordinate attractions interferes with the grand attractive influence of the sun, but acts rather in perfect concurrence with it. Under some such idea we may conceive of supreme love to God and subordinate love to creatures.

Crispus. Among the planets, if I mistake not, the attractive power of each body corresponds with the quantity of matter it possesses, and its proximity to the others.

Gaius. True, and though in general we are required to love our neighbour as ourselves, yet there are some persons, on account of their superior value in the scale of being, and others on account of their more immediate connection with us, whom we are allowed and even obliged to love more than the rest. —A. Fuller, 1754-1815.

3. It is the supreme grace.

(3327.) Love is the queen of the graces; it outshines all the other, as the sun the lesser planets. —Watson, 1696.

(3328.) If charity be greater than faith, then is not man justified by faith only. Inconsequent illusion! St. Paul commends not love for the virtue of justification; it may fail in that particular action, yet receive no impeachment to the excellency of it. By demonstration: A prince excels a peasant; shall any man therefore infer that he can plough better, or have more skill in tillage? A philosopher excels a mechanic, though he cannot grind so well as a miller, or limn so cunningly as a painter. A man is better than a beast; who but a madman will therefore conclude that he can run faster than a horse, draw more than an ox, or carry a greater burden than an elephant! Though he fail in these particular acts, yet none will deny but he is better than a beast. —Adams, 1653.

4. Its production is the end of Christ's mission and of all religious ordinances.

(3329.) Christ came not into the world to fill our heads with mere speculations, to kindle a fire of wrangling and contentious dispute amongst us, and to warm our spirits against one another with angry and peevish debates, while, in the meantime, our hearts remain all ice within towards God; and have not the least spark of true heavenly love to melt and thaw them. Christ came not to possess our brains with some cold opinions, that send down a freezing and benumbing influence into our hearts. Christ was a master of the life, not of the school; and He is the best Christian whose heart beats with the purest pulse towards heaven, not he whose head spins the finest cobweb.

—Cudworth, 1617-1688.

(3330.) It is obvious that in order to solid proficiency in any kind of art, the student must first be furnished with a clear answer to the question, What is the object—the end to be reached? Take the art of oratory, for instance. What (in brief) is the thing to be done by the orator, the end at which he must aim? Let us say that it is to persuade the audience to adopt or refrain from a certain course of action. If he can persuade them to do what he advises, he hits the mark—he reaches the end of the art—he succeeds. But if, after having heard him, they act in a way opposite to that which he recommends, he goes wide of the mark—his speech is a failure. And this is a good subject to draw the instance from, because as a fact both speakers and hearers often do make much the same mistake as to oratory, which is universally made as to religion. Too often, for example, is a fine sermon thought to be, not that which gives a spur to the wills of the hearers, not that which induces them to set about reforming their lives, and becoming good people, but that which merely explains a difficult text of the Bible, or which goes towards settling a controversial question, or which, not even possessing merits as high as these, has merely fine language and flowers of rhetoric to recommend it. Now it is clear that the perception of the true end is the first step towards setting the practice right. I have done something towards rectifying my preaching, if I have settled it in my own mind that, on the one hand, I shall fail utterly, unless I send the audience away with a desire for, and an impulse towards, spiritual improvement, and that, on the other, I shall succeed perfectly, if I do send them away with such a desire and impulse, even if my sermon should settle no controversy, should explain no merely speculative difficulty, and should be absolutely wanting in fine words and in all the graces of style. St. John was a true orator in his old age, when from his infirmities he was unable to say more than this, "Little children, love one another," because the antecedents of that holy and venerable bishop, and the deep and living sympathy with which he uttered the words, really moved the hearers to comply with the precept, and their feuds sank to rest at the sound of his voice.

Let us take an instance from another art, where there may perhaps be some doubt as to what should be the artist's object. What is the end of painting, the aim which the painter must set before him? Is it to deceive the spectator, to give him a false impression, to make him imagine that the painted object is a real one? It would seem that the ancients thought so from the story current among them of the trial of skill between Zeuxis and Parrhasius, in which one of them painted a bunch of grapes so like nature, that the birds came and pecked at them, and the other a curtain so like real drapery, that his brother artist called on him to draw the curtain and exhibit his picture. Or is the end of painting not to deceive, but to please the spectator by a faithful imitation of nature,—an end which is incompatible with deception; for if the spectator is to be affected with pleasure by the fidelity of an imitation, he must of course be aware that it is an imitation, and not the reality? And, again, how is nature to be imitated by the painter? Servilely, and 'in a matter-of-fact way, line upon line, feature by feature? Or shall we say rather that there is a soul in nature, a soul in every countenance, ay, and a soul in every landscape, which struggles for a fuller development, and to which it is the painter's business to give expression? In other words, is a photograph the very highest style of imitative art, because it is true in the letter? or is a portrait of Raffaele's or Murillo's infinitely higher than any photograph can be, because it is true not so much in the letter as in the spirit?

It is not to my point to answer these questions, but only to call attention to the fact that they may be asked, and answered differently. And an artist who intends to paint successfully must have a clear answer to them in his mind before he begins. He must resolve himself on the question, "What is the true object of my art? Is it to produce deception? Is it to please persons by a faithful imitation of nature? And if so, what is a faithful imitation? Is it a servile copy, like the Chinese imitation of pottery, which reproduces the flaws and the cracks; or is it the development of a feature which in the original seems to yearn for expression?" If this point be not settled at the beginning, he is certain to go astray in the execution.

The above illustrations will not be thrown away, if they tend in any mind to clear up the position which we are endeavouring to establish. As in the arts, so also in the pursuit of holiness, or, in other words, in the spiritual life, there is an end; and it is all-important that they who would be proficient in the spiritual life should discern clearly what this end is, and hold it steadily before them in their every endeavour. The end is love—supreme love, with all the powers of the soul to God,—and such love to our brethren as we bear to ourselves,—this love to be engendered by a living faith in what God has done for us, a faith which sets free the heart both from a sense of guilt and from a love of sin, and which thus sets the conscience at ease. If this love is not produced and maintained in the soul, we fail altogether in true religion, and that, though we may have been very busy about religion, may have put up many prayers, heard many sermons, attended many sacraments, assisted in many philanthropic enterprises.

—Goulburn.

5. It renders all our services acceptable.

(3331.) Love is the heart of religion, the fat of the offering: it is the grace which Christ inquires most after, "Peter, lovest thou Me?" Love makes all our services acceptable, it is the musk that perfumes them.

—Watson, 1696.

(3332.) It is not so much the thing done, as the spirit in which it is done, which is of such great moment. For love is an affection of the heart and will, and we know that very small tokens, the merest trifles, will evince it; and that, when it is evinced, it has a peculiar power of winning its way both with God and man. Suppose a great fortune laid out in building churches, or relieving the poor, under the pressure of servile fear, and with the design of expiating sin, or a great philanthropic enterprise inaugurated and maintained from ambitious motives; can it be supposed that such acts, however it may please Him to bless the effects of them, go for anything with God as regards the doer of them. And, on the other hand, suppose some very simple, commonplace action, something not going at all beyond the circle of routine and daily duty, done with a grateful, affectionate feeling towards God, and from a simple desire to please Him, and to win His approval,—can it be supposed that such an action, however trifling in itself, does not go for something, nay, for much, with God? The love of Him with all the heart, and mind, and soul, and strength, is “the first and great commandment.” One movement of that love gives to the commonest action the fragrance of a sacrifice; while, without one movement of it, the costliest offering must of necessity be rejected. “If a man should give all the substance of his house for love, it would utterly be condemned.” —Goulburn.

6. Its excellence is manifest in its influence on the heart and life.

(1.) It casts out fear.

(3333.) Love and fear are like the sun and moon, seldom seen together. —Newton, 1725–1807.

(2.) It expels whatever is inconsistent with itself.

(3334.) Love is compared to fire, the nature of which is, to assimilate to itself all that comes near it, or to consume them; it turns all into fire or ashes; nothing that is heterogeneous can long dwell with its own simple, pure nature. Thus love to Christ will not suffer the near neighbourhood of anything in its bosom that is derogatory to Christ; either it will reduce, or abandon it, be it pleasure, profit, or whatever else. Abraham, who loved Hagar and Ishmael in their due place, when the one began to jostle with her mistress, and the other to jeer and mock at Isaac, he puts them both out of doors: love to Christ will not suffer thee to side with anything against Christ, but take His part with Him against any that oppose Him.

—Saltor.

(3.) It kindles aspirations after holiness.

(3335.) Look that there be such a change in thy judgment, and heart, as makes thee take an inward complacency and delight in Christ, and His holy commands. Then there is little fear of thy degenerating, when thou art tied to Him and His service, by the heart-strings of love and complacency. The devil finds it no hard work to part him and his duty that never jockeyed nor took true content in doing of it. He whose calling doth not like him, nor fit his genius (as we say), will never excel in it. A scholar learns more in a week, when he comes to relish learning, and is pleased with its sweet taste, than he did in a month, when he went to school to please his master (whom he feared) not himself. Observe any person in the thing wherein he takes high content, and he is more careful and curious about that than any other. If his heart be on his garden, oh, how neatly it is kept! it shall lie as we say, in print; all the rare roots and slips that can be got for love or money shall be sought for. Is it beauty that one delights in; how curious and nice is such a one in dressing herself? she hardly knows when she is fine enough. Truly thus it is here; a soul that truly loves Christ, delights in holiness; all his strength is laid out upon them; may he but excel in this one thing, be more holy, more heavenly, he will give others leave to run before him in anything else.

—Gurnall, 1617–1679.

(4.) It makes obedience easy.

(3336.) Nothing is difficult to love: It will make a man cross his own inclinations to pleasure them whom he loves.

—Tillotson, 1630–1694.

(3337.) Love is like wings to the bird, like sails to the ship, it carries a Christian full-sail to heaven. When love cools, obedience slacks, and drives heavily, because it wants the oil on its wheel that love used to drop.

—Watson, 1696.

(3338.) Love to God would make duties of religion facile and pleasant. I confess to him that hath no love to God, religion must needs be a burden: and I wonder not to hear him say, “What a weariness is it to serve the Lord.” It is like rowing against the tide. But love oils the wheels, it makes duty a pleasure. Why are the angels so swift and winged in God’s service, but because they love Him? Jacob thought seven years but little for the love he did bear to Rachel. Love is never weary; he who loves money is not weary of toiling for it; and he who loves God is not weary of serving Him.

—Watson, 1696.

(3339.) It is of the utmost importance to keep up our interest in the holy work in which we are engaged, for the moment our interest flags the work will become wearisome. Humboldt says that the copper-coloured native of Central America, far more accustomed than the European traveller to the burning heat of the climate, yet complains more when upon a journey, because he is stimulated by no interest. The same Indian who would complain, when in botanising he was loaded with a box full of plants, would row his canoe fourteen or fifteen hours together against the current without a murmur, because he wished to return to his family. Labours of love are light. Routine is a hard master. Love much, and you can do much. Impossibilities disappear when zeal is fervent.

—Spurgeon.

(3340.) Two boys, the sons of poor parents, went one day in autumn to the forest to collect dry sticks. One of them, the son of a kind widow, was called Erhard; the other, named Matthew, had a hard stepmother, who often lived in discord with his father.

When the boys reached the forest, they resolved to return home together, and then parted to look for dry sticks. Erhard collected busily, and where he saw a dry branch on a tree he climbed up and broke it off. In a short time he had prepared a heavy bundle and tied it up tightly.

Then he ran to the other side, calling his companion, who answered him from the depth of the forest; and when Erhard joined him he found him among the hazel bushes. When Erhard saw him he said, “Let us go home now. Where is your faggot?" But Matthew answered: "Have you finished so quickly? I have not yet found anything."

Then Matthew took out a knife, and looked about to see if any one was near. Erhard asked him: "What are you about?"

The other answered: "Pick up some dry sticks to put outside the faggot, I will provide for the rest." Then he prepared to cut down a young oak with his knife. Erhard was terrified, and cried: "God forbid that you should hurt the young tree. It would be a shame and a sin. If the forest keeper were to hear of it, he would forbid every one to pick up wood, and you would be the cause if all the poor people were to go without wood during the severe winter. God forbid that we should do such evil. Wait a little, I will find a way."

Erhard looked round, and discovered an old oak with many dead branches; he climbed up the tree like a squirrel, and threw down the dry wood. Matthew was surprised.

In less than half an hour they had wood enough, and Erhard made a bundle and carried it to the place where he had left his own; then he put it down, and said to Matthew: "Now, take it on your shoulder."

But Matthew said: "Let me rather have the other, it is smaller and lighter!"

Erhard laughed, and said: "You are stronger and taller than I am; but let it be as you will."

They took their bundles and went. Matthew panted and complained; and before they were out of the forest, he asked Erhard to stop, that they might rest, as he was tired, and wherever he found a nut bush, he wanted to stop to look for nuts. But Erhard prevented him and said: "I must go to my mother."

When they had walked a little while on the road, Matthew threw his bundle angrily to the ground, and said: "You have made it too heavy." He pulled out some thick pieces, saying: "Let him take these who please!"

But Erhard picked them up and put them with his own. "I will carry them for you," said he, "till we reach the town."

Then Matthew was astonished at the kindness and strength of his companion; and he looked at him, and said: "Who teaches you to do this, and what gives you so much strength?"

Erhard answered: "My mother's love." But Matthew sighed and groaned.

—F. A. Krummacher.

(3341.) If you wish to go from one side to the other of a steep, high hill, and there is a road through it, how much better it is to take the road than to climb over the top of the hill. Now there is such a road as this to the performance of duties, and that is the road of love. If a man does the things that he has to do in any other spirit than that of love, they are irksome tasks; but if he does them in a spirit of love, how his face laughs! how his hands tingle! how radiant is every part of his life!

If one were sent to take care of the poor, miserable, wounded soldiers lying in the plague-stricken hospitals on the plain of Solferino, he would say to himself, "Money would not hire me to do it, but I must do it because it is my duty. Here are men who are suffering and need attention, and I am bound to look after their wants." But let me find my own son among those unfortunate creatures, and, no matter how loathsome might be the offices to be performed toward him, could money buy from me the privilege of ministering to his necessities? Could any motive induce me to leave his side day or night? That which I should do in the one case through conscientiousness, or from a sense of duty, and which would be a disagreeable task, I should do in the other case through love, and it would then be a pleasure to me. I should do it with delight. There would not be hours enough in which I might serve in love my wounded son.

Think of the things a mother does for her child. She gives it her life. She cannot serve it enough. To her there is nothing but, "My babe." It is her joy, her pleasure, night and day. There are offices that she has to perform toward it that are disagreeable for the moment, but her love for it enables her to perform them with willingness, and to forget all connected with them which is unpleasant. And thus are fulfilled the words of Christ when He says, "My yoke is easy, and my burden is light." Not that the things which you do from love are not sometimes hard, but there is a way in which you can engineer hard things and make them seem easy. Love, and love enough, and your burdens will not seem heavy. Love is able to steer you over all difficulty. Employ it, and it will carry you through life with power adequate to your exigencies. Bascher.

(5.) It inspires self-sacrifice.

(3342.) In the time of Cromwell a young soldier, for some offence, was condemned to die, and the time of his death was fixed "at the ringing of the curfew." Naturally such a doom would be fearful and bitter to one in the years of his hope and prime, but to this unhappy youth death was doubly terrible, since he was soon to have been married to a beautiful young lady whom he had long loved. The lady, who loved him ardently, in return, had used her utmost efforts to avert his fate, pleading with the judges, and even Cromwell himself, but all in vain. In her despair, she tried to bribe the old sexton not to ring the bell, but she found that impossible. The hour drew near for the execution. The preparations were completed. The officers of the law brought forth the prisoner, and waited, while the sun was setting, for the signal from the distant bell-tower. To the wonder of everybody it did not ring! Only one human being at that moment knew the reason. The poor girl, half wild with the thought of her lover's peril, had rushed unseen up the winding stairs, and climbed the ladders into the belfry-loft, and seized the tongue of the bell. The old sexton was in his place, prompt to the fatal moment. He threw his weight upon the rope, and the bell, obedient to his practised hand, reeled and swung to and fro in the tower. But the brave girl kept her hold, and no sound issued from its metallic lips. Again and again the sexton drew the rope, but with desperate strength the young heroine held on. Every moment made her position more fearful; every sway of the bell's huge weight threatened to fling her through the high tower window; but she would not let go. At last the sexton went away. Old and deaf, he had not noticed that the curfew gave no peal; the brave girl descended from the belfry, wounded and trembling. She hurried from the church to the place of execution. Cromwell himself was there, and just as he was sending to demand why the bell was silent, she saw him—

"And her brow,
Lately white with sickening horror, glows with hope and courage now;
At his feet she told her story, showed her hands
all bruised and torn,
And her sweet young face, still haggard with the anguish it had worn,
Touched his heart with sudden pity, lit his eyes with misty light—
'Go; your lover lives,' cried Cromwell: 'curfew shall not ring to-night.'"

(6.) It makes the soul beautiful.

(3343.) The love of Jesus Christ in the heart of man is like a ray of sun shining through the painted windows of a cathedral, colouring and embellishing it, but destroying and displacing nothing.

—Vianney.

(3344.) Love, that geyser of the soul, can melt the ice and snow of the most frozen regions; wherever its warm springs well up, there glows a southern climate.

(3345.) With love, the heart becomes a fair and fertile garden, with sunshine and warm hues, and exhaling sweet odours; but without it, it is a bleak desert covered with ashes.

(3346.) True love alone can awaken and evoke all the nobility and grandeur of human nature. Then we are like musical instruments touched by a master's hand. That organ yonder, many fingers have moved over its keys and drawn out its stops; but the harmonies have not surprised us, our listening has not even deepened into interest. But one day a stranger came and sat before it, and presently rich, exquisite melodies began to pour forth, new and wondrous depths and changes of tone trembled in the air and thrilled our souls. It seemed like a living thing interpreting the secrets of our hearts, so that we hardly dared to breathe lest we should destroy the charm. What a revelation that was! We never dreamed that the old instrument could "discourse" such marvellous strains. But the capacity was there, only the soul of the musician was needed to inspire it. Thus, too, can love elicit in answer to its skilful touch the grandest responsive harmonies from the lowliest human heart. And it is by love—God's love—that our great nature shall reveal all its greatness.

—Bradon.

III. CHARACTERISTICS OF TRUE LOVE.

1. It is practical.

(3347.) To love as Christ loves, is to let our love be a practical, and not a merely sentimental thing. Some are in danger of becoming mere religious sentimentalists. They revel in the poetry of feeling; they are easily wrought into an effervescence of tenderness; they delight in a storm of emotional vehemency. All this they suppose to be Christian love. Yet it is a love that costs them nothing. They feel much, but do little. They are ready for sympathy, but not for sacrifice. They try, in effect, to divorce benevolence from beneficence. They are the sensitive plants of the Church, and not fruit-bearing trees of righteousness.

—Stanford.

2. It embraces God and man.

(3348.) All true love is one. The first commandment is very great, but the second is not little.

They are upper and nether pools, and the same fountain fills them. He who is richest in the love of God has the greatest advantage for loving his neighbour—for loving his family, his household, his country, and the world. And that is the best and happiest state of things, the primal and truly natural, where, springing from under the throne of God with a bright and heaven-reflecting piety, love fills the upper pool, then, through the open flower-fringed channel of filial affection and the domestic charities, flows softly till it again expands in neighbourly kindness and unreserved philanthropy. The channel may be choked. The devotee may close it up in the hope of raising the level in the first and great reservoir, and by arresting the current he causes an overflow and converts into swamp the surrounding garden. In the same way the materialist or worldlyling, content with the lower pool, may fill up the conduit, and declare that he is no longer dependent on the upper magazine; but from the isolated cistern quickly evaporates the scanty supply, and thick with slime, weltering with worms, the stagnant residue mocks the thirsty owner, or as over the bubbling malaria he persists to linger, it fills his frame with the mortal poison. Cut off from living water, receiving from on high no consecrating element, human affection is too sure to end in the disgust of a disappointed idolatry or the mad despair of a total bereavement; whilst the mystic theopathy, which in order to give the whole heart to God gives none to its fellows, will soon have no heart at all.

Love is of God, and all true love is one. The piety which is not humane will soon grow superstitious and gloomy; in cases like Dominic and Philip II. we see that it may soon grow blood-thirsty and cruel; nor, on the other hand, will brotherly love long continue if the love of God is not shed abroad abundantly.

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

(3349.) Love of man necessarily arises out of the love of God. The love of the creature is but the corollary to the love of the Creator. This is what the Christian finds, as a matter of fact. His heart is overcharged with love to God. It finds its way out in love to man. His direct service of God cannot, in the nature of things, go very far. He worships God publicly in His house. He glorifies Him secretly in the constant outpourings of his heart. He gives of his substance to the maintenance of every cause which is God's cause. But here it ends. God is so mighty, so self-contained, that with all our puny efforts, much cannot be done to serve Him. So the Christian looks about to see how he is to show his love for God. He soon finds the way. Clearly, it must be by love for his fellow-men. Here is a vast field for practical service. It begins with his own household; it ends with the most distant idolater on the opposite side of the globe. And now the Christian finds what a right royal law this is of the Saviour's,—"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind,"—for he sees that it includes and covers every possible form of duty; that if this command be fulfilled, it necessitates the fulfilling of every other command. He who is content with visiting the lower eminences which surround Mont Blanc may wander about from one to another, and get picturesque views in detail; but, at the best, they are only partial and imperfect glimpses. He alone who reaches the topmost summit can command at one glance all the glorious view. In like manner must it be with him who wishes to serve God. He may try in detail to keep this and that commandment, and he will be the better and happier for his efforts. But in order to observe them all truly and in their spirit, he must stand on the moral eminence of love towards God. Then he will be able to perform his duty, not bit by bit, but as a whole, complete and perfect, doing everything for God, and yet not neglecting man.

IV. THE LOVE OF GOD. [See also 2318-2327.]

(3350) A sailor who had been piously trained in early life, but had lived for many years in all manner of profligacy, was thoroughly awakened to a sense of his guilt and sinfulness while voyaging in the Pacific Ocean. One night his terror rose to such a pitch, that he dared not shut his eyes lest he should awake in hell; but at length, overcome with fatigue and weariness, he fell asleep. In this condition he dreamed that he was in India (where he had been formerly), and heard a missionary preach on the solemn words, "How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation?" He was so moved by the words, that he tried to run away, and in the effort he awoke. His own words shall tell what followed:—"The perspiration was pouring from my forehead; and as I was in the greatest agitation, I opened God's Word, for I had no other comforter. I read the third chapter of John, and there I saw what I needed—I must be born again. I read on, and came to the sixteenth verse: 'God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life.' I was struck by these beautiful words. 'Does that include me? Yes,' I said, 'Whosoever includes me; I will venture on this love.' I tried to give God my heart; and there, in that midnight hour, far away on the billows, I cast my poor guilty soul on His mercy; and, while pleading this precious word, I felt peace and comfort within me."

V. THE LOVE OF CHRIST. [See also 946-950.]

1. Transcends ours.

(3351.) Love is its own perennial fount of strength. The strength of affection is a proof not of the worthiness of the object, but of the largeness of the soul which loves. Love descends, not ascends. The might of a river depends not on the quality of the soil through which it passes, but on the inexhaustibleness and depth of the spring from which it proceeds. The greater mind cleaves to the smaller with more force than the other to it. A parent loves the child more than the child the parent; and partly because the parent's heart is larger, not because the child is worthier. The Saviour loved His disciples infinitely more than His disciples loved Him, because His heart was infinitely larger. Love trusts on, ever hopes and expects better things; and is a trust springing from itself, and out of its own deeps alone. —Rowland Hill, 1744-1833.

2. The most powerful of motives.

(3352.) Our common motives are no stronger than a handful of water caught in a child's hand, slipping away through his fingers as he tries to clutch and keep it. But Christ's love is like the great river itself, rushing onward evenly, unwearying and unwaiting; strong enough to bear the fleets of all the nations on its waters, fertilising every soil it passes through, offering its strength, and wealth, and fulness to every one alike, irrespective of lineage or of station, of endowment or of purpose, of past doings or of present hopes; saying plainly, "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters."

3. Its conquering power.

(3353.) Alexander, Cæsar, Charlemagne, and I myself, have founded great empires: but upon what do these creations of our genius depend? Upon force. Jesus, alone, founded His empire upon love, and to this very day millions would die for Him. . . . I think I understand something of human nature; and I tell you, all these were men; and I am a man: none else is like Him! Jesus Christ was more than man.

—Napoleon I., 1769-1821.

(3354.) A friend of mine was desired to visit a woman in prison; he was informed of her evil habits of life, and therefore spoke strongly of the terrors of the Lord, and the curses of the law: she heard him a while, and then laughed in his face. Upon this he changed his note, and spoke of the Saviour, and what He had done and suffered for sinners. He had not talked long in this strain before he saw a tear or two in her eyes. At length she interrupted him by saying: "Why, sir, do you think there can be any hope of mercy for me?" He answered, "Yes, if you feel your need of it, and are willing to seek it in God's appointed way. I am sure it is as free for you as for myself." She replied, "Ah, if I had thought so, I should not have been in this prison. I long since settled it in my mind that I was utterly lost; that I had sinned beyond all possibility of forgiveness, and that made me desperate."

—Newton, 1666-1663.

(3355.) Two of my brethren, John Waterhouse and David Cargill, landed upon an island in Fejee. They knew well the character of the people there, and the people did not know their character; but they met them naked, and clubbed, and scowling, ready to destroy to all appearance. The two white men walked straight up to them, and the first, who evidently was a chief, and ready to take part in the proceedings whatever they might be, was suddenly arrested in his intentions towards the white men by Mr. Cargill walking up to him and bowing, and saying, "My love to you;" and he turned round to the next, and said, "My love to you;" and then to the rest, "My love to you;" and in a very little time all the clubs were down, and they began to talk, and then there was an opportunity for them to stay and then to preach. In a few years Mr. Cargill was leaving that island, and one of these great savages followed the boat, holding out a pretty little thing he had made, and said "Wait, wait; I want you to take this home to your mother. Great is my love to your mother. This is not much, but I made it with my own hand; carry it home to your mother. Tell her before you came I was a cannibal, and killed men and ate them, but now the love of God is burning in my heart; and if your mother had not loved me and let you come to tell me that Christ had died, I should have been a cannibal to this day. Great is my love to your mother. Take this home to your mother for me."

—Arthur.

(3356.) A minister in one of our large cities had prepared and preached, as he supposed, a most convincing sermon for the special benefit of an influential member of his congregation, who was well known to be of an infidel turn of mind. The sinner listened unmoved to the well-turned sentences and the earnest appeals; his heart was unaffected. On his return from church he saw a tear trembling in the eye of his little daughter, whom he tenderly loved, and he inquired the cause. The child informed him that she was thinking of what her Sabbath-school teacher had told her of Jesus Christ. "And what did she tell you of Jesus Christ, my child?" "Why, she said He came down from heaven and died for poor me!" and in a moment the tears gushed from eyes which had looked upon the beauties of only seven summers, as in the simplicity of childhood she added: "Father, should I not love One who has so loved me?" The proud heart of the infidel was touched. What the eloquent plea of his minister could not accomplish, the tender sentence of his child had done, and he retired to give vent to his own feelings in a silent but penitent prayer. That evening found him at the praying circle, where, with brokenness of spirit, he asked the prayers of God's people. When he came to relate his Christian experience, he gave this incident, and closed his narration by saying: "Under God, I owe my conversion to a little child, who first convinced me by her artless simplicity that I ought to love One who had so loved me." The minister on returning from this meeting, took his sermon and read it over carefully, and said to his family and to himself: "There is not enough of Jesus Christ in this discourse."

VI. LOVE TO GOD.

1. God must be loved for His own sake.

(3357.) All our love is moved from some good, which we apprehend in the party loved: carnal love, from beauty; worldly, from gain; spiritual, from grace; divine, from infinite goodness. It must needs be, therefore, that when the ground and motive of our love faileth, the affection itself must cease. Those that are enamoured of a beautiful face find their passion cooled with a loathsome deformity: those that are led by the hopes of profit, like wasps, leave buzzing about the gally-pot, when all the honey is gone; those that could carry the rod familiarly in their hand, run from it when they see it turned to a serpent. Contrarily, when that which attracts our love is constant to itself and everlasting, the affection set upon it is permanent and eternal: if then I love God for riches, for preferment, for my own indemnity, when intervening crosses strip me of the hopes of all these, I shall be ready to say, with that distempered king of Israel, "Behold, this evil is of the Lord: what should I wait for the Lord any longer?" (2 Kings vi. 33). If my respects to my Saviour be for the loaves and fishes, my heart is carried away with those baskets of fragments; but, if I can love God for His goodness' sake, this love shall out-last time, and overmatch death (Cant. iii. 6.)

Hall, 1574-1656.

2. How it is to be kindled in the soul.

(3358.) The love of God is not to be summoned into being or activity at a call. It is not by any simple or direct effort that you can bid it into any operation. You can say to the hand, Do this, and it doeth it, but we have no such mastery over the untractable heart. The true way of bidding an emotion into the heart, is to bid into the mind its appropriate and counterpart object. If I want to light up resentment in my heart, let me think of the injury which provoked it; or if I want to be moved with compassion, let me dwell on some picture of wretchedness; or to be regaled with a sense of beauty, let me look out of myself on the glories of a summer landscape; or, to stir up within me a grateful affection, let me call to remembrance some friendly demonstration of a kind and trusty benefactor; or, finally, to rekindle in my cold and deserted bosom the love of God, let the love of God to me be the theme of my believing contemplation.

—Chalmers, 1780-1847.

(3359.) The power to evolve in one's self the element of filial love is not given to us. It is not needful that it should be. Why should the anemone covet the power that it has not? It sleeps to-day on the hill-side. There, underneath the sod, a thousand spring beauties are hidden. Around the trunks of living trees, around deserted stumps, and around uncongenial stones are troops of wild-flowers. And not one of these can lift itself up, and open its petals, or paint them with beautiful colours. The sun has the power to do this; and why should the flowers covet this power? For that sweet orb will not forget them. It is coming already from the south. The lengthening days mark its approaching footsteps. And by and by it will reach out its sceptre of light and warmth, and say to them, "Come forth!" and every one that lies dormant within the ground shall rejoice, and begin to come forth. God has garnered up the power of the resurrection of the flowers in the sun, and there is no need that they should covet that power. And why should we covet the power to lift up our souls, and cause them to blossom into higher affections? If God has not lent it to us we need not covet it, and we do not need to add it to our prerogatives. God never forgets to touch the heart with the sceptre of Divine love, and if we heeded it, and were half as obedient to it as the flower is to the life-giving influence of the sun in spring, we should be like the garden of the Lord.

—Becher.

(3360.) We have brought near to us in Jesus Christ a God whose nature it is to be bountiful, tender, sweet, beautiful, so that when we begin to see the traits that are in Him, they draw out the same traits in us. We love because He has loved us.

If you go into Steinway's manufactory or ware-room, and strike certain chords of one of the powerful instruments, the chords of all the other instruments, though they are covered up, and apparently mute, will sound. Such are the correspondences which exist between them, such is the sympathy which is communicated from one to another by the air, that when one vibrates they all vibrate. Though the sound be low and almost inaudible, it is there. When the grandeur, the beauty, and the love of the divine nature are presented to a man, they draw some response from every part of his nature which corresponds to that which is presented. So it is that there begins to be, through this conception of God in Christ Jesus, a piety which is in the nature of a personal communion or affiliation. The hearts of men are thus drawn toward the heart of God, and there begins to be an interplay between them. —Becher.

(3361.) This highest of all possible love can only be produced by the quickening action of the Holy Spirit. It is out of the groundwork of the natural affections that the Christian love is produced, but it cannot exist without the direct action of God upon the heart. In the cold northern climes enough food is produced for the subsistence of man. The common fruits of the field grow in sufficient abundance to support life. But the productions of hotter countries—the grape, the olive, the fig—will not thrive there. The soil is the same in both. But in the cold countries the life-giving rays of the sun are wanting. It is also thus with man. The heart and its affections are the same in all of us. Amongst the whole human race, love and its kindred virtues flourish sufficiently to enable people to live with comfort in each other's society. But the highest love—the love of God—can only flourish in the sunshine of His grace. —Hooper.

(3362.) Frequently at the great Roman games, the emperors, in order to gratify the citizens of Rome, would cause sweet perfumes to be rained down upon them through the awning which covered the amphitheatre. Behold the vases, the huge vessels of perfume! Yes, but there is nought here to delight you so long as the jars are sealed; but let the vases be opened, and the vessels be poured out, and let the drops of perfumed rain begin to descend, and every one is refreshed and gratified thereby. Such is the love of God. There is a richness and a fulness in it, but it is not perceived till the Spirit of God pours it out like the rain of fragrance over the heads and hearts of all the living children of God. See, then, the need of having the love of God shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost!

—Spurgeon.

2. It is capable of being cultivated.

(3363.) We assume that, simply because it is enjoined. When an apostle says, "Have fervent charity among yourselves," it is plain that it would be a cruel mockery to command men to attain it if they could do nothing towards the attainment. It would be the same insult as saying to the deformed, "Be beautiful." For it is wanton cruelty to command where obedience is impossible.

How shall we cultivate this charity?

Now I observe, first, love cannot be produced by a direct action of the soul upon itself. You cannot love by a resolve to love. That is as impossible as it is to move a boat by pressing it from within. The force with which you press on is exactly equal to that with which you press back. The reaction is exactly equal to the action. You force backwards exactly as much as you force on. There are religious persons who, when they feel their affections cooled, strive to warm them by self-reproach, or by unnatural efforts, or by the excitement of what they call revivals—trying to work themselves into a state of warm affection. There are others who hope to make feeble love strong by using strong words. Now, for all this they pay a price. Effort of heart is followed by collapse. Excitement is followed by exhaustion. They will find that they have cooled exactly in that proportion in which they warmed, and at least as fast.

It is as impossible for a man to work himself into a state of genuine fervent love as it is for a man to inspire himself. Inspiration is a breath and a life coming from without. Love is a feeling roused not from ourselves, but from something outside ourselves. There are, however, two methods by which we may cultivate this charity.

1. By doing acts which love demands. It is God's merciful law that feelings are increased by acts done on principle. If a man has not the feeling in its warmth, let him not wait till the feeling comes. Let him act with such feelings as he has; with a cold heart if he has not got a warm one; it will grow warmer while he acts. You may love a man merely because you have done him benefits, and so become interested in him, till interest passes into anxiety, and anxiety into affection. You may acquire courtesy of feeling at last, by cultivating courteous manner. The dignified politeness of the last century forced man into a kind of unselfishness in small things, which the abrupt manners of to-day will never teach. And say what men will of rude sincerity, these old men of urbane manners were kinder at heart with real good-will, than we are with that rude bluntness which counts it a loss of independence to be courteous to any one. Gentleness of manner had some influence on gentleness of heart.

So in the same way, it is in things spiritual. If our hearts are cold, and we find it hard to love God and be affectionate to man, we must begin with duty. Duty is not Christian liberty, but it is the first step towards liberty. We are free only when we love what we are to do, and those to whom we do it. Let a man begin in earnest with—I ought, he will end, by God's grace, if he persevere, with the free blessedness of—I will. Let him force himself to abound in small offices of kindness, attention, affectionateness, and all those for God's sake. By and by he will feel them become the habit of his soul. By and by, walking in the conscientiousness of refusing to retaliate when he feels tempted, he will cease to wish it; doing good and heaping kindness on those who injure him, he will learn to love them. For he has spent a treasure there, "And where the treasure is, there will be the heart also."

2. The second way of cultivating Christian love is by contemplating the love of God. You cannot move the boat from within; but you may obtain a purchase from without. You cannot create love in the soul by force from within itself; but you may move it from a point outside itself. God's love is the point from which to move the soul. Love begets love. Love believed in, produces a return of love; we cannot love because we must. "Must" kills love; but the law of our nature is that we love in reply to love. No one ever yet hated one whom he believed to love him truly. We may be provoked by the pertinacity of an affection which asks what we cannot give; but we cannot hate the true love which does not ask but gives. Now, this is the eternal truth of Christ's Gospel, "We love Him because He first loved us." "Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another." "God is love." —Robertson, 1816-1853.

4. Leads to trust in God.

(3364.) Let a man try to learn God's ways only by his intellect, and he will find many things to perplex and embarrass. There is much in God's government of this world that is quite unfathomable to human reason. In a world like this scepticism is easier than faith. If any man wish to stumble at God's ways, he may easily find stumbling stones. He may point to many of God's dealings which bear the appearance of unkindness and injustice; he may point to much that the most godly man must confess is seemingly inconsistent with infinite justice and love. The godly man sees difficulties in the Divine government as well as the infidel; but he is not distressed by them, permanently at least, for "the love of God is shed abroad in his heart by the Holy Ghost given unto him;" he has such a deep and abiding conviction of God's infinite love, that he cannot believe Him guilty of unkindness, much less of injustice; he knows that there must be, and is, a satisfactory explanation of these difficulties, and he is content to wait until God chooses to give him the explanation. Take an illustration. Here is a little child, whose father is suddenly accused of some terrible crime. Though the accused has hitherto borne a good name, the proofs of his guilt seem so numerous and conclusive that even his dearest friends abandon and shun him. But the little child does not believe his father guilty. "No," says he, "I know my father's heart, and I am quite sure that he never did that." In like manner, by the intuition of love, the Christian has a settled and immovable conviction that ultimately nothing can ever throw the shadow of a shade over God's infinite goodness. —Davis.

5. A test of its reality.

(3365.) A loving wife, when her husband returns home from a far country, as soon as she is sensible of his approach or hears his voice, although she be ever so much engaged in business, or forcibly detained from him in the midst of a crowd, yet her heart is not withheld from him, but leaps over all other thoughts to think on her husband who is returned. It is the same with souls that love God; well, let them be ever so busy, when the remembrance of God comes near them, they lose almost the thought of all things else, for joy to see that this dear remembrance is returned; and this is an extreme good sign. —Francis de Sales.

6. Comfort for those who lament that it is feeble in them.

(3366.) Let not a humble Christian be over-anxious, if his spiritual affections are not as keen as he would wish. The love of God is the full-blown flower of which the love of man is the bud. To love man is to love God. To do good to man will be recognised hereafter as doing good to Christ. These are the Judge's words: "Verily, I say unto you, inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye did unto Me."

—Robertson, 1816-1853.

VII. LOVE TO CHRIST. [See also 1003, 1004.]

(3367.) We would please those whom we greatly love. No praises are as sweet as theirs. We can bear the frown of others if they only smile. We often care for no other compensation for toil, and pain, and suffering than their approval. The affectionate child who contends at school or college for some prize of youthful ambition, knows of no stimulant to his industry and exertion like that which he feels when he thinks what may be the joy one day of father and mother, brother and sister, on his account. When he has succeeded in the strife he is not moved by the commendation of his teachers, or the plaudits of his companions, as he is by what he knows will be thought, and felt, and said at home. The man who has won renown by his service to his country and to mankind, has often confessed that no honours he has received have so recompensed his heart for what he had achieved, as the greetings which welcomed him in the little town or village where he was born and reared. He has felt that the delight in his triumph of those who were dear to him through old memories and associations, or even that the joy he has given to one heart, the exulting smile on one face, the approving glad words that fell from one tongue, were worth more to him than all acclamations and gifts besides. It is of the nature of true love thus to prize the joy and approval of its object. But there is no true love, or so great, as that which Christ can inspire.

—David Thomas, B.A., 1811-1875.

(3368.) Is there no sin in not doing what you ought to do? If your neighbour's house were in flames to-night, and you saw them belching out of the windows, would it be no sin for you to sit calmly in your own dwelling, and not go at midnight to raise the family from their fatal sleep? Would you think so if to-morrow morning you looked at their skeletons amid the charred and blackened ruins? Suppose there is some man in this chapel to-night, who lives in a comfortable and luxurious mansion, but his own mother is in an almshouse, I say to him, "Where is your old mother?" He says, "In the poorhouse." "Do you know, sir, that you are practising a diabolical cruelty?" "Oh! but I am doing nothing to my mother." "It is your not doing; it is your living in luxury, and she lying there on that hard bed of poverty and neglect, that stamps you, sir, with that most damnable sin of breaking God's fifth commandment. It is what you do not do that stamps you as an ingrate to her that bore you." Oh! my friends, yet out of Christ, it is the sin of not loving Christ that makes you guilty before God. Not loving Him is pronounced in all cases a positive and fatal sin. —Cuyler.

(3369.) Where Christ is loved and desired, the veriest trifles of common life may be the means of His discovery. "And it came to pass, as Jesus sat at meat with them, He took bread and blessed it, and brake and gave to them. And their eyes were opened, and they knew Him.

We know not what was the special point which brought their dormant remembrance to life again, and quickened their associations, so that they knew Him; even as we do not know what was the hindrance, whether supernatural or whether by reason of their own fault, which prevented the earlier recognition; but this at least we see, that in all probability something in the manner of taking the bread and breaking it, the well-remembered action of the Master, brought back to mind the whole of the former relation, and a rush of associations and memories pulled away the veil and scaled off the mists from their eyes. And so, dear brethren, if we have loving and waiting and Christ-desiring spirits, everything in this world—the common meal, the events of every day, the most veritable trifles of our earthly relationships—they will all have hooks and barbs, as it were, which will draw after them thoughts of Him. There is nothing so small but that to it there may be attached some filament which will bring after it the whole majesty and grace of Christ and His love. Whether ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all in remembrance of Him, and do all to His glory. Oh, if we had in our inmost spirits a closer fellowship with Him, and a truer relation to Him, we should be more quick of apprehension. And, as in regard to those that we love, when they are away from us, the fold of a garment, some bit of cloth lying about the room, something upon the table, some common incident of the day that used to be done in company with them, may bring a flood of memories that sometimes is too strong for a weak heart, so with the Lord, if we loved Him—everything would be (as it is to those whose ears are purged) vocal with His name, and everything would be flushed with the light that falls from His face, and everything would suffice to remind us of our love, our hope, our joy.

—Maclaren.

VIII. LOVE TO THE BRETHREN.

1. Is the badge of Christ's disciples.

(3370.) So peculiar is this blessing to the gospel, that Christ appoints it for the badge and cognizance by which they should not only know one another, but even strangers should be able to know them from any other sect and sort of men in the world: "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, that ye love one another." A nobleman's servant is known as far as he can well be seen, by the coat on his back, whose man he is; so, saith Christ, shall all men know you, by your mutual love, that you retain to Me and My gospel.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

2. Our love must be like Christ's.

(3371.) We are to have love like that of Christ. In one sense this is impossible. "Measure the waters in the hollow of Thine hand; mete out heaven with a span; comprehend the dust of the earth in a measure; weigh the mountains in scales; and the hills in a balance;"—these are measurable things, but the love of Christ is measureless. There is nothing in His nature which is not infinite. The depths of God are depths of love, for God is love, and Christ is God. His perfections are His glory, but His love is the glory of His glory; the boundless glory of the boundless Essence. Till the less can include the greater, and the human the Divine, we may not fathom the depths, or grasp the dimensions of Christ's love. Then, how can we keep this law? To love like Paul—to love like John—would be a lofty aim, but who can love like Christ?

Let us not mistake His meaning. He asks not that our love should equal His, but resemble His; not that it should be of the same strength, but of the same kind. A pearl of dew will not hold the sun, but it may hold a spark of its light. A child, by the sea, trying to catch the waves as they dash in clouds of crystal spray upon the sand, cannot hold the ocean in a tiny shell, but he may hold a drop of the ocean water. "There is an ocean of love in my heart," says Christ, "let a drop of that ocean be received into yours. Your love one to another must not be a mere earthly element. It must have a different nature from the love you were born with. It must be something higher than love of kindred—or love of home—or love of country; it must be of the same kind as that which I have for you. It must be Divine. Let me pour it into you, that you may pour it out on the objects of your sanctified affections."

—Stanford.

3. We must love what is Christ-like in them.

(3372.) But doth not the Scripture say, "that we know we are translated from death to life, because we love the brethren"?

Answer—Yes; but when you may easily know it speaks of sincere love. So it saith, "Whoever believeth shall be saved;" and yet (Matt. xiii.) Christ sheweth that many believe who yet fall away and perish, for want of deep rooting: so that the sincerity of this love also lieth in the degree; and, therefore, when the promise is made to it, or it made a mark of true Christians, you must still understand it of that degree which may be called sincere and saving. The difference lieth plainly here. An unsound Christian, as he hath some love to Christ, and grace, and godliness, but more to his profits, or pleasures, or credit in the world, so he hath some love to the godly, as such, being convinced that the righteous is more excellent than his neighbour; but not so much as he hath to these carnal things. Whereas the sound Christian, as he loves Christ and grace above all worldly things, so it is Christ in a Christian that he so loves, and the Christian for Christ's sake above all such things: so that when a carnal professor will think it enough to wish them well, but will not hazard his worldly happiness for them, if he were called to it; the sincere believer will not only love them, but relieve them, and value them so highly, that, if he were called to it, he would part with his profits or pleasures, for their sakes. For example, in Queen Mary's days, when the martyrs were condemned to the fire, there were many great men that really loved them, and wished them well, and their heart grieved in pity for them, as knowing them to be in the right; but yet they loved their honour, and wealth, and safety, so much better, that they would sit on the bench, yea, and give sentence for their burning, for fear of hazarding their worldly happiness. Was this sincere, saving love to the brethren?

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

4. We are to love them on account of what they are to be.

(3373.) Foresee the perfections of their graces in their beginnings. No man will love a seed or stock of those plants or trees which bear the most beautiful flowers and fruits, unless, in the seed, he foresee the fruit or flower which it tendeth to. No man loveth the egg aright, who doth not foreknow what a bird it will bring forth. Aristotle or Cicero were no more amiable in their infancy than others, except to him that could foretell what men they were like to prove. Think oft of heaven, and what a thing a saint will be in glory, when he shall shine as the stars, and be equal to the angels, and then you will quickly see cause to love them.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

MAN.

1. The Darwinian hypothesis as to his origin.

(3374.) Many able scientists are investigating the road through which men came up to their present state; but it is of little consequence to me where I came from. It is of a great deal of consequence, though, where I am going to. I confess to some curiosity as to my origin; and I am far from saying that it will not do any good to trace the history of the origin of the human race, and of everything else in this world. I regard the labours of Mr. Darwin with profound interest; and I believe the world owes him a great debt of gratitude. Although I may not accept all his speculations, I thank him for any facts, or any deductions from facts, which have the appearance of nearly definite truth. I do not participate a particle in the revulsion and horror which some feel at the idea that men sprang from some lower form of existence. Only show me that I am clear of the monkeys, and I am perfectly willing that it should be true that, millions of years ago, my ancestors sprang from them. Let there be difference enough, and distance enough, between these animals and me, and I do not care how nearly my progenitors may have been related to them. I would as lief have sprung from a monkey as from some men that I know of. If I look at the Patagonians, or the Nootka Sound Indians, or the Esquimaux of the extreme North, it does not seem to me that there is much to choose, as to parentage, between them and our lower animals. I do not care so much about the past, as I do about the future. It is not of the slightest importance that I should trace my early associations back to a million years ago. All my life is looking forward. I do not care where I came from: I want to know where I am going. If I am going with the animal, earth to earth, that is sad enough; but if I am under that attraction, that mighty power, which calls the sun to make summer in the bosom of winter, which all the winds and ice cannot resist, which generates heat, and which out of heat brings life-universal, infinite, multitudinous, innumerable—if I am under that power, and it is still drawing you and me and all along in these paths, and it is vouchsafed that we may be partakers of the Divine nature, then that is something that I want to know, and something that I want to feel.

Now, let men bore in the rear if they will: it is for me to look up and see where I am going. For, if it is life and immortality, and joy ineffable and full of glory there, I care not for the nest. I care not for the skin that I sloughed off ages ago. It is the future that I care for. The Christian has little to fear, I think, if it will only lead on to this. Not to deny the past, nor to be indifferent to the things of the past, it is not probable that we shall, in your day or mine, find out everything that God ever thought of or did. It is far more important that we should have faith in the future, and know which way to fly when we have the inspiration of emigration, than that we should know what took place: myriads of ages ago, or what was the condition of the race then.

—Becher.

(3375.) In so far as our duties are concerned, we are far more interested in knowing what man is, than in knowing how he came to be what he is. It is not uninteresting to me to know how my son reached home for the festivities of thanksgiving, or of the holidays: but it is far more interesting to me to know that he is there, than to know by what road he came. It may be of a good deal of interest to know how some unknown benefactor has liquidated the debt that seemed likely to sweep away your prosperity; but it is a great deal more to the point to know that the mortgage is paid or lifted, if you never in the world know how it came to be done. It is for us to know what man is; of what he is susceptible. He is here. He exists. He may be studied in his present condition. He may be studied in all his possibilities. These are questions of more importance than to know the road which he took to get here, or the influences which operated to bring him here.

—Becher.

2. Is more than an animal.

(3376.) Man is not an organism; he is an intelligence served by organs.

—Sir W. Hamilton, 1788-1856.

(3377.) There are striking analogies, nay, even resemblances, between the higher order of quadrupeds and the lower members of the human family. Yet from these most brutelike among men may be drawn the most cogent argument for the existence and indestructibility of the spiritual element in man. Sixty years ago the half-reasoning elephant or the tractable and troth-keeping dog might have seemed the peer, or more, of the unreasoning and conscienceless Hawaiian. From that very race, from that very generation, with which the nobler brutes might have scorned to claim kindred, have been developed the peers of saints and angels. Does not the susceptibility of a regeneration so radical, the capacity for all that is tender, beautiful, and glorious in the humanity of Him whom we Christians revere as the Lord from heaven, inherent in even the lowest types of our race, of itself claim for man a nature which the brutes around him share as little in kind as in degree? Has physical science a right to leave "the new man in Christ Je-us," which the most squalid savage may become, entirely unaccounted for in its theory of spontaneous development?

—I'eboddy.

3. The grandeur and complexity of his nature.

(3378.) The grandeur of man's nature turns to insignificance all outward distinctions. His powers of intellect, of conscience, of love, of knowing God, of perceiving the beautiful, of acting on his own mind, on outward nature, and on his fellow-creatures,—these are glorious prerogatives. Through the vulgar error of undervaluing what is common, we are apt, indeed, to pass them by as of but little worth. But as in the outward creation, so in the soul, the common is the most precious. Science and art may invent splendid modes of illuminating the apartments of the opulent; but these are all poor and worthless compared with the light which the sun sends into our windows, which he pours freely, impartially, over hill and valley, which kindles daily the eastern and western sky; and so the common lights of reason, and conscience, and love, are of more worth and dignity than the rare endowments which give celebrity to a few.

—Channing, 1780-1842.

(3379.) Man is the highest product of his own history. The discoverer finds nothing so grand or so tall as himself, nothing so valuable to him. The greatest star is that at the little end of the telescope, —the star that is looking, not looked after, nor looked at.

—Theodore Parker.

(3380.) The essence of our being, the mystery in us that calls itself "I,"—ah, what words have we for such things?—is a breath of Heaven; the Highest Being reveals himself in man. This body, these faculties, this life of ours, is it not all as a vesture for that Unnamed? "There is but one temple in the universe," says the devout Novalis, "and that is the body of man. Nothing is holier than that high form. Bending before men is a reverence done to this revelation in the flesh. We touch heaven when we lay our hand on a human body!" This sounds much like a mere flourish of rhetoric; but it is not so. If well meditated, it will turn out to be a scientific fact; the expression, in such words as can be had, of the actual truth of the thing. We are the miracle of miracles,—the great inscrutable mystery of God. We cannot understand it, we know not how to speak of it; but we feel and know, if we like, that it is verily so.
—Carlyle.

(3381.) Hath not God given us a soul to inform us; senses to inform our soul; faculties to furnish that soul; understanding, the great surveyor of the secrets of nature and grace; fantasy and invention, the master of the works; memory, the great keeper or master of the rolls of the soul, a power that can make amends for the speed of time, in causing him to leave behind him those things, which else he would so carry away, as if they had not been; will, which is the lord paramount in the state of the soul, the commander of our actions, the elector of our resolutions; judgment, which is the great counsellor of the will; affections, which are the servants of them both; a body, fit to execute the charge of the soul—so wondrously disposed, as that every part hath best opportunity in his own functions—so qualified with health arising from proportion of humours, that, like a watch kept in good time, it goes right, and is fit to serve the soul and maintain itself.
—Hall, 1574-1656.

(3382.) As there is much beast and some devil in man, so is there some angel and some God in man. The beast and the devil may be conquered, but in this life never destroyed.
—Coleridge, 1772-1834.

(3383.) "In man there will be a layer of fierce hyena, or of timid deer, running through the nature in the most uncertain and tortuous manner. Nero is sensitive to poetry and music, but not to human suffering: Marcus Aurelius is tolerant and good to all men but Christians." The Tlascalans of Mexico loved, and even worshipped, flowers; but they were cruel to excess, and sacrificed human victims with savage delight. The good and the evil lie close together; the virtues and the vices alternate; so is human power accumulated; alternately the metals and the rags; a terrible Voltaic pile. In the well-bred animal the claw is nicely cushioned; the old Adam is presentable.
—A. F. Russell.

4. Was made in the image of God.

(3384.) There is one correspondence between man and nature so pre-eminently striking, that it is marvellous it has not found more frequent mention in natural theology.

The Bible tells us that God made man in His own image; science gives us a proof of it, showing that in very truth the ideas of man's mind are akin to the ideas of the Divine mind.

The proof is capable of very simple statement.

We all know that the science of geometry was worked out in ancient times from a few very simple principles which man found in his own mind. It was worked out by Euclid and Archimedes by pure reasoning, out of their own minds. Ages afterwards the telescope was discovered, and the courses of the planets and comets were ascertained; and the Galileos and Newtons beheld with reverent wonder that these heavenly bodies, in all their mazy revolutions, do obey those very laws of geometry which the mathematician, hundreds of years before, had evolved out of the necessary conditions of thought involved in the constitution of his own mind.

How was this correspondence to be accounted for? those curves traced on the sand of his study floor, by an Archimedes found to be the very curves swept out in the heavenly spaces by the mighty comets? I say how and why was this? How was it that man found his thoughts thus verified in God's universe?

One only explanation is there, that God had the same thoughts, and chose to exemplify them in that universe; the ideas of the Divine mind and the ideas of the human mind thus wonderfully corresponding! Man made in the image of God. There is no other explanation.

5. His original perfection.

(3385.) All those arts, rarities, and inventions, which vulgar minds gaze at, the ingenious pursue, and all admire, are but the relics of an intellect defaced with sin and time. We admire it now, only as antiquaries do a piece of old coin, for the stamp it once bore, and not for those vanishing lineaments and disappearing draughts that remain upon it at present. And certainly that must needs have been very glorious, the decays of which are so admirable. He that is comely when old and decrepit, surely was very beautiful when he was young. An Aristotle was but the rubbish of an Adam, and Athens but the rudiments of Paradise.
—South, 1633-1716.

6. His fall.

(1.) Its evidences.

(3386.) If you should see a house with its gable ends in ruins, with its broken pillars lying in heaped-up confusion on the ground, half covered up with trailing weeds and moss, you would not hesitate to say, "This building has suffered damage at some time; it was not like this when it came from the hand of the builder." I say this of man. He is not in a normal condition.
—Hepworth.

(3387.) Bartholomew Fair is one of the most perfect exhibitions of unrestrained human nature in the whole world. The monkey, the tiger, the wolf, the hog, and the goat, are not only to be found in their own, but in human form, with all their savageness, brutality, filthiness. It displays human nature in its most degraded, ridiculous, and absurd conditions. The tiger may be seen in a quiescent state, if we pass through Dyot Street:

he couches there; he blinks; but at Bartholomew Fair he is rampant, vigorous, fierce. Passing through a fair in a country town, I witnessed a most instructive scene:—Two withered, weather-beaten wretches were standing at the door of a show-cart, and receiving two-pences from sweet, innocent, ruddy country girls, who paid their money, and dropped their curtsies; while these wretches smiled at their simplicity, and clapped them on the back as they entered the door. What a picture this of Satan! He sets off his shows, and draws in heedless creatures, and takes from them everything they have good about them! There was a fellow dressed out as a zany, with a humpback and a humpbelly, a lengthened nose and a lengthened chin. To what a depth of degradation must human nature be sunk to seek such resources! I derived more instruction from this scene than I could have done from many elaborate theological treatises.

—Cecil, 1748–1810.

(2.) Its effects.

(3388.) The sin of man, being the lord of all creatures, must needs redound to the misery and mortality of all his retinue. For it was in the greater world, as in the administration of a private family; the poverty of the master is felt in the bowels of the rest; his stain and dishonour runs into all the members of that society. As it is in the natural body, some parts may be distempered and ill-affected alone; others, not without contagion on the rest; so likewise is it in the great body of the creation. However other creatures might have kept their evil, if any had been in them, within their own bounds, yet that evil which man, the lord and heart of the whole, brought into the world, was a spreading and infectious evil, which conveyed poison into the whole frame of nature, and planted the seed of universal dissolution, which shall one day deface with darkness and horror the beauty of that glorious frame which we now admire. —Salter.

(3.) The Scripture account of it vindicated.

(3389.) It has been sneeringly and tauntingly demanded, "What great evil could there be in plucking an apple from a certain tree? Would it," it is asked, "be becoming the majesty of Almighty God to condemn His creatures for so small an offence?" . . . The ground of the objection is utterly fallacious. The objector seems to insinuate that the value or amount of the fruit abstracted constituted "the front and head of man's offending," and that Deity was actuated by passion and revenge in the punishment which He inflicted. Now, no charge can be more absurd and utterly unfounded than this. To suppose that the sovereign Lord and proprietor of all worlds, and whose is this earth and the fulness thereof, should have grudged to His creatures the fruit of a single tree in Paradise, notwithstanding all the munificence with which He had furnished and stored it as their abode, is too preposterous an idea to be entertained for a moment.

The ground of their condemnation, then, was plainly, that the act of eating the forbidden fruit involved in it disobedience, revolt, and rebellion. The prohibition was designed simply as a test of continued allegiance. In every point of view it was peculiarly suitable to their circumstances and condition. As the happy tenants of this earthly abode of bliss, it was the acknowledgment that they held all they possessed by the mere goodness of their indulgent and bountiful Creator. If an earthly prince were to bestow on one of his subjects a valuable estate on condition of some act of homage, trivial in itself, but still a recognition of the sovereignty of the giver, and the allegiance due to him, would he be considered as fairly chargeable with injustice, or would it be held as any reflection on his goodness, in the original deed of gift, if he should prescribe such a condition on pain of forfeiture, not only of the estate, but of the favour of the donor? If the acknowledgment required was a mere pepper-corn, would its smallness and trifling value be considered as a proper subject for ridicule and scorn? Would it not be universally admitted, that the smaller the temptation to incur the forfeiture, the greater the guilt, the ingratitude, and the folly of transgression? But the test prescribed to man, as a test of allegiance to his Creator in the garden of Eden, was not the payment of any tribute, but the mere abstinence from the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil. —Ewing.

7. His nature depraved.

(3390.) A common and steady effect shows, that there is somewhere a prevailing liableness in the state of things to what comes so steadily to pass. A steady effect argues a steady cause. If a die be once thrown, and it falls on a particular side, we do not argue from hence, that that side is the heaviest; but if it be thrown without skill or care many thousands or millions of times, and it constantly falls on the same side, we have not the least doubt in our minds, but that there is something of propensity in the case, by superior weight of that side, or in some other respect. How ridiculous would he make himself, who should earnestly dispute against any tendency in the state of things to cold in the winter, or heat in the summer; or should stand to it, that although it often happened that water quenched fire, yet there was no tendency in it to such an effect.

In the case we are upon, human nature, as existing in such an immense diversity of persons and circumstances, and never failing in any one instance of coming to that issue—that sinfulness, which implies extreme misery and eternal ruin—is as the die often cast. For it alters not the case in the least, as to the evidence of tendency, whether the subject of the constant event be an individual, or a nature and kind. Thus, if there be a succession of trees of the same sort, proceeding one from another, from the beginning of the world, growing in all countries, soils, and climates, all bearing ill-fruit; it as much proves the nature and tendency of the kind, as if it were only one individual tree, that had remained from the beginning of the world, often transplanted into different soils, and had continued to bear only bad fruit. So if there were a particular family, which, from generation to generation, and through every remove to innumerable different countries, and places of abode, all died of consumption, or all run distracted, or all murdered themselves, it would be as much evidence of the tendency of something in the nature or constitution of that race, as it would be of the tendency of something in the nature or state of an individual, if some one person had lived all that time, and some remarkable event had often appeared in him, which he had been the agent or subject of from year to year, and from age to age, continually and without fail.

Thus a propensity, attending the present nature or natural state of mankind, eternally to ruin themselves by sin, may certainly be inferred from apparent and acknowledged fact.

—Jonathan Edwards, 1703-1758.

(3391.) It is of dangerous consequence to represent to man how near he is to the level of beasts, without showing him at the same time his greatness. It is likewise dangerous to let him see his greatness without his meanness. It is more dangerous yet to leave him ignorant of either; but very beneficial that he should be made sensible of both.

—Pascal, 1622-1662.

(3392.) "That fox." Many wild beasts lie lurking under the skin of man.

—Cardinal Bovillus.

(3393.) We have such an habitual persuasion of the general depravity of human nature, that in falling among strangers we always reckon on their being irreligious, till we discover some specific indication of the contrary.

—John Foster, 1710-1843.

(3394.) The most convincing evidence is presented to us every day, that the nature of man necessarily and essentially tends to sin. Did you ever know an infant grow through childhood, I will not say to adult age, but to youth, without sinning often and seriously? Every one who is familiar with young children must be aware that they sin by instinct, and of their own nature, quite irrespective of any bad habits which they acquire from those around them. The sin comes spontaneously, just as the evil growth amongst the wheat. No farmer can grow his corn without weeds; and no father can educate his child so as to be free from sin. The child is passionate, and exhibits its passion in a miniature tempest of wrath. The child is selfish, and steals its brother's toys, and follows the wrong doing with all its little resentful power when restitution is made. The child is disobedient, and transgresses its parent's commands, and lies to hide the fault when detection is imminent. In a word, no sooner does the child become a moral agent, than it also becomes essentially sinful, just to the extent to which its nature is developed. Education may do much to eradicate the evil; but the fact remains that education is necessary. The plant does not grow straight but crooked, and must be trained to symmetry. The human heart is essentially depraved.

—Hooper.

(3395.) The assumption of the New Testament is that men by nature are animals. The scriptural use of the word flesh in the New Testament writings indicates that men by nature are living in the animal condition; and it is taught that in that condition it is not possible for them to understand higher truths, nor to feel higher influences, nor to enter into the experience of those regal joys which belong to a man when he is developed in his higher faculties. It is declared everywhere in the New Testament—not so much declared as assumed—that the heart is sinful. The apparent fact that the whole creation groans and travails in pain is argument enough on that subject. The tears, the sorrows, the sufferings of men, which we behold on every hand; the conflicts of the whole world, of which we are cognisant, these things make it evident enough that men are sinful. When a machine is out of order, and the various parts grate and grind against each other, it is not necessary to say to one who hears the grinding, "It is out of order." Therefore no time is spent in the New Testament to prove that men are depraved. It is assumed to be a thing of universal consciousness—as it is.

—Becher.

(3396.) The doctrine of man's sinfulness may be so preached that men revolt from it. It is a profoundly sorrowful truth that men are sinful, and that they need the regenerating power of the Divine Spirit—the new birth; and it may be so preached that all the feelings of men revolt from the representation of it. A great many think they cannot preach the doctrine of sinfulness effectually until they have made men mad. When, by rude and unskilful handling, they have awakened the passions of men, and called forth all their resistance, they say, "Now, this is thorough work. It is sub-soiling human nature. If they are converted from this state, they will be better Christians than they would otherwise be."

If you wanted to take a garrison, would you not think it the better way to quietly steal round to a neglected door in the rear before any alarm was given, and seize them, and take their arms from them? Would not that be the wiser plan in war? Would you cry out to them, "Shut your back door: we are after you"? Would you by cannonading arouse them, and make them as hostile as possible, and then run in and crush them? Would the victory be any better for that?

If a man keeps a bull-dog in his house, and you want to go there without being disturbed by the animal, the best way is to go to the front door quietly, and not wake him up; but many men think, "No, you must stand and throw stones for a while, and then, when the dog's mouth is wide open, go at him."

Now, human nature is very weak: it is full of faults; and I think it needs to be dealt with carefully and cautiously, in order, as far as possible, to prevent the resistance of these unspiritual tendencies: and whoever so preaches the doctrine of the sinfulness of man as to make men angry is unskilful in the handling of the Word.

—Becher.

(3397.) Total depravity—what is it? That clock yonder is made on a plan. So is my soul. The clock may be out of order. So may my soul. When that clock is in order it keeps time. When my soul is in order it obeys conscience. If the clock is so out of order as not to keep time, it is good for nothing as a clock. If my soul is so out of order as not to obey conscience; if I answer, "I will not," when the Divine voice says "I ought," I am not keeping time. Every choice is wrong when I reply by the negative to the infinite affirmative; and as the moral character of all action comes from choice, and as my choice is wrong, I violate the plan of my being; I no longer keep time. I am good for nothing as a clock. But when I say that clock will not keep time, do I mean to say that the wheels in it cannot be put in order? No. Perhaps the wheels are of gold and silver. Disarrangedness in the clock implies its arrangeability. Disarrangedness in the soul implies its arrangeability. That clock will not keep time, however, and so I say it is totally depraved as a clock. Does that mean that the wheels are all slime and the face of it a concrete mass of leprosy, or that there is nothing useful in it? Let us be clear on this topic once for all, for Boston loves clear thought, and supposes that there can be none on this subject. Make a distinction between total depravity and total corruption. That is a distinction as old as St. Augustine, and ought to be tolerably well understood here, where the doctrine of total depravity has so long been attacked mercilessly. If that clock were a concrete mass of unspeakable slime, I should say it was totally corrupt. When it is so out of order that it will not keep time, I say it is totally depraved. If there were nothing in a man capable of arrangement; if, when the soul is out of order it could not but following conscience and by God's good grace be put again into order, I should say it is totally corrupt. But the wheels yonder may be of pearl, the pivots may be of diamonds, and yet the clock not keep time at all. It is not totally corrupt, it is totally depraved. So the human faculties may be wheels of far-flashing silver and gold and pearl; the pivots may roll on diamonds, and yet the man not keep time. He says "I will not," when the still small voice says "I ought;" and you know it is a deliverance of self-evident truth that when a man says that he has a sense of ill desert, he feels that the nature of things is against him. You cannot convince him that he is right with the universe. He is out of order with the universe whenever he does not keep time to the divine "I ought." But is the man incapable of being arranged? Not at all. Total depravity means the moral disarrangement of man and the evil character of his choices. It implies man's arrangeability. It does not mean total corruption. That has no arrangeability. —Joseph Cook.

8. The conflicts of his nature.

(3398.) The flesh represents, in St. Paul's terminology, the whole brood of lower faculties, or that part of our nature which constitutes us animals; and the spirit represents manhood, or that whole class of faculties by which we are exalted into the higher sphere—by which we become sons of God. In a figurative way, he represents these two as in conflict.

It is as if there were two bands of soldiers quartered in one tenement, having an upper and a lower storey. On the ground floor is a company of brawling, drunken, unruly, brutal, violent, cruel men; and in the second storey above them, is a company of soldiers that are gentlemanly, and courteous, and humane, and well-disciplined. And there are three states of affairs which may exist. The brawling soldiers below may govern the house; and then they will have hard times upstairs; for their supplies will be cut off, and they will starve. Or, a part of the time the gentlemen upstairs may govern the house, and part of the time the coarse, brutal fellows downstairs may govern it; and then there will be a terrible conflict. And between the attempts of those upstairs to maintain discipline, and the attempts of those below stairs to break down discipline, the place will be a perfect pandemonium. There will be no peace there. They will be quarrelling perpetually.

And so the animal nature and the manhood, in man, quarrel. Sometimes it is the lower nature that is in the ascendancy; and then whatever things are above it—conscience, faith, hope, all spiritual tendencies, and all supernal tendencies—are at a discount. The upper part of the mind is starved out because of the absolute ascendancy of the appetites and passions—of pride and selfishness, and envy and lusts, and all manner of evil feelings.

Then, by and by, there is the second state. The state of resistance and conflict. The spirit wars against the flesh, and refuses to be in subjection to it. And while this war continues, sometimes one predominates and sometimes the other. The men upstairs to-day have the best of it, and the men down-stairs to-morrow have the best of it. Nothing is settled; nothing is continuous; all is subject to chance.

There is many a half-formed man who has no fixed habits of life, and in whom sometimes one part of his nature gets momentum and comes into the ascendancy, and sometimes the other part. Sometimes those faculties which are seeking to do good govern, and sometimes those that are seeking to do evil govern. And to a greater or less extent there is a state of conflict between the upper and the lower nature, between the manhood and the animal, in every one of us.

Then comes that state in which, by the power of God's Spirit, and by the discipline of life, complete ascendancy is gained by our supersensuous nature. And all the other parts of our being are brought into obedience, as it is said, to the Lord Jesus Christ. Or, if you choose to follow out the psychological figure, the superior faculties in our souls assume control. And then there is peace. Then there is rest.

—Beecher.

9. His moral blindness.

(3399.) It is true that in our state of natural corruption, like the inhabitants of Sodom, who blindly groped to find the door of Lot's house without being able to do so, we in the same manner seek the way of life and immortality, but, struck with a fatal bewilderment, we grow weary of seeking without being able to find it, or rather we find the road of death, in which we walk with the same security as if it was in truth the road of life. —Latreille.

10. His need of a divine redemption.

(3400.) Man's deviation from his duty was, it seems, a disorder in the moral system of the universe, for which nothing less than Divine wisdom could conceive a remedy; the remedy devised nothing less than Divine wisdom and power could apply. Man's disobedience was in the moral world, what it would be in the natural, if a planet were to wander from its orbit, or the constellations to start from their appointed places. It was an evil for which the regular constitution of the world had no cure, which nothing but the immediate interposition of Providence could repair. —Salter.

11. His vanity.

(3401.) I often think that we are like those little heaps of sand that the wind raises on the road, which whirl round for a moment and are scattered directly. —Vianney.

12. His dependence on God.

(3402.) God has but to withdraw His hand which bears us to plunge us back into the abyss of our nothingness, as a stone suspended in the air falls by its own weight the moment it ceases to be held.

—Fenelon.

13. An object of Divine care.

(3403.) The distance between the meanest insect and the mightiest monarch, who treads and crushes reptiles to death without the least regard to them, is a very imperfect image of the distance between God and man. That which proves that it would be beneath the dignity of a monarch to observe the motions of ants or worms, to interest himself in their actions, to punish or to reward them, seems to demonstrate that God would degrade Himself were He to observe, to direct, to punish, or to reward mankind, who are infinitely inferior to Him. But one fact is sufficient to answer this specious objection, that is, that God had created mankind.

—Saurin.

14. His liberty is restricted.

(3404.) We are free only like a bird held by a string, which may think itself free while it does not attempt to fly, but the moment that it tries to get away perceives that it is a prisoner.

—Vianney.

15. His greatness : in what it consists.

(3405.) In our moral sense we bear, though partially obscured and broken, like the shadow in the rippled water, the image of God. Even his immortality does not invest man with such dignity as his conscience. Mere duration, indeed, does not render anything great. You may regard it with feelings of interest when you think how it existed during ages so long gone by : but if it has no intelligence and no conscience—if it has no other quality than its antiquity, you cannot pronounce it great. A clod does not cease to be a clod because it has existed so long. A moral being, though it were only to exist for an hour—the most short-lived insect, if possessed of a moral sense, would be a greater thing than the first and most glorious sun which God sent rolling on its path through space.

—Landels.

(3406.) It is in our higher nature only that we are men ; and it is there only that we measure ourselves as men. Everything in us that is below our moral nature, we have in common with the animal creation around us. Grass is good for mere leaves ; and if it produces enough of them it is good grass. A shrub may produce leaves ; but if it is a shrub that you plant for obtaining blossoms it is not a good shrub unless it has blossoms above the leaves. But the orchard may have leaves, and blossoms above the leaves ; and yet, though grass is good for leaves, and the shrub is good for blossoms, an apple-tree is not good unless it has fruit as well as blossoms and leaves. And vines in vineyards are good, not for leaves alone, nor blossoms, nor clusters of fruit, but for the wine which is produced from the fruit. And men judge accordingly ; measuring the value of a vine, not by the cluster, but by the wine ; measuring an orchard, a little lower, not by the blossom, but by the fruit following the blossom ; measuring an ornamental shrub, not by the leaves, but by the blossoms ; measuring shade-trees, not by the blossoms, but by the leaves ; and measuring grass by a standard yet lower. In other words, they find where the characteristic element of a thing is, and there they measure it. We measure things by the point wherein their superiority lies. The swine we estimate for fatness ; oxen for strength and flesh ; dogs for scent and sagacity ; horses for speed and endurance.

Now man is to be measured by that which makes him MAN, in distinction from everything else ; and that is not foot, nor hand, nor body, nor appetites, nor passions, nor economic or commercial power. These are not the things that make him man. It is that which has been stamped on him—God's image—that makes him man. That part of his nature which introduces the moral element, right and wrong ; the spiritual element, invisible realities ; and the benevolent element, the very divinity of love. Here man must be measured ; for here, and only here, he becomes man, among the creatures of the world. And our substantial judgment of what we are, what our character is, and what we are worth as men, is to be formed upon this high moral development :—You are worth just how good you are!

—Becher.

16. Is immortal [See also The Soul : immortal.]

—Sherlock, 1641-1707.

—Lord-Chancellor Erskine, 1750-1823.

(3409.) Upon this short question, "Is man immortal, or is he not?" depends all that is valuable in science, in morals, and in theology,—and all that is most interesting to man as a social being and as a rational and accountable intelligence. If he is destined to an eternal existence, an immense importance must attach to all his present affections, actions, and pursuits ; and it must be a matter of infinite moment that they be directed in such a channel as will tend to carry him forward in safety to the felicities of a future world. But if his whole existence be circumscribed within the circle of a few fleeting years, man appears an enigma, an inexplicable phenomenon in the universe, human life a mystery, the world a scene of confusion, virtue a mere phantom, the Creator a capricious being, and His plans and arrangements an inextricable maze.

—Dr. T. Dick.

(3410.) Can it be possible that man, a human form, to whom homage is paid both by animal and vegetable; the focus of ingenuity; the wonderful exposition of cause and effect; the living poem of perfect measure; the mechanical wonder of the world; was born and created to grow; and, having done his best to injure or benefit mankind, he, a perfect score in the plan of creation, shall cease to exist when the body sinks; and the soul stained with sin shall meet with no just punishment, when laws against sin govern this world? Or, if he has raised the lowly, forgiven the erring, and relieved the suffering and needy relative, is he to be blotted out, even as a worm is trodden down, and reap the benefit of no approving conscience?

—S. W. Francis, M.D., 1875.

(3411.) The bird within the shell could not comprehend why wings were given for that cramped existence, but the almost unconscious flutter of the prisoned pinions was God's promise of another and a better life.

—Duff Porter.

(3412.) Death cannot kill us. Having once launched this ship, it sails on for ever. Other craft may be sucked into a whirlpool, or shivered on the rocks; but this life within us shall weather the storms, and drop no anchor, and ten million years from now shall shake out signals passing others on the high seas of eternity.

—Talmage.

(3413.) It may be taken as a great and distinctly marked principle in the arrangement of nature, that there is nothing wasteful, and nothing unmeaning; and yet, unless man be appointed to a higher and nobler existence, it is undeniable that there has been bestowed on him a vast deal which is truly superfluous, and that no proportion whatever is maintained between the powers wherewith he is endowed, and the achievements which are placed within his reach. Who can contemplate man, and not perceive him to be possessed of energies and capacities which are thrown away, or lost, if a few years spent within the trammels of a circumscribed scene made up the sum-total of his being? If you extended man's life to thousands of years, and allowed not during this long period old age to enervate his powers, he might continue gathering in accessions of knowledge, in the varied scenes which now invite his research; but any one of which, far too ample to be traversed in the present span of existence, would remain unexhausted where centuries on centuries had been given to their investigation. And what is this but saying, that man is blessed with immeasurably larger capacities than it is possible to fill during the scant moments of his lifetime; so that if at death he be altogether withdrawn from the theatre of being, he carries down with him into nothingness a rich freight of unemployed and undeveloped energies; and thus leaves behind him a record of the wastefulness of the Creator, and furnishes a proof that God bestows what is not wanted, and gives means without an end. We will just suppose, that what is matter of fact in man's intellectual constitution were also matter of fact in his physical. If there were limbs, or nerves, or organs in man's body, which answered no present use, or whose office were inconceivable when compared with their evident power, the anatomist who has rigidly learned that nature does nothing without an end, would be inclined to the persuasion that the body has yet to pass into some other condition, and that then the useless and half-employed powers would find full room for exercise. It is certain that there is much in the anatomy of the infant which is only to be accounted for on the supposition that the infant is to grow into the man; and if we could find the same traces of a prospective arrangement in the full-grown man, the inference would seem unavoidable, that manhood is not the last stage of the body's existence, but that it is designed to be ushered into some broader arena, where the yet unused organs shall be all brought into play. But what we thus suppose in man's physical anatomy, is really found in his intellectual and moral. There are embryo powers which are either not at all, or only partially called forth on earth; there are capacities which will hold immeasurably more than they are here required to contain; there is a grasp and tenacity of intellect which are as much out of place, if there be no futurity, as would be the sinew and grapple of a giant, when only a feather is to be raised, or a straw to be wielded; there are unutterable longings which find nothing in the present scene at all corresponding; in short, the soul of man cannot be "filled," it is too big for time, and craves eternity. And what do we infer from this ascertained disproportion between the powers and circumstances of man? Shall not the intellectual anatomist proceed, as in the like case the physical would proceed? Shall we not believe that the excess of energies over present employment witnesses that the soul is appointed to a future and far higher career—that she is destined to expatiate in a sphere, compared to that which now binds her journeyings, which shrinks into a point? And shall we not learn from the known restlessness of man, from the fact (which, be it observed, is the sole exception to the rule, and the single instance of departure from uniform principle), the fact that creation cannot satisfy the creature, but that the world with all it can afford is too little—shall we not learn from this, that the death of the body terminates not the existence of the spirit; but that in some yet untravelled region, into which the soul shall be hereafter translated, there are objects great enough and glorious enough to engage our every power, and crown our every capacity, and satiate our every longing?

(3414.) In this life the soul never appears to reach the limit of its growth. Every victory increases the facility with which subsequent and more important victories are gained. Every cubit added to its stature accelerates the rapidity of its growth. The wonder of yesterday is the commonplace of to-day; and the task of to-day is the child's play of to-morrow. Nor will it be otherwise, we have reason to think, in the future life. Our sense of congruity would be shocked by the termination of its existence. It would be destroyed in what was comparatively the infancy of its being—the season of its promise, while it felt longings which had not been satisfied, possessed capabilities which had not been exercised, gave promises which had not been fulfilled. It would be as if an artist were to destroy the best of his works while they were yet in course of completion—as if the fairest flowers were to be blighted while yet in the bud—as if the best fruits were to wither before they ripened—as if the sun were to set in the morning, or the winter were immediately to succeed the first buddings of spring. It would be the strangely anomalous procedure of a Being of infinite wisdom and power and goodness ruthlessly destroying, while they were progressing towards a higher perfection, those works which bore, in the most eminent degree, the traces of His power and skill.

—Landels.

(3415.) The truth of life and immortality, which were brought to light in Christ Jesus, had been before believed in a doubting way. It had been in the world as a suggestion, as a hint, as a rumour, one might say, but never as a power.

You are a poor man and ignorant. There is a written document in a chest in your room. You cannot read writing, and you do not know what the document contains, but you have a suspicion that by it you might become the inheritor of great treasure. You take it out, and look at it, and vainly wish that you could read it; you put it back without gaining any knowledge of its purport. By and by some kind friend comes to your relief. A light is kindled in your dwelling, and that document is taken out; he examines it for you. He reads, and as he reads, grows more and more attentive. He stops to ask you, "Who was your father? who was his father? what was your uncle's name?" "Something concerning my uncle, my father, and my father's father?" you say. You are impatient to know what it is. But instead of telling you, he turns the paper over again, and says, "Well, well!" Unable longer to restrain your eagerness to know what are its contents, you say to him, "Tell me what it is. Do not hold me in suspense. What is the news?" At length he says, "Why, sir, do you know that that whole estate is yours? Here is your title. I have brought it out of its hiding-place. This is well. The evidence is unquestionable. You are a millionaire. Your poverty is gone." "Read the paper again. Is it so—that I own that estate?" The man reads it again; you are assured that you are heir to the property. Your neighbours hear the news, and tell it to others; presently it is known through the whole town; great is the rejoicing that you have come to your rights at last!

The world had heard whispers of immortality. There had been fables and pictures, cloud-pictures, and fables grotesque or fantastic. Christ came, and opened God's will, as it is revealed in the New Testament, and made known the love—the suffering love of God. Men began to listen to His glorious teachings. "All that is God's is yours. By faith you may become His sons. You are heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Jesus Christ. All that God owns you shall inherit, of joy, of power, of nobleness, of dignity, of society, of existence, throughout eternity." Such is the revelation. Sound the musical word! Proclaim to all nations and generations the glad tidings that for ever and for ever man shall live!

—Becher.

17. His future.

(3416.) We are quite certain that what we are cannot be the end of God's design. When I see a block of marble half chiselled with just perhaps a hand peeping out from the rock, no man can make me believe that that is what the artist means it should be. And I know I am not what God would have me to be, because I feel yearnings and longings within myself to be infinitely better, infinitely holier and purer, than I am now. And so it is with you; you are not what God means you to be; you have only just begun to be what He wants you to be. He will go on with His chisel of affliction, using wisdom and the graving tool together, till by and by it shall appear what you shall be for; you shall be like Him, and you shall see Him as He is. Oh! what comfort this is for our faith, that from the fact of our vitality and the fact that God is at work with us, it is clear, and true and certain, that our latter end shall be increased. I do not think that any man yet has ever got an idea of what a man is to be. We are only the chalk crayon, rough drawings of men, yet when we come to be filled up in eternity, we shall be marvellous pictures, and our latter end indeed shall be greatly increased.

—Spurgeon.

(3417.) "The ages to come" will reveal a personal experience in us of which now we have but the very faintest trace in analogy. We cannot at present form a conception of perfection in the elements which constitute character. You never can tell what the ripe is from looking at the green. If an unknown seed be brought to you, and you plant it in the ground, and it sprout, and grow for five years, only throwing out leaves, and for five years more, still only throwing out leaves, can you tell how its blossoms are going to look? You never saw them. The tree is a new one. You have seen the root, the leaves, and the bark, and you have cut into the wood; you know its habits for the first ten years; you know when its leaves appear in the spring, and when they fall off in the autumn; you know everything about it as far as it has gone during those ten years; but you cannot guess whether its blossoms are white or yellow. You cannot tell whether they will hang in racemes, or rise up in circles. You cannot tell whether they will stand out in spikes, or be pendant. You cannot tell whether they will be early or late. You cannot, if the shrub or tree be unknown, find out the prophecy of the blossoms.

But at last the blossom comes out. Now tell me what that blossom is going to produce. Look at it. Is it going to put forth a pod, or is it going to be a fruit? Is it going to be a seed, or luscious food? You cannot tell from a blossom what the fruit is going to be, except by analogues; and I am now supposing a new plant of which there has been no congener within your knowledge, and that you are attempting, from a lower state, to conceive of the higher.

Now, in regard to human beings, there is nothing in the unripe state of the mind which is a fair interpretation of what ripeness in it is going to be. You could never have told, except by seeing it, what the human reason was competent to do. Consider the force of reason, by which the whole physical universe is being now unwarped: by which the most distant orbs are being searched, weighed, analysed; by which we are unwrapping the sun, and taking off coat after coat; by which we know more about the sun itself than oftentimes men do of the province in which they live on earth. What an education! What an outstretch of thought!

What development of the reasoning, searching power of the mind! Who could have suspected it in the days of barbarism? No man could then have told that. And who now can foretell what new development the human reason is capable of? As from the lower stages you could not suspect the higher, so from the present stages you cannot anticipate those which are yet to come. Now we think; but in the higher forms of thinking there is the intuition, the jump, as it were, the flash of thought, with which our present thinking is not to be compared. We call it intuition, we call it inspiration, we call it names; but names are not things. There is evidently the hint of a wondrous disclosure of power in the direction of reason "in the ages to come." We do not see it here. We cannot know it. We can only know what is the perpetual suggestion of it. Says the apostle St. John: "We are the sons of God; but it doth not yet appear what we shall be."
—Becher.

18. The unity of the human race.

(3418.) We have certain demonstration from Egyptian mummies, and Roman urns and rings, and measures and edifices, and many other antiquities, that human stature has not diminished for above two thousand years.

—Bentley, 1661-1742.

(3419.) There is a vast difference between one part of the human family and another, but I do not know that it is greater than the difference which exists in a single household. In the same family we find one child blazing with the genius of imagination, and foretokens and forelookings of this radiant faculty, and another child squarely practical, without a spark of imagination. In the same family we find one child as full of song as the spring day is with all the birds in the woods, and another as dumb as though only turtles lived. One child shall be clear in practical matters, and stupid in ethical; and another child shall be clear in ethical matters, and stupid in practical. One shall have extraordinary intelligence, and another shall be in the twilight of insanity or idiocy. And does anybody say that the family is not a unit because children of the same parents are different? There are no diversities between the races of the world on the great scale more extreme than those which are often found in the family on the small scale.

—Becher.

(3420.) The physical diversity of the race-stocks on the earth is not such as to impair the argument for substantial unity. There is the same plan existing throughout all nations. We hear a great deal about the ethnoid bones, and the length of the heel, and the curvature of the chin, and the style of the hair, and all these little incidental matters. But what would be thought if we should argue in the same way in respect to military organisations, and should take the jacket of the sailor as over against the coat of the soldier; and the snub-plume of the artillery as over against the feather of the other arm of the service? What would be thought if you should pick out little tit-bit things here and there and urge them against the substantial unity of the army to which all these belong? And, without going into any detail, how absurd it is to speak of the anatomical structure of man to show that the races are substantially different and divisible! There is precisely the same plan throughout the earth, of bone, of nerve, of artery, of structure, of generation, of gestation, of nutrition, of increment, and of decrement. These things are substantially the same in one race that they are in the others, whether it be African, or Asiatic, or Anglo-Saxon, or Norman, or Dane. The great functions of the human system are exactly the same, and the brain does its work in the same manner in some men as in others, whether they be on a low or a high plane. The liver, the heart, the stomach, the spleen, and every part of the body are the same in all. The organs of the race are the same. If it were true that the African had his heart in his liver, that would be a pretty tough argument; but does it make any difference to me if the hair is kinked? The African's bone is the same as yours is; and his marrow is the same as yours is. And though there is a slight variation between races, the surgeon, the nurse, the dietician, would treat all nations of the earth as though there were simply minor differences between them. There are no greater differences between nations than between individuals of the same nation; and they must be all treated alike.

—Becher.

19. The future of the human race.

(3421.) When we are obliged to say that probably not one man in a million has ever been of any particular moral avail, that of the mass of the inhabitants of the globe—those in the isles of the ocean; those in China; those on the populous plains of Asia; those on the whole continent of Africa; and a large portion of the fairest population of both North and South Americas—a million taken together do not constitute one fair man as respects moral endowments, that it has been the history of the race that they have simply been animals, and that they have been born, and lived, and ripened, and begotten their posterity, and decayed, and died, and gone through the precise circle which leaves go through, that come out in the spring, and ripen, and loosen, and drop off, and turn to soil for their successors to grow upon, developing no conscience, and producing no material impression on the course of the human mind—when we are obliged to see these things, it is difficult to believe in a divine moral government among men. It is said that a million Chinamen might die to-day, and not one idea would be lost. Ten million Asiatics might die, and not an invention nor a moral impulse would be lost. Of the race hitherto, ninety-nine parts in a hundred might have been wiped out without any loss to civilisation or to religion. And men say, with a great show of reason, too, "Is it to be supposed that this is the state of facts in a world where God is universal Father, and is conducting a government, and is the leader of the people, and is carrying on a glorious Church that is to fill the whole earth?" You are to remember that the mode of leadership is important as well as the fact that God leads. He does lead; but He does not lead as you would have led. He leads, not by overt and creative power at every step, but by evolution, by development, by growth; and that which the world is to reach, it is to reach through the process of self-unfolding, little by little. It requires cycles and periods of time that are incomputable. God makes the soil. How does He make the soil? Here is a volcanic island, with an area of a thousand acres, where not long ago there was ocean. It is all lava; and the rains, and the sun, and the winter begin to mellow the surface, and to disintegrate it. It is a thousand years before it is sufficiently mellowed by climatic influences to be able to support a seed, yet God cultivates it during that thousand years. There is no waste of time, because where one is infinite there is time enough for the longest operations. By and by some chance seeds find their way to this island, and spring up in the soil, and grow, and then die. And what do they do? They form the first particles of vegetable mould which the soil contains. And before they die they ripen seeds. These seeds become other plants. And what do they do? They ripen, shed their seeds, and add their corpses to those that have gone before them. And so generations of plants live and die. And what do they do? They make soil, until by and by, there come up stately trees out of it. And then decay, and enter into the soil, and a less rank and higher order of vegetation begins to take their place. When men see the last part of the process, they have faith to believe that God is producing this luxuriant and wonder-exciting and gladness-exciting vegetation; but He produces it by that long series of natural evolutions by which a rock is turned to soil, and all things that grow on that soil will serve to prepare it for something better. And the perfect type is the last step, the final step of the process of evolution of ages and ages.

Now, in the human family, it may be true that, as regards the results which they produce, a single generation seems a waste generation; but poor as men are, and little as they do, no generation of the world ever died without leaving some little soil behind in moral and intellectual affairs. And we stand on the aggregations of the moral experience of myriads and myriads of men that we call worthless.

The king builds his palace on a rock in the sea, and it stands, though the waves thunder against it, and the turbulent elements beat down upon it with their whole power. But what built that rock? Little coral plants. And there was not one of them that was not infinitesimally small. And the king says, "What are these little worms to me?" They are so much to you that it was by their working and dying, and working and dying, and working and dying, that the foundation was made on which you built your palace; and that if it had not been for them, you would not have had it. And the stone quarry from which you obtained material with which to lay up the walls was the product of the obscure labour of infinite weakness in ages gone by.

It will never do for us, therefore, so long as we have no larger span of vision than we have now, to undertake to say that men who are apparently useless, that men who do not in their individuality produce results, are of no consequence; for if not in their individuality, yet in their aggregates, they do produce results, on which later civilisation is to be established. And we are to consider the course of the whole race in all its cycles, and not the course of any section of it at any one period of time.

—Becher.

(3422.) In my schoolboy drawing lessons, when I came to the human face, my master gave me first the eyes to practise upon, and then the nose, and then the mouth, and then the ears, and then the brow and hair, and after long weeks the day came when I was to combine them. I knew where to set the eyes, one over against the other, where to draw down the nose, and to open the mouth, and to place the ears, and to shade the hair about the forehead; and so at last, I had a perfect face. Now, God is the great draught-master, and the world is His pupil. Here and there, through laws and institutions, He is developing the single features, and at length the day will come when they shall be combined to form a perfect manhood in Christ Jesus.

At the Military Academy, the soldiers are taken separately to the drill-room, and there the martinet puts them through all the steps, and passes, and gestures, which they are required to learn; and when they have been trained and disciplined, they come to the parade ground; and then, at the word of command, platoons march, and squadrons wheel, and the great army, as one man, moves to the voice of its leader. Now, God's formative influences in this world are His military academies, His drill-rooms, where for centuries, the soldiers of the cross have been trained; but the day is coming when He shall put to His lips the trumpet of announcement, and when, with uplifted standard and triumphal music, He shall lead forth His vast army to go round and round the world with victory!

—Becher.

(3423.) The human family is on its way to a state in which wealth, power, refinement, and universal purity and joy shall be characteristic.

As the husbandman of to-day, reflecting upon the last year, sees the stages of ploughing, and sowing, and hoeing, and growing, and reaping all unutilised in the harvest, and thinks of what the year has come to, rather than of the steps by which it came to it; so is it to be in the grand autumnal consummation of the world. There is to be a time when we shall see what the world and the race have come to, and shall almost forget those steps of culture by which they came to it. There is to be a grand harvest-home for man. And God, who from eternal spheres is able to take in that beginning and that ending between which roll as many ages as there are drops between Europe and America, sees the history of man as it is to be consummated in the millennial or final period.

—Becher.

MEANS OF GRACE.

1. Their necessity.

(3424.) Grace is like a spark in wet wood, that needs continual blowing. —Manton, 1620-1667.

(3425.) Would you have and keep up ardent desires? Do as they that would keep in the fire, cherish the sparks, and blow them up to a flame. There is no man lives under the means of grace, and under the discoveries of God and religion, but has his good moods and very lively motions. The waters are stirred many times, take hold of this advantage. Strengthen the things that remain and are ready to die, and blow up these sparks into a flame. God has left us enkindling means,—prayer, meditation, and the Word. Observe where the bellows blow hardest, and ply that course. The more supernatural things are, there needs more diligence to preserve them. A strange plant needs more care than a native of the soil. Worldly desires, like a nettle, breed of their own accord, but spiritual desires need a great deal of cultivating.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

2. Are only means !

(3426.) Prayer and Scripture Reading and Sacraments are means to true religion ; and as they are means of Divine appointment, they are sure, if faithfully and devoutly used, to conduce to the end. But for all that, they are not the end ; and to regard them as such is a mischievous confusion of thought, which may very possibly disturb our spiritual aim, and make us shoot very wide of the mark. It is true, no doubt, that the religious exercises we have specified are absolutely essential (in all cases where they may be had) to the spiritual life. But even this fact does not take them out of the category of means, and make them ends. A scaffolding is the means of building a house ; nay, more, it is an essential means ; for how could the upper stories ever be raised without a scaffolding ? But in material things of this kind, no one ever mistakes the means for the end. No one ever confounds the house with the scaffolding, or imagines that the object of the builder is achieved, if nothing should ever be exhibited to the eye but scaffolding, if there be no foundation dug, and no layers of bricks begin to rise above the earth. But in matters spiritual there are hundreds who are satisfied with themselves, if they exhibit day by day nothing but a religious apparatus, if they have literally nothing to show but prayers duly and attentively said, church duly attended, sacraments periodically and solemnly received.

—Goulburn.

3. For what purpose they are to be used.

(3427.) It is not enough to make use of ordinances, but we must see if we can find God there. There are many that hover about the palace, and yet do not speak with the prince : so possibly we may hover about ordinances, and not meet with God there. To go away with the husk and shell of an ordinance, and neglect the kernel, to please ourselves because we have been in the courts of God, though we have not met with the living God, that is very sad. A traveller and merchant differ thus : a traveller goes from place to place only that he may see ; but a merchant goes from port to port, that he may take in his lading, and grow rich by traffic. So a formal person goes from ordinance to ordinance, and is satisfied with the work ; a godly man looks to take in his lading, that he may go away from God with God ; that he may meet God here, and there, in this duty and in that, and go away from God with God. A man that makes a visit only by constraint, and not by friendship, it is all one to him whether the person be at home or no ; but another would be glad to find his friend there : so if we, from a principle of love come to God in the duties, our desire will be to find the living God.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(3428.) A scholar, knowing he is sent to the university to get learning, gives up himself to pursue this, and neglects other things ; 'tis not riches or pleasures he looks after, but learning. Thus the gracious soul bestirs him, and flies from one duty to another, as the bee from flower to flower, to store itself with more and more grace ; 'tis not credit and reputation to be thought a great saint, but to be indeed such, that he takes all this pains for. The Christian is compared to a merchantman, that trades for rich pearls ; he is to go to ordinances, as the merchant that sails from port to port, not to see places, but to take in his lading, some here, some there. A Christian should be as much ashamed to return empty from his traffic with ordinances, as the merchant to come home without his lading. But alas ! how little is this looked after by many that pass for great professors ! who are like some idle persons that come to the market, not to buy provision, and carry home what they want, but to gaze and look upon what is there to be sold, to no purpose ; O my brethren, take heed of this.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

4. In what spirit we are to avail ourselves of them.

—Erskine, 1685-1752.

(3430.) It is with man and God in the production of spiritual, as with the skies and the soil in the production of material, fruit. Gathering harvests each successive year from fields whose wealth of fruitfulness seems exhaustless, we say, How bountiful is the earth !—the world's, like the widow's, meal-barrel, is never empty. We speak of the fruits of the earth, and the flowers of earth, and the harvest of earth ; but these, her offspring, have another parent. Heaven claims their sweet juices, and fragrant odours, and glorious colours, as hers, and most her own. To the treasures of light, heat, rain, and dews, poured from exhaustless skies on the dull cold soil, earth's flowers owe their beauty, her gardens their fruits, her fields their golden harvest. Each, at any rate, has its own part to do ; nor would a husbandman labour to less purpose under a sunless sky on fields bound hard with frost and buried in perpetual snow, than preachers without the cheering, warming, enlivening influences of the Sun of Righteousness, the dews of grace, and the blessing of the Spirit. Man's is but a husbandman's office—to plant ; to water, nothing more. "Paul," as the apostle himself says, "planteth, Apollos watereth, but God giveth the increase ; so, then, neither is he that planteth anything, nor he that watereth, but God that giveth the increase." And thus, whether we preach, or are preached to, when most diligent in the use of means, let a sense of our inability turn our eyes and all our hopes on God. With Him is the blessing and the residue of the Spirit.

—Guthrie.

5. The folly of Pharasaism.

(3431.) We are apt to feel as if, by our prayers, we laid God under obligations to serve us ; as if our feeble, imperfect service were "profitable to him." Suppose some poor beggar should say of a rich nobleman, "He is under great obligations to me." And when asked why ? should answer, "I have been every day for a great many years, and told him a long story of my wants, and asked him to help me." You can see how absurd this appears ; and yet it is precisely similar to our conduct, except indeed, that ours is much more absurd, because the disparity between God and us is infinitely greater than can exist between any two mortals.

6. Are not in themselves saving.

(3432.) Mistake not, I pray you : these duties must be had and used, but still a man must not stay there. Prayer says, "There is no salvation in me ;" and the sacraments and fasting say, "There is no salvation in us : " all these are subservient helps, no absolute causes of salvation. A man will use his bucket, but he expects water from the well. These means are the buckets, but all our comfort, and all our life and grace, is only in Christ.

—Ambrose, 1664.

(3433.) Vows, promises, shunning occasions, removing temptations, strictness and severity in duties, fear of hell and judgments—these in themselves are but empty, weak means of prevailing against sin, like the mighty sails of a ship, without wind and tide. No question but shunning occasions, strictness and severity in duties, watchfulness, &c., do well in their place and order, like oars in a boat, which, though it be carried with the tide, if well managed, yet they may help it to go the faster. Howsoever, it is Christ crucified which is the power of all. It is Christ lifted up, as Moses lifted up the serpent, which strikes more soundness into the wounded beholder, than any other way ; wherein some have toiled all their time for power over corruptions, and, like Peter, have caught little or nothing (Luke v. 5) because Jesus Christ was not in the company.

—Ambrose, 1664.

(3434.) It is not enough to sit under the means ; woful experience teacheth us there are some no sun will tan ; they keep their own complexion under the most shining and burning light of the gospel.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3435.) You know in Noah's flood all that were not in the ark, though they climbed up the tallest trees, and the highest mountains and hills, yet were really drowned ; so let men climb up to this duty and that, yet, if they don't get into Christ, they will be really damned. It is not thy closet, but thy Christ, that must save thee. If a man be not interested in Christ, he may perish with "Our Father" in his mouth.

—Brooks, 1608-1680.

(3436.) Take heed of resting upon closet duties, take heed of trusting in closet duties. Noah's dove made use of her wings, but she did not trust in her wings, but in the ark ; so you must make use of closet duties, but you must not trust in your closet duties, but in Jesus, of whom the ark was but a type. There are many that go a round of duties, as mill-horses go their round in a mill, and rest upon them when they have done, using the means as mediators, and so fall short of Christ and heaven at once. Closet duties rested in will as eternally undo a man as the greatest and foulest enormities ; open wickedness slays her thousands, but a secret resting upon duties slays her ten thousands. Multitudes bleed inwardly of this disease, and die for ever. Open profaneness is the broad dirty way, that leads to hell, but closet duties rested in is a sure way, though cleaner way, to hell.

—Brooks, 1608-1680.

(3437.) The ordinances of religion are compared to wells of water ; but then, they are like Jacob's well. The water lies far below the surface ; and to the man of world, the mere professor of religion who has the name but not the faith of a Christian, we may say, as the woman said to our Lord, "Sir, thou hast nothing to draw with, and the well is deep." Faith is, as it were, the rope, and our souls the vessels which we let down into this well to fill them with living water.

—Guthrie.

7. Yet they are not to be neglected.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3439.) To live above them, while we use them, is the way of a Christian ; but to live above ordinances, as to live without them, is to live without the compass of the gospel lines, and so without the government of Christ. Let such beware, lest while they would be higher than Christians, they prove in the end lower than men. We are not yet come to the time and state where we shall have all from God's immediate hand. As God hath made all creatures, and instituted all ordinances for us, so will He continue our need of all. We must yet be contented with love-tokens from Him, till we come to receive our all in Him. We must be thankful if Joseph sustain our lives, by relieving us in our famine with His provisions, till we come to see His own face.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(3440.) The power is all of God ; the means are likewise of His appointment ; and He always is pleased to work by such means as may show that the power is His. What was Moses's rod in itself or the trumpets that threw down Jericho ? What influence could the pool of Siloam have, that the eyes of the blind man, by washing in it, should be opened ? or what could Ezekiel's feeble breath contribute to the making dry bones live ? all these means were exceedingly disproportioned to the effect ; but He who ordered them to be used, accompanied them with His power. Yet, if Moses had gone without his rod, if Joshua had slighted the ram's horns, if the prophet had thought it foolishness to speak to dry bones, or the blind man refused to wash his eyes, nothing could have been done.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(3441.) Means—the table of the Lord, the pulpit, the pages of the Bible, the family altar, the closet oratory, are of no value unless as putting us in communication with the Spirit of God; and used as the kite which the philosopher sends up to draw down the lightnings of the skies; or the bucket which the cottager sends down to draw up water from the well. Then, powerless as they are in themselves, they become the blessed and mighty instrument of spiritual good—the sails that catch the wind and impel the vessel on; the concave mirror that, placed before the Sun of Righteousness, gathers His beams into its burning focus to warm the coldest, and melt the hardest heart; eagle-wings to raise our souls to heaven; conduits, like the pipes that bring water to our city from these Pentland hills, to convey streams of grace, and peace, and purity from their fountain in heaven to our souls on earth.

—Guthrie.

(3442.) God loves to effect His greatest works by means tending under ordinary circumstances to produce the very opposite of what is to be done. God walls the sea with sand. God clears the air with storms. God warms the earth with snow. So in the world of grace. He brings water in the desert, not from the soft earth, but the flinty rock. He heals the sting of the serpent of fire by the serpent of brass. He overthrows the walls of Jericho by ram's horns. He slays a thousand men with the jaw-bone of an ass. He cures salt water with salt. He fells the giant with a sling and a stone. And thus does the Son of God work in the gospel. He cures the blind man by that which seemed likely to increase his blindness,—by anointing his eyes with clay. He exalts us to heaven by the stumbling-block of the cross.

—Bishop Wordsworth.

8. On the contrary, they are to be diligently used.

(1.) That we may thereby show our love to God.

(3443.) He that truly loveth his friend transporteth himself often to the place where he was wont to see his friend; he delighteth in reading his letters, and in handling the gages and monuments that he hath left behind him. How grateful is the sight of anything that presents unto him the memorial of his absent friend! And thus the child of God, to testify his love to Him, transporteth himself often to the place where he may find God in His sanctuary, amongst His saints. He delights in His letters (the Scriptures), in those holy pledges (the Sacraments), which He hath left behind Him, as tokens of His goodwill, until He come again.

—Thomas de Trugillo.

(2.) Because God has appointed them.

(3444.) If a king should give unto one of his subjects a princely palace upon condition that he shall go into it in the way which he shall prescribe, he would, no doubt, take what pains he could to know the way, and afterward endeavour to continue in it: so, likewise, the kingdom of heaven is the most glorious and royal palace that ever was, and God hath bestowed the same on His elect, and He requires nothing at their hands but that they would turn their faces from this world and walk unto it in the way which He hath chalked forth unto them in His Word; therefore, if they be desirous to have salvation and life everlasting, they must come forth of the broad way that leads to destruction, and enter into the strait way that leads to eternal life—they must acquaint themselves with the guides, which are the faithful ministers of the Word, who will cry unto them, "Here is the way; walk ye in it!" when they shall go to the right hand or to the left.

—Cawdray, 1609.

(3445.) There are no men more careful of the use of means than those that are surest of a good issue and conclusion, for the one stirs up diligence in the other. Assurance of the end stirs up diligence in the means. For the soul of a believing Christian knows that God has decreed both; both fall under the same decree: when God proposed to do such a thing, He proposed to do it by such and such means. True, therefore, is with diligence in the use of all means that God has ordained. He that trusts a physician's skill, will be very careful to observe what was prescribed, and will omit nothing. It is but presumption; it is not trust where there is not a care in the use of means, as we may pretend to trust in God and sever the means from the end; they are regardless of the means of salvation.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(3446.) What is Jordan that I should wash in it? What is the preaching that I should attend on it, where I hear nothing but what I knew before? What are these beggarly elements of water, bread, and wine? Are not these the reasonings of a soul that forgets who appoints the means of grace? What, though it be clay, let Christ use it, and it shall open the eyes, though in itself more likely to put them out.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3447.) Use the means appointed by God. Though we are torches which cannot light ourselves, yet we may bring ourselves to the word, which may both melt and kindle. Though the giving rain and the increasing the fruits of the earth be from God, yet no man ever held ploughing, and sowing, and pruning unnecessary. The work of grace is the work of the Spirit, which is a "wind which bloweth where it listeth." But may we not wait for those gales? May we not spread our sails and watch for the successful breathings? How do you know but whilst you are waiting upon God in an humble posture, God may unlock your hearts, and pour in the treasures of His grace? "While Peter yet spake these words, the Holy Ghost fell on them all which heard the word." If you will not harden your hearts to-day, God may soften your hearts to-day: "To day, if you will hear His voice." These are the times wherein God parleys with the soul, and inclines it to the happy surrender. Though the power is God's, as the water is the fountain, yet He has appointed the channels of His ordinances through which to convey it: "Ministers by whom you believed." The gospel begets instrumentally, God principally (1 Cor. iv. 15). God calls by the gospel (2 Thess. ii. 14). As God is the Governor of the world, yet it is by instruments and second causes, which He clasps together to bring about His own designs. He that does not use these means may fear that God will never work savingly upon him, for it is an utter refusing any acceptance of this grace, or anything tending to it. This is to be peremptory, never to do ourselves any good, or receive any from God. In despising the means, you despise the goodness of God.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3448.) There are some men that will refuse to labour for the elevation of the community—for the awakening and conversion of men—by means which long experience has shown do stand connected with that result, because they fear to take God's work out of His hands. It would be no more presumptuous than it is to work in the field which God has made, and sow seed, and raise crops there. God's sovereignty relates to the natural world as really as to the moral. Ploughing and sowing do not trench on God's prerogatives. Neither does spiritual activity. Cause and effect, means and ends, are connected in religious things just as much as in physical. Waiting when you should work is just as bad as would be audacious interference in things above our reach. Every man must do what he can; and men are much more in danger of doing too little than too much. Indolence is more frequent than irreverence. No ship-master infringes upon God's prerogatives when he takes care of his ship in a storm. No farmer feels that he is encroaching upon God's sovereignty when he cultivates the crops for which he prays. He asks for daily bread, and then earns it. No manufacturer or business man feels that he is trespassing upon God's prerogative when he looks after his own business. They believe, if they are good men, in God's blessing; but they always say, "If a man would receive God's blessings, he must prepare a soil for them to blossom on."

So it is in spiritual things. We are to work in reliance upon means, and then wait for God's blessing. And waiting for God to do for us what we can do for ourselves, although it may bear the name of religion, is really nothing but infidelity.

—Becher.

(3.) Because it is by them that we have communion with Christ.

(3449.) Use thy duties, as Noah's dove did her wings, to carry thee to the ark of the Lord Jesus Christ, where only there is rest. If she had never used her wings, she had fallen in the water; and if she had not returned to the ark, she had found no rest; so, if thou shalt use no duties, but cast them off, thou art sure to perish; and if they convey thee not to Christ, thou mayest "lie down in sorrow." Or as it is with a poor man that is to get over a great water for a treasure on the other side, though he cannot fetch the boat, he calls for it, and uses it to carry him over to the treasure. So Christ is in heaven, and thou on earth; He does not come to thee, and thou canst not get to Him; now call for a boat; though there is no grace, no good, no salvation in a pitiless duty, yet use it to carry thee over to the treasure, the Lord Jesus Christ. When thou comest to hear, say, "Have over, Lord, by this sermon." When thou comest to pray, say, "Have over, Lord, by this prayer." —Ambrose, 1664.

(3450.) A woman like the Samaritan in the gospel, comes with a pitcher to draw water at a well. Her object is to reach and procure water; and she does this by letting down the pitcher into the well, and drawing it up again. It is at once understood that the pitcher is not the same thing as the muscular action, by which it is let down and drawn up. Both must contribute to the result; for without either pitcher or muscular action no water could be obtained; but the pitcher is external to the person, the muscular action a movement of the person. It is also clearly seen that neither pitcher nor muscular action are water,—that the arm might put itself forth for ever, and the pitcher be let down continually, but if it were a dry pit into which the vessel was lowered, no refreshment could be had thereby.

The figure is of easy application. Christ is the Well of the Water of Life, from whom alone can be drawn those streams of grace, which refresh, and quicken, and fertilise the soul. It is by faith that the soul reaches out after this living water; faith is the soul's muscular action, by which the water is drawn up and brought into use. But faith needs as an implement those means which Christ has appointed, and particularly the mean of means, which He constituted for the conveyance of Himself to faithful souls. These means are the pitcher in which the water is conveyed. Faith is not a Christ; neither are sacraments a Christ; but faith (under all circumstances) and sacraments, where they may be had, are necessary to the appropriation and enjoyment of Christ.

—Goulburn.

(4.) Because we need them.

(3451.) Neglect not private or public ordinances. Your bodies may as probably live without diet, as your souls without duties. This is God's way, by which He infuseth grace where it is wanting, and increaseth grace where it is. As the head by the nerves and sinews, as organs, conveyeth animal spirits to the whole body, so doth the church's head, Christ Jesus, by ordinances convey His spirit and grace to His members. Doth not experience teach you that your hearts are like water; though heated a little while over the fire of the means of grace, yet are no sooner taken off, but they are returning to their former coldness. Mariners that swim against wind and tide, must row hard and continue at it; if they intermit but a little while, how far and how forcibly are they carried backwards! It is not unknown to you, if ye have any knowledge in spiritual affairs, how busily and unweariedly the devil, world, and flesh are drawing you to hell; it highly concerneth you to be always, by duties, fetching in supplies from above, if ever ye would arrive at heaven.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(3452.) The Christian's armour decays two ways: either by violent battery, when the Christian is overcome by temptation to sin; or else by neglecting to furbish and scour it with the use of those means which are as oil to keep it clean and bright.

—Gurnall, 1617-1671.

(3453.) Be conscientious in the performance of holy duties. A fire which for a while shoots up to heaven will faint both in its heat and brightness, without fresh supplies of nourishing matter. Bring fresh wood to the altar morning and evening, as the priests were bound for the nourishment of the holy fire (Lev. vi. 12). God in all His promises supposes the use of means. When He promised Hezekiah his life for fifteen years, it cannot be supposed that he should live without eating and exercise. It is both our sin and misery to neglect the means. Therefore let an holy and a humble spirit breathe in all our acts of worship. If we once become listless to duty, we shall quickly become lifeless in it. If we languish in our duties, we shall not long be lively in our graces. The loss of the stomach is a sign of the loss of health. If we would flourish, we must drink of those waters that spring up to everlasting life. If we desire our leaves should prosper, we should often plant ourselves by the rivers of waters; we must be where the sun shines, the dews drop, and the spirit blows.

—Charnock, 1628–1680.

(3454.) Pride makes men think that they are so whole and well, as to have little need of all this preaching, and praying, and reading, and holy conference, and meditation, and heavenly-mindedness. They feel not that need or sweetness which should help them to perceive, that frequency is good or necessary for them. If the physician bid two men "eat often," and one of them hath a strong appetite, and the other hath none; he that is hungry will interpret the word "often," to mean thrice a day, at least, and he that hath no appetite will think that once a day is "often." Healthful men do not use to ask, "How prove you that I am bound to eat twice or thrice a day?" Feeling the need and benefit, they will be satisfied with an allowance without a command. They will rather ask, "How prove you that I may not do it?" for they feel reason in themselves to move them to it, if God restrain them not. So it is with a humble soul about the means of his edification and salvation.

—Baxter, 1615–1691.

(3455.) I have no faith nor trust to put in any road to heaven other than that which our Saviour trod. Our Forerunner, He has left His footprints on the path of ordinances; and holding Him to be our Pattern as well as our Propitiation, I will venture on no path but that He travelled. Can anything be plainer than this, that if our blessed Lord did not neglect the means of grace, much less should we, can we afford to do so? How far wrong, therefore, are those, belonging to the Society of Friends, or to sects which have sprung up in our own day, who, though in many respects exemplary Christians, affect a spirituality to which our Lord lent no sanction! Rashly disparaging, and dispensing with the use of appointed ordinances, they say that a Christian man should be above such beggarly elements and rudimentary things; cultivating nothing but a purely spiritual worship.

These good people seem to forget that we are not yet in heaven; nor are yet fit for it. We need all possible help to get there; and with the tide running strong the other way, require to put every oar in the water, and crowd all sail upon the mast. Dragged downward by the many and powerful attractions of this world, we can no more afford to dispense with means than a bird to dispense with wings. The Christian, spurning the earth, is to rise like a lark, singing and soaring in the skies; but mark how, while that bird sings, she beats the air with rapid pinions, and makes ceaseless efforts to ascend. Instead of treating the means of grace with neglect, had we been more devout and diligent in the use of them; had we risen as early to our prayers as men to their work—the peasant to the plough, the weaver to the loom, the smith to his glowing forge; had we been as prompt to improve Sabbaths, sacraments, prayer meetings, and holy seasons, as the merchant rising markets, to make money; the traveller gleams of fine weather, to push homeward; the seamen times of fair wind to shake out all his canvass—how much more Christ-like had we been; how much better prepared for death; how much nearer heaven; how much more fit, and not only more fit for it, but fonder of it, and ready to say with Christ, I leave the world and go to my Father!

—Guthrie.

(5.) That we may be in the way of blessing.

(3456.) Christ compares the regenerating power of the Spirit unto the winds (John iii. 8). The mariner cannot sail without wind, nor can he procure a wind at his pleasure, for it blows when and where it lists, but he may thrust his vessel off a shore, and spreads his sails, to take advantage of a gale when it blows. Those that wait upon the Lord in the use of means and ordinances, they hereby spread their sails, are ready for the Spirit's motions, which bloweth where it listeth. There is more hope of these than of such who lie aground, neglecting the means of grace, which are both as sail and tackling. The two blind men of whom we read (Matt. xx. 30), they could not open their own eyes; that was beyond their power, but they could get into the way where Jesus passed, and they could cry to Him for sight, who only could recover it. Those that are diligent in the use of means and ordinances they sit in the way where Jesus passes by, who ~~uses~~ not to reject those that cry unto Him.

—Clarkson, 1621–1686.

(3457.) Be still in the king's highway, in the use of means; for, though the natural use of means and God's saving grace have no connection, yet there is far less a connection betwixt that grace, and the neglect of means. The poor beggar, that needs an alms from the king, goes to the king's highway, where he passes; and surely he is nearer his purpose, than if he should go to the top of a mountain, where the king never comes; so, be you still in the use of means, in the Lord's way.

—Ersine, 1685–1752.

(6.) Notwithstanding that to some they are not a blessing.

(3458.) That they do no good to some, forms no reason why we should neglect or despise ordinances. It is no fault in the bread, that, thrust between a dead man's teeth, it does not nourish him. The truth is, that we must have spiritual life to get the benefit of religious ordinances. Water will revive a withering, but not a withered plant; wine will revive a dying, but not a dead man; the breath of your mouth, or the breeze of heaven, will rekindle the smouldering coal, but not the cold, grey ashes of the hearth. And it is only spiritual life that can derive benefit from such ordinances as are intended to revive the faint and give strength to the weary.

—Guthrie.

(7.) Notwithstanding that they may not be immediately a blessing to ourselves.

(3459.) We must follow God from ordinance to ordinance. It argues a great deal of pride in carnal men if God does not meet them presently they throw off all. Now and then they will see what they shall have for calling upon God, but if God do not answer at the first knock they are gone.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

9. The danger of neglecting them.

(3460.) As presumptuous sins are the thieves that with a high hand rob the Christian of his comfort, so sloth and negligence are the rust that in time will fret into his comfort, and eat out the heart and strength of it. It is impossible that the Christian who is careless and secure in his walking, infrequent or negligent in his communion with God, should long be owner of much peace and comfort. What if thou dost not pour water of presumptuous sins into the lamp of thy joy to quench it, 'tis enough if thou dost not pour oil of duty to feed and maintain it. Thou art a murderer to thy comfort by starving it, as well as by stabbing it.

—Salter.

10. The guilt of despising them.

(3461.) Those that turn their backs on God's ordinances, and in rebellion to His commandments, live in sins against conscience—can they wonder that He hides His face from them, when they turn their backs on Him? Rebellious persons, that will not yield meekly to God's ordinances, and submit to His commandments, do they wonder that God takes good things from them? When we sin we turn our backs upon God, and our face to the devil and the world and pleasures. When men turn their faces to sin, to pleasures and vanity, and their backs on God, do they wonder that He suffers them to melt and pine away? Let us do as the flowers do, the marigold, &c. They turn themselves to the sun. Let our souls do so. Let us turn ourselves to God in meditation and prayers, striving and wrestling with Him. Look to Him, eye Him in His ordinances and promises; and have communion with Him all the ways we can. Let our souls open and shut with Him. When He hides His face, let us droop, as the flowers do till the sun come again. When the waters fall, the flowers droop and hold down their heads. When the sun rises the next morning, up they go again as if there had never been a shower. So when we have not daily comfort of Spirit in peace of conscience, let us never rest seeking God's face in His ordinances and by prayer, and that will cheer a drooping soul, as the sunbeams do the flagging flowers.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(3462.) If the wounded Jew in the parable should have cast away the twopence which the Samaritan left to provide for him, it had been an argument that he neither regarded him nor his kindness. And it was a sign that Esau loved not God, because he esteemed not his birthright. Thus the true love of God is far from us if we set not a high esteem upon His ordinances, those pledges of His favour which He hath left with us, to wit, the word and sacraments; the word, wherein we hear Him speak lovingly,—and the sacraments, wherein we see Him speak comfortably to us; the one to heal us of our wounds, the other, an earnest of the blessings which we had forfeited by sin.

—Spencer, 1658.

11. Are all to be esteemed and used.

(3463.) When at the taking of New Carthage in Spain, two soldiers contended about the mural crown due to him who first climbed up the wall, so that the whole army was thereupon in danger of division, Scipio, the general, said he knew that they both got up the wall together, and so gave the scaling crown to them both. Thus a good orthodox Christian doth not clash God's ordinances together about precedence; he makes not odious comparisons betwixt prayer, preaching, and catechising, prayer public and private, premeditate and extemporary, but compounds all controversies about God's ordinances by praising them all, practising them all, and thanking God for them all.

—Fuller, 1608-1661.

(3464.) The efficacy of co-ordinate means lies in their conjunction. The force of an army consists not in this troop, or that one regiment, but in all the parts in a body. And if any single troop or company shall presume to fight the enemy alone, what can they expect but to be routed by the enemy, and punished by their general also? Let not any say, they use this means and that; if any one be willingly neglected, the golden chain of obedience is broke: and Bonum non nisi ex integris.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

12. Why the power to delight in them is sometimes withheld.

(3465.) When all means are strengthless and dead, and yet the mercy comes, "Oh," says a soul, "now I see that God is God Almighty, God all-sufficient." "She that is a widow and desolate," saith the apostle, "trusteth in God." We seldom trust in God till a desolation comes upon the means, then we learn to trust in God. So long as one who is learning to swim can touch the bottom, can touch the earth with his foot, he does not commit himself to the stream; but when he can feel no bottom, then he commits himself to the mercy of the waves. Now, so long as a man can stand upon the second cause, and can feel the bottom with his feet, he does not commit himself to the stream of mercy; but when once the second cause is gone, and he cannot feel the bottom, then he commits himself to the stream of mercy.

—Salter.

MEDITATION.

L. WHAT IT IS.

(3466.) In order to meditation we must call to remembrance the things we have learned, and we must seek to store our minds with new and fresh truths. But neither of these is meditation itself. To remember a truth or a fact is not to ponder it. In the one case we simply possess the truth, in the other we use it. A passage remembered is so much food laid up in a storehouse; a passage meditated is so much food eaten and digested and incorporated with ourselves. Memory is the casket which holds the jewels; meditation is that which brings them forth, and arranges them upon the person, and sets out both to the best advantage.

—Alexander.

(3467.) Deliberate meditation is like the cultivation of an estate of which we know the value, and which yields to us a sure and certain profit.

—Salter.

II. IS PRACTISED BY ALL WHO LOVE GOD.

(3468.) The mariner's needle will always turn to the north star,—though it be closed and shut up in a coffer of wood or gold, yet it loses not its nature; so the true Christian is always looking to the "Star of Jacob,"—whether he be shut up in a prison, or shut himself up in his closet, he is ever longing after Jesus Christ. A true lover delights most to visit his friend alone, when he can enjoy privacy with him.

When a prince passes by in the streets, then all, even strangers, will flock about him and look upon him; but his wife and children think this not enough, but follow him home, and are not satisfied unless they can enjoy him there. A false Christian, and one that is a stranger to God, if he have but a superficial view of Him in His courts, is pleased; but the true believer, and one that is nigh unto Christ, must have retired converse with Him in his closet, or he is not contented.

The pulse of the body beats as well in solitariness, as in company, and so does the pulse of the gracious soul towards his God and Saviour.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(3469.) The exercising thyself to godliness in solitude, will be a probable proof of thy uprightness. Men are withheld in company from doing evil by the iron curb of fear or shame, and provoked to do good by the golden spurs of praise or profit; but in solitariness there are no such curbs in the way of lust to hinder our passage, nor such baits in the way of holiness to encourage our progress. The naked lineaments and natural thoughts of the soul are best discerned in secret. The darkest night may afford us light enough to see ourselves by; when outward objects and occasions do not interpose to hinder our light or discompose our souls. No man's temper can be discovered by his carriage in a crowd of affairs, no more than his countenance in a troubled water. When the mind is stated in a due repose, it bewrayeth her truest affections, which in the midst of business she either does not show, or not observe. If many servants and several masters be together, busy and active, we can hardly tell to what masters the particular servants belong; but when the masters be alone and walk singly, their servants attend on them and are known. Our affections are the servants of our souls, both rational and sensual; whilst both these masters are employed, as in company it sometimes falls out, and they wait, it is not easy to judge which they serve; in solitude one takes upon itself the government, and then it is visible what attendants it has.

—Swinnock, 1673.

III. ITS USEFULNESS.

1. It prepares us to receive and retain the word of God.

(3470.) I hear many say, "While we are here, and enjoying the privilege of hearing, we are awed, but when we are gone out, we become altered men again, and the flame of zeal is quenched." What then may be done, that this may not come to pass? Let us observe whence it arises. Whence then does so great a change in us arise? From the unbecoming employment of our time, and from the company of evil men. For we ought not as soon as we retire from the communion, to plunge into business un-sulted to the communion, but as soon as ever we get home, to take our Bible into our hands, and call our wife and children to join us in putting together what we have heard, and then, not before, engage in the business of life.

For if after the bath you would not choose to hurry into the market-place, lest by the business in the market you should destroy the refreshment thence derived; much more ought we to act on this principle after the communion. But as it is, we do the contrary, and in this very way throw away all. For while the profitable effect of what has been said to us is not yet well fixed, the great force of the things that press upon us from without, sweeps all entirely away.

That this then may not be the case, when you retire from the communion, you must account nothing more necessary, than that you should put together the things that have been said to you. Yes, for it were the utmost folly for us, while we give up five and even six days to the business of this life, not to bestow on things spiritual so much as one day, or rather not so much as a small part of one day. See ye not our own children, that whatever lessons are given them, those they study throughout the whole day? This then let us do likewise, since otherwise we shall derive no profit from coming here, drawing water daily into a vessel with holes, and not bestowing on the retaining of what we have heard, even so much earnestness, as we plainly show with respect to gold and silver. For any one who has received a few pence, both puts them into a bag, and sets a seal thereon; but we, having given us oracles more precious than either gold or costly stones, and receiving the treasures of the Spirit, do not put them away in the storehouses of our soul, but thoughtlessly and at random suffer them to escape from our minds. Who then will pity us after all this, plotting against our own interests, and casting ourselves into so deep a poverty? Therefore, that this may not be so, let us write it down for unalterable law for ourselves, for our wives, and for our children, to give up this one day of the week entire to hearing, and to the recollection of the things we have heard. For thus with greater aptness for learning shall we approach what is next to be said; and to us the labour will be less, and to you the profit greater, when, bearing in memory what has been lately spoken, ye hearken accordingly to what comes afterwards. For no little does this also contribute towards the understanding of what is said, when ye know accurately the connection of the thoughts, which we are busy in weaving for you. For since it is not possible to set down all in one day, you must by continued remembrance make the things laid before you on many days into a kind of chain, and so wrap it about your soul: that the body of the Scriptures may appear entire. —Chrysostom, 347-407.

(3471.) Meditation imprints and fastens a truth upon the mind and memory. Deliberate thoughts stick with us; as a lesson we have conned is not easily forgotten. Civet long kept in a box, the scent remains when the civet is taken out. Sermons meditated on are remembered by us long after they are delivered. —Manton, 1620-1647.

(3472.) Thou must be a meditative hearer. Meditation is to the sermon what the harrow is to the seed ; it covers those truths, which else might have been picked away. —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3473.) Notwithstanding we may have received important ideas into our minds, yet without subsequent meditation, they will soon be overgrown like flowers and delicate plants in a garden which is neglected. —Hyatt, 1811.

2. It makes Divine truth effectual to our salvation.

(3474.) Any benefit to be derived from hearing the word exceedingly depends on meditation. Before we hear the word, meditation is like a plough, which opens the ground to receive the seed, and after we have heard the word, it is like the harrow which covers the new-sown seed in the earth, that the fowls of the air may not pick it up : meditation is that which makes the word full of life and energy to our souls. What is the reason that most men come to hear the word as the beasts did in Noah's ark ? They came in unclean, and they went out unclean. The reason is, because they do not meditate on the truths they hear ; it is but just like putting money into a bag with holes, presently it falls out. The truths they hear preached are put into shallow neglected memories, and they do not draw them forth by meditation, therefore hearing the word is so little effectual : it is said, "Mary pondered these things in her heart." Hearing the word merely is like indigestion, and when we meditate upon the word, that's digestion ; and this digestion of the word by meditation produces warm affections, zealous resolutions, and holy actions ; and therefore if you desire to profit by hearing the word, meditate. —Sailler.

(3475.) Meditation is the life of all the means of grace and that which makes them fruitful to our souls. What is the reason there is so much preaching and so little practice ? For want of meditation. Constant thoughts are operative. If a hen straggles out from her nest, she brings forth nothing ; her eggs chill. So when we do not set a-brood upon holy thoughts, if we content ourselves with some few transient thoughts and glances about divine things, and do not dwell upon them, the truth is suddenly put off, and does no good.

Constant thoughts are operative, and musing makes the fire burn. Green wood is not kindled by a flash or spark, but by constant blowing.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(3476.) Consideration opens the ear that was stopped, and the heart that was shut up ; it sets the powers of the soul at work, and awakeneth it from the sleep of incogitancy and security. The thoughts are the first actings of the soul, that set at work the rest. Thinking on the matters that must make us wise, and do the work of God on the heart, is that which lieth on us to do in order to our conversion. By consideration a sinner makes use of the truth, which before lay by, and therefore could do nothing. By consideration he taketh in the medicine to his soul, which before stood by, and could not work. By consideration a man makes use of his reason, which before was laid asleep, and therefore could not do its work. When the master is from home, the scholars will be at play. When the coachman is asleep, the horses may miss the way, and possibly break his neck and their own. If the ploughman go his way, the oxen will stand still, or make but bad and out of handsome work. So when reason is laid asleep, and out of the way, what may not appetite do ? And what may not the passions do ? And what may not temptations do with the soul ? A wise man, when he is asleep, hath as little use of his wisdom as a fool. A learned man when he is asleep, can hardly dispute with an unlearned man that is awake. A strong man that is never so skillful at his weapons, is scarce able in his sleep to deal with the weakest child that is awake. Why all the powers of your soul are, are as it were asleep, till consideration awake them, and set them on work. —Baxter, 1615-1691.

(3477.) The keenest sword, the greatest cannon, will do no execution against an enemy while they lie by and are not used. There is a mighty power in the word of God and the example of Christ to pull down strongholds, and conquer the strongest lusts and corruptions. But they will not do this while they are forgotten and neglected. Will heaven entice the man that thinks not of it ? Will hell deter the man that thinks not of it ? Why is it that all the reasoning in the world will do no more good on a man that is deaf, than if you said nothing ? but because the passage to his thoughts and understanding is stopped up. And if you have eyes and see not, and ears and hear not, and willfully cast it out of your thoughts, what good can anything do to you that is spoken ? It is not holding food in your mouth that will nourish you, if you will not let it down ; not taking it into your stomach, if you will not keep it, but presently cast it up again ; but it must be kept till it be digested and distributed. So it is not the most excellent truths in the world that will change your hearts, if you let them not down to your hearts, and keep them not there by meditation till they are digested and turned into spiritual life. The plaster must be laid upon the sore if you would be cured. The wound and sickness is at your heart, and if you will not take in the word to your heart, where the sickness is, I know not how you should expect a cure. The soul will not be charmed into holiness by the bare hearing or saying over a few good words ; as wizards use to cure diseases, or seem to cure them. It must be truth at the heart that must change the heart. And if you will not think on it, and think on it again, how can you expect it should come at your hearts ? —Baxter, 1615-1691.

(3478.) It is consideration of the saving doctrine of the gospel that openeth the heart, and giveth it entertainment. Set yourselves therefore on purpose to this work, and open the doors of your heart which are now shut, and let the King of Glory come in. Who will believe that you love the light, when you shut the windows and draw the curtains ? If you will set yourselves to consider of the truth, the windows of your soul will be set open, and then the light will certainly come in. Now, you read over whole chapters, and hear sermon after sermon, and either they never stir you, or at least it is but a little for a fit, like a man that hath a little warmed him at the fire in the winter, and when he goes from it, is colder than before ; but if you would but set yourselves to consider of what you hear and read, one line of a chapter, or one sentence of a sermon would lay you in tears, or make you groan, or at least do more than now is done. Satan hath garrisoned the heart of every carnal man, and consideration is the principal means to cast him out. If, by considering the terrible threatenings of the Word, you would discharge these cannons of God against them, what a battery would it make in the corruptions of your souls! Our God is a consuming fire, and the fire of hell is threatened in His law as the wages of sin; by serious consideration you may, as it were, fetch fire from God and from His Word, and set fire to the very gates of Satan's garrison, and fire him out of many of his holds.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(3479.) Meditation on divine things makes them really profitable to us. In the mere apprehension of truth, whether through reading or hearing, there is little or no profit. The profit begins when that which is apprehended is so pondered as to become part and parcel of the man's inner nature; just as food becomes of advantage to us when it is not only taken into the body but assimilated to it, and mixed with its substance. A man may run through a picture-gallery so as to see every painting it contains, and to derive from the sight a certain amount of pleasure; but he alone profits by such an exhibition who pauses and studies each worthy work of art, and gathers ideas from it which enrich his mind, or learns lessons from it which refine his taste, or which may guide his own efforts after excellence in art. "It is the settling of milk," says an old writer, "that makes it turn to cream, and it is the settling of truth in the mind that makes it turn to spiritual nutriment."

—W. L. Alexander.

3. It renders good impressions lasting.

(3480.) Gotthold had for some purpose taken from a cupboard a vial of rose-water, and, after using it, inconsiderately left it unstopped. Observing it some time after, he found that all the strength and sweetness of the perfume had evaporated. Here, thought he with himself, is a striking emblem of a heart fond of the world and open to the impression of outward objects. What good does it do to take such a heart to the house of God, and there fill it with the precious essence of the roses of Paradise which are the truths of Scripture? What good to kindle in it a glow of devotion, if we afterwards neglect to close the outlet—by which I mean, to keep the word in an honest and good heart (Luke viii. 15). How vain to hear much, but to retain little, and practise less! How vain to experience within us sacred and holy emotions, unless we are afterwards careful to close the heart by diligent reflection and prayer, and so keep it unspotted from the world. Neglect this, and the strength and spirit of devotion evaporates, and leaves only a lifeless froth behind. Lord Jesus, enable me to keep Thy word like a lively cordial in my heart. Quicken it there by Thy Spirit and grace. Seal it up in my soul, that it may retain for ever its freshness and its power!

—Scriven, 1629-1693.

4. It gives fulness and clearness to our views of truth.

(3481.) Meditation takes the veil off from the face of truth. The glory and beauty of truth doth not consist in an expression, but we ought to penetrate into the nature of it by reflection. We have an expression of Solomon, speaking of knowledge and understanding, he bids us to search for her as for hidden treasure; observe the expression,—you know jewels do not lie upon the surface of the ground, but they are hid in the receptacles of the earth, you must dig for them before you can enjoy them. Truth is in profundo, and our understandings are dark. Now you must search for the truth of God as for hid treasure. He that rides post through a country is never able to make a full description of it; and he that takes but a transitory view of the truths of the gospel will never come to the full knowledge of them. 'Tis meditation makes them appear to our eye in their beauty and lustre.

(3482.) The man who is a stranger to meditation must of necessity possess very confused notions of truth. Whatever be the number of ideas which he has received, they lie in his mind like lumber in a dark room, without any order or arrangement.

—Hyatt, 1811.

5. It makes God's Word delightful to us.

(3483.) Meditation shows the beauty of truths. When we look upon them, we do not see half that is in them; but upon a more deliberate view, it more appears. There is a secret grace in some that is not discerned but by much converse and narrow inspection.

—Manton, 1620-1669.

(3484.) The Word for sweetness, says David, is "like honey and the honeycomb." It is so full, that at first reading some sweetness will now and then drop from it, but he that doth not press it by meditation leaves the most behind.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

6. It delivers us from vain thoughts.

(3485.) Meditation will keep your hearts and souls from sinful thoughts. When the vessel is full you can put in no more. If the vessel be full of puddle water, you cannot put in wine: if the vessel be full of wine, you cannot put in puddle water. If the heart be full of sinful thoughts, there is no room for holy and heavenly thoughts: if the heart be full of holy and heavenly thoughts by meditation, there is no room for evil and sinful thoughts. And what is the reason that men's hearts are so full of sinful and evil thoughts, but because their hearts are no more full of God; they think no more, they meditate no more of God.

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(3486.) Meditation will be a means to cure the most vicious part of our lives; for what is the wickedest part of a man's life? it is his vain thoughts. As in nature there is no vacuity or emptiness, but a vessel is either filled with liquor or the air; now the more water you pour in, the more air goes out. So, if you would but store your souls with these occasional meditations, it would thrust out vain and wild thoughts.

—Salter.

(3487.) Let us beseech you then to make them (religion and eternity) familiar with your minds, and mingle them with the ordinary stream of your thoughts: retiring often from the world and conversing with God and your own souls. In these solemn moments, nature and the shifting scenes of it will retire from your view, and you will feel yourselves left alone with God; you will walk as in His sight; you will stand, as it were, at His tribunal. Illusions will then vanish apace, and everything will appear in its true proportion and proper colour. You will estimate human life, and the work of it, not by fleeting and momentary sensations, but by the light of reflection and steady faith. You will see little in the past to please, or in the future to flatter : its feverish dreams will subside and its enchantment be dissolved.

—Robert Hall, 1764-1831.

7. It quickens the affections.

(3488.) Meditation sets the heart a work. The greatest matters will not work on him that does not think of them. Tell them of sin, and God, and Christ, and heaven, and hell, and they stir them not, because they do not take these truths into their deep thoughts ; or if they be stirred a little while, it is but a fit, while the truth is held in view of conscience. We had need inculcate things if we would have them affect us. The steel must beat again and again on the flint if we would have the sparks fly out : so must the understanding bear hard on the will to get out any affection and respect to the way of God.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(3489.) As meditation is a great help to memory, so it is a heart-warming work. If a thing be cold, you chafe it ; if a man's body be cold, you chafe it and rub it ; and by chafing and rubbing of a cold part, you put life and warmth into it ; meditation chafes the soul, and rubs the soul with a truth. And what is the reason that our hearts are no warmer by what we read, or hear, or observe, but because we mediate no more on it ?

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(3490.) As a hen, by sitting on her eggs some weeks, warms them and hatches young ones ; so may I, by applying savoury subjects home to my soul, and brooding some considerable time on them, bring forth new affections and new actions. Though my affections seem as dead as the Shunammite's son, by stretching my thoughts thus on them, I shall warm and enliven them.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(3491.) As meditation opens the understanding, and presents truth to the mind, so it raiseth the affections. Knowledge without meditation to warm the affections is like the glancing of a beam upon a wave—it fills it with a little clarity, but it doth not heal it ; so, when there are many motions of truth in the brain, if meditation doth not apply them to the heart, and fix them upon the soul, the affections have no warmth by them. Slight visions make shallow impressions. He that with a careless eye looks upon a piece of embroidery, does not see the curiousness of the work, and therefore doth not admire it. So when we with a running eye look upon the truths of the gospel, no wonder our affections are not raised towards them. David, speaking concerning his meditation, says, "While I was musing, the fire burned, my heart was hot within me." 'Tis musing makes this fire to burn.

—Salter.

8. Promotes spiritual health.

(3492.) As the body will be more in health, when enjoying the benefits of a pure air, even so will the soul be more endued with practical wisdom, when nourished in such exercises as these.

—Chrysostom, 347-407.

9. Strengthens the spiritual vision.

(3493.) Seest thou not even the eyes of the body, that when they abide in smoke, they are always weeping ; but when they are in clear air, and in a meadow, and in fountains and gardens, they become more quicksighted and more healthy ? Like this is the soul's eye also, for should it feed in the meadow of spiritual oracles, it will be clear and piercing, and quick of sight, but should it depart into the smoke of the things of this life, it will weep without end, and wail both now and hereafter. For indeed the things of this life are like smoke. On this account also one has said, "My days have faded like smoke." He indeed was referring to their shortness of duration, and to their unsubstantial nature, but I would say that we should take what is said, not in this sense alone, but also as to their turbid character. For nothing doth so hurt and dim the eye of the soul as the crowd of worldly anxieties and the swarm of desires. For these are the wood that feed this smoke.

—Chrysostom, 347-407.

10. Enriches the understanding.

(3494.) Without meditation we do but talk one after another like parrots, and take up things by mere hearsay, and repeat them by rote, without affection and life, or discerning the worth and excellency of what we speak. It is meditation that makes truths always ready and present with us.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

11. Nourishes the soul.

—Hyatt, 1811.

(3496.) Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh ; and our best abundance of the heart must be slowly and in quietness prepared. The cattle when they rest, are yet working to prepare from the grass that sweetest and most wholesome of beverages—milk. So must we prepare the abundance of the heart. If the milk of our word is to flow from us nourishingly, we must turn the common things of daily life—the grass—by slow and quiet processes, into sweet wisdom. In retired, meditative hours, the digesting and secreting powers of the spirit act ; and thus ourselves are nourished, and we store nourishment for others.

—Lynch, 1828-1871.

12. Gives depth to the character.

(3497.) Meditation gives depth, seriousness, and earnestness to our religious profession and character. A profession of Christianity is easily made, and the name of Christian is easily assumed. But religion, whatever else it is, is a mode of thought, and hence it is only as deep and earnest thoughtfulness is bestowed upon it, that it can be developed in its higher and nobler forms. For want of this, Christianity often appears in its professors as it is not desirable that it should appear. Some there are who never go beyond the elements and alphabet of spiritual truth ; theirs is a superficial Christianity, a gold-leaf religiousness, genuine so far as it goes, but marvellously attenuated, and not good for much nor able to endure much.

—Alexander.

13. Promotes spiritual fruitfulness.

(3498.) This duty is very advantageous. You know a garden that is watered by sudden showers is more uncertain in its fruit than when 'tis refreshed by a constant stream; so when our thoughts are sometimes upon good things, and then run off; when they do but take a glance, as it were, upon holy objects, and then run away, there is not such fruit brought into the soul as when our minds by meditation do dwell upon them. The rays of the sun may warm us, but they do not inflame unless they are contracted in a burning-glass; so some slight thoughts of heavenly things may warm us a little, but will never inflame the soul till they be fixed by close meditation. Therefore David (who was an excellent man at this duty) tells us, his "heart was fixed," and saith the same concerning the frame of a good man. —Salter.

14. It brings comfort to the soul.

(3499.) God conveys comfort to us in a rational way; and although He is able to rain manna in the wilderness, and to cast in comfort to our souls, without any labour of ours, yet usually He dispenseth comforts according to the standing rule. He that doth not work, shall not eat—he that doth not labour in the duties of religion, shall not taste the sweetness of religion. Now meditation is the serious and active performance of the soul to which God hath promised comfort. The grapes, while they hang upon the vine, do not produce that wine which cheers the heart of man; but when they are squeezed in the wine-press, then they yield forth their liquor, which is of such a cheering nature. So the promises which are in the Word barely, do not send forth that sovereign juice which cheers our hearts; but when we ponder them in our souls, and press them by meditation, then the promises convey the water of life to us. "When I remember Thee upon my bed, and meditate on Thee in the night-watches, my soul shall be satisfied as with marrow and fatness:" observe the connection. Meditation turns the promises into marrow, it conveys the strength of them to our souls. One morsel of meat masticated and digested dispenses more nourishment than a greater quantity that is swallowed down whole; so one promise that is ruminated upon, and digested by meditation, conveys more comfort than a bundle of promises in the head that are not meditated upon, which we do not consider. The comfort which meditation brings is the most spiritual refined joy that we are capable of. It is spiritual meditation which rejoices the angelical part of our souls within us. Meditation is that which makes a man to be a citizen of the New Jerusalem: he can take a walk in the paradise of God every day, and pluck fruits off the tree of life, and draw water from the wells of salvation. He that performs conscientiously the duty of meditation doth maintain such a correspondence with God as angels do; such a one doth enter into heaven by degrees and steps. —Salter.

(3500.) The end of study is information, and the end of meditation is practice, or a work upon the affections. Study is like a winter sun, that shines, but warms not; but meditation is like a blowing up the fire, where we do not mind the blaze, but the heat. The end of study is to hoard up truth; but of meditation to lay it forth in conference or holy conversation. In study we are like vintners, that take in wine to store it for sale; in meditation like those that buy wine for their own use and comfort. A vintner's cellar may be better stored than a nobleman's; the student may have more of notion and knowledge, but the practical Christian has more of taste and refreshment.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(3501.) The promises of God are flowers, growing in the paradise of Scripture; meditation, like the bee, sucks out the sweetness of them. The promises are of no use or comfort to us till they are meditated upon. For as the roses hanging in the garden may give a fragrant perfume, yet their sweet water is distilled only by the fire; so the promises are sweet in reading over, but the water of these roses—the spirit and quintessence of the promises—is distilled into the soul only by meditation. The incense, when it is pounded and beaten, smells sweetest. Meditating on a promise, like the beating of the incense, makes it most odiferous and pleasant. The promises may be compared to a golden mine, which then only enricheth when the gold is dug out. By holy meditation we dig out that spiritual gold which lies hid in the mine of the promise, and so we come to be enriched.

—Watson, 1696.

15. It keeps hope active.

(3502.) The special object of hope is eternal glory. The peculiar use of it is to support, comfort, and refresh the soul, in all trials, under all weariness and despondencies, with a firm expectation of a speedy entrance into that glory, with an earnest desire after it. Wherefore, unless we acquaint ourselves, by continual meditation, with the reality and nature of this glory, it is impossible it should be the object of a vigorous active hope, such as whereby the apostle says, "we are saved." Without this we can neither have that evidence of eternal things, nor that valuation of them, nor that preparedness in our minds for them, as should keep us in the exercise of gracious hope about them.

Suppose sundry persons engaged in a voyage to a most remote country, wherein all of them have an apprehension there is a place of rest and an inheritance provided for them. Under this apprehension they all put themselves upon their voyage, to possess what is so prepared. Howbeit some of them have only a general notion of these things; they know nothing distinctly concerning them, and are so busied about other affairs that they have no leisure to inquire into them, or do suppose that they cannot come unto any satisfactory knowledge of them in particular, and so are content to go on with general hopes and expectations. Others there are who, by all possible means, acquaint themselves particularly with the nature of the climate whither they are going, with the excellency of the inheritance and provision that is made for them. Their voyage proves long and wearisome, their difficulties many and their dangers great, and they having nothing to relieve and encourage themselves with but the hope and expectation of the country whither they are going. Those of the first sort will be very apt to despond and faint, their general hopes will not be able to relieve them; but those who have a distinct notion and apprehension of the state of things whither they are going, and of their incomparable excellency, have always in a readiness wherewith to cheer their minds and support themselves.

In that journey or pilgrimage wherein we are engaged towards a heavenly country, we are sure to meet with all kinds of dangers, difficulties, and perils. It is not a general notion of blessedness that will excite and work in us a spiritual, refreshing hope. But when we think and meditate on future glory as we ought, that grace which is neglected for the most part as to its benefit, and dead as to its exercise, will of all others be most vigorous and active, putting itself forth on all occasions. This, therefore, is an inestimable benefit of the duty exhorted unto, and which they find the advantage of who are really spiritually-minded.

—Owen, 1616-1683.

16. It brings God near.

(3503.) Meditation is the soul's perspective glass: whereby, in her long remove, she discerns God as if He were nearer hand.

—Felltham, 1668.

17. Its advantages must be experienced to be known.

(3504.) The advantage of meditation is rather to be felt than read. He that can paint spikenard, or musk, or roses, in their proper colour, cannot with all his art draw their pleasant savour; that is beyond the skill of his pencil.

—Swinnock, 1673.

IV. IS A DUTY FOR EVERY DAY.

(3505.) As it is every man's work, so it is every day's work. The Sabbath day is our market day; we do not go to the market to buy meat into the house only for the market day, but for all the time until the market day comes about again. Indeed, Solomon saith of the sluggard, that he is so sluggish and slothful that "he doth not roast what he hath taken in hunting." The Sabbath day is the hunting day for souls wherein the venison is taken: on the week day we are to roast it, and to live upon it, by meditation and otherwise. And what is the reason that many do not live upon their venison that they have taken on the Lord's day, but because they do not roast it by meditation on the week day, and so are in the number of Solomon's sluggards. David saith that his meditation was at work all the day long: "It is my meditation all the day;" not a piece of it; it is every day's work, it is all the day's work. Yea, in Psalm i. he takes in the night too: "He delighteth in the law of the Lord, and therein doth he meditate day and night."

—Bridg, 1600-1670.

(3506.) Accustom yourself to a serious meditation every morning. Fresh airing our souls in heaven will engender in us a purer spirit and nobler thoughts. A morning seasoning will secure us for all the day. Though other necessary thoughts about our calling will and must come in, yet when we have despatched them, let us attend to our morning theme as our chief companion. As a man that is going with another about some considerable business, suppose to Westminster, though he meets with several friends on the way, and salutes some, and with others with whom he has some affairs he spends some little time, yet he quickly returns to his companion, and both together go to their intended stage. Do thus in the present case. Our minds are active, and will be doing something, though to little purpose; and if they be not fixed upon some noble object, they will like madmen and fools be mightily pleased in playing with straws.

The thoughts of God were the first visitors David had in the morning (Pa. cxxxix. 17, 18). God and his heart met together as soon as he was awake, and kept company all the day after.

—Charnock, 1620-1680.

V. HOW IT IS TO BE CONDUCTED.

1. We must be alone with God.

(3507.) To converse with self we must be alone, our sole companion our own thoughts, our sole witness God and nature. When Isaac would meditate he walked at eventide into the fields where, in the free air and the calm face of nature and the music of creation, he could find what tends to elevate the mind to God. When the Psalmist exhorts men to commune with their own hearts, his counsel to them is to do it by night upon their bed, when all is still around them, and when no flaring lights and no distracting shows will be present to interrupt the current of their thoughts. The din and the daylight of society are hostile to quiet, concentrated, self-searching thought. The man that would truly meditate must bear to be alone. The world will ever be ready to obtrude itself upon us if we do not shut it out, and worldly thoughts are like motes in the eye, which vex the soul and will not let it look calmly upwards. The wing that would soar into the serene air of the upper world must shake from it all clogs and fetters, and break away from whatever would tie it down to earth.

—Alexander.

2. We must leave behind all vain and worldly thoughts.

(3508.) I wish that whenever I sequester myself from worldly business I might leave all my sinful and worldly thoughts behind me. There can no work of concernment be done in secret unless these disturbers be absent. Should I entertain such guests, I forbid Christ my company.

Vicious thoughts are His sworn enemies, and He will not dwell in the same house, in the same heart with them; if I desire Him to sit upon the throne of my heart, I must give Him leave to cast down every imagination, and to bring every thought to the obedience of Himself. Places that are full of vermin are not fit for a prince's presence.

Vain and unnecessary thoughts about lawful objects are strangers, though not sworn enemies, and will give my best Friend distaste. Though a noble person should come to pay me a visit, if he should hear me debasing myself to converse needlessly with inconsiderable impertinent fellows, I may look that he should pass by without calling in. Christ loves not to be entertained in a room full of dust-heaps and cobwebs. If vain thoughts lodge within, the blessed Jesus will stand without. Gold and clay will not mingle. If these mists arise and these clouds interpose, they will hinder my sight of the true sun.

—Swinnock, 1673.

3. We must select single truths for special consideration.

(3509.) As sweet spices yield small savour until they are beaten to powder, so the wonderful works of God are either not at all or very slightly smelled in the nostrils of man, who is of a dull sense, unless they be rubbed and chafed in the mind, through a fervent affection, and singled out with a particular view; like them which tell money, who look not confusedly at the whole heap, but at the value of every parcel. So then a true Christian must endeavour himself to deliver, not in gross, but by retail, the millions of God's mercy to his soul; in secret thought chewing the cud of every circumstance with continual contemplation.

—E. Culverwell.

(3510.) There is abundant matter for our meditation; as the nature and attributes of God, the states and offices of Christ, the threefold state of man, the four last things, the vanity of the creature, the sinfulness of sin, the love and fulness of the blessed Saviour, the Divine Word and works; out of these we may choose sometimes one thing, sometimes another, to be the particular object of our thoughts. To undertake more than one at a time will deprive us of the benefit of all. Too much food will rather destroy than increase the natural heat: a little wood may help that fire to burn, which a great quantity would smother. Whilst the dog runs after two hares, now after one, and presently after the other, he loses both. Many subjects, as a press or crowd of people, do but hinder one another. Those streams are strongest which are most united. Greediness of appetite, and receiving too much food, weakens digestion.

When thou hast fixed upon a subject, meditate (if it may be) on its causes, properties, effects, titles, comparisons, testimonies, contraries—all will help to illustrate the subject, and to quicken and advantage thee; they do all as so many several windows let in those beams which enlighten the mind and warm the affections: but they must be considered in their places and methodically. The parts of a watch jumbled together serve for no use, but each in their order make a rare and useful piece.

4. We must select practical topics for consideration.

(3511.) There are some points in religion which are chiefly speculative; there are others which are more practical. Now as the tops of mountains are barren, but the humble valleys fruitful, so speculative points are barren, and the meditation of them is ineffective. There are some slight dishes which gratify the palate, but have no substance in them to feed and strengthen the body; so there are some truths which though they are delicious, yet they do not produce holiness; and although they may please the taste, yet they yield no solid nourishment to the soul. We lose much of the benefit of meditation, when we pitch our thoughts upon those objects which are not most fruitful. Hence, meaner Christians often thrive more in holiness than those of richer gifts; they meditate upon those objects most fruitfully in reference to their lives, and so they make a sensible progress in the ways of religion, whereas others are barren.

—Saller.

5. We must not be in too great haste to bring our meditation to a close.

(3512.) In meditation, those who begin heavenly thoughts and prosecute them not are like those who kindle a fire under green wood, and leave it as soon as it begins to flame.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(3513.) Let not thy meditations be transient. The milk must be set some time before it will turn into cream. Many blows drive a nail to the head, many thoughts settle a truth on the heart.

Oh, that I might not only at some times exchange a few words with the subject of my meditation occasionally, as I do with a friend passing by my door; but also at set times invite it, as Lot did the angels, to stay with me all night, being confident it will pay me bountifully (as they him) for my charges in its entertainment.

—Swinmock, 1673.

(3514.) Occasional meditations do some good, but set meditations much more, as making a greater impression upon the soul, and abiding longer with it. They differ as a taste and a full meal, as a sip and a good draught. Occasional meditations are like loving strangers, that afford us a visit, but are quickly gone: deliberate meditations are as inhabitants that dwell with us, and are longer helpful to us. The former, as the morning dew, do somewhat moisten and refresh the earth, but quickly pass away; the latter, as a good shower, soak deep and continue long.

—Swinmock, 1673.

6. Neither must it be unduly prolonged.

(3515.) Do not overdo in point of violence or length; but carry on the work sincerely according to the abilities of your minds and bodies; lest going beyond your strength, you craze your brains, and discompose your minds, and disable yourselves, to do anything at all. Though we cannot estimatively love God too much, yet it is possible to think of Him with too much passion, or too long at once, because it may be more than the spirits and brain can bear; and if once they be overstrained, if they break not, like a lute-string screwed too high, they will be like a leg out of joint, that can pain you, but not bear you. While the soul rideth on so lame or dull a horse, as the body is, it must not go the pace which it desireth, but which the body can bear; or else it may be quickly dismounted, or like one that rideth on a tired horse. It is not the horse that goeth at first with chafing heat and violence which will travel best; but you must put on in the pace that you are able to hold out. You little know how lamentable and distressed a case you will be in, or how great an advantage the tempter hath, if once he do but tire you by overdoing!

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

VI. ITS DIFFICULTIES.

1. Are merely initial.

(3516.) As in the heating of an oven the fuel is set on fire, yet not without some pains to blow it up into a flame, but afterwards, when the oven begins to be somewhat hot, the fuel will catch and kindle of itself, and no sooner is it thrown in but it is all in a blaze on a sudden: such is the difficulty of meditation at the first. When there is but, as it were, a little spark of love in the heart, it will cost a man some pains to blow it up into a flame; but afterwards, when the heart is once heated with those flames of love, then it will inflame all the thoughts and set the affections on fire: insomuch, that the duty of meditation will not be only easy and delightful, but so necessary, that a man cannot tell how to avoid it.

—White, 1576-1648.

(3517.) There are two things that make meditation hard. The one is, because men are not used thereunto, men are not exercised therein: and another is, because they do not love God enough. Everything is hard at the first: writing is hard at the first, painting hard at the first, and the getting languages hard at the first. A trade is hard at the first, so certainly the work of meditation will be hard at the first. There is nothing not hard to those that are unwilling. There is nothing hard to those that love, love makes all things easy. Is it a hard thing for a lover to think or meditate on the person loved? Is it a hard thing for a child at a distance from his father to think or meditate on his father, and his father's love and kindness,—is this hard? Indeed to a rebellious child it is hard, but for a loving and an obedient child it is not hard. And what is the reason that the work of meditation is so hard to many of us, but because in truth we are not used thereunto, or because we are rebellious children, and do not love the Lord as we ought to do?

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

2. Yield to persistent effort.

(3518.) Continue to meditate till you find some sensible benefit conveyed to your soul. The nature of man has a great disrelish of this duty, and we are apt to be soon weary of it; our thoughts are like a bird in the cage, which flutters the more because of his confinement; so our thoughts are apt to run strayingly out when we confine them to such a duty as this is; but he that begins and doth not proceed loses the benefit of the duty. As it is in the kindling of fire in wet wood, you know continuance is that which must cause the flame. When you blow at first, there is a little smoke arises; by holding on, you raise sparks; but he that goes forward at last brings it to a flame. So 'tis in the duty of meditation; when you begin to meditate upon spiritual things, at first you raise a smoke, a few sighs towards God; by continuance you raise some sparks of heavenly desires; but at last there's a flame of holy affections that goes up towards God. Now you should not ordinarily leave the work till the flame doth so ascend. When a man goes forth in a calm and serene evening, and views the face of the heavens, he shall see a star or two twinkle and peep forth; but if he continues, both their number and lustre is increased, and at last he sees the whole heaven bespangled with stars in every part; so when thou dost meditate upon the promises of the gospel, at first it may be one star begins to appear, a little light conveys itself to thy heart; but go forward, and then thou wilt find, when thy thoughts are amplified and ripened, there will be a clear light; more conveyed to thy soul; and in continuance the covenant of grace will appear bespangled with promises as heaven with stars, and all to give thee satisfaction.
—Salter.

(3519.) This duty of set meditation is as hard as rare, and as uneasy as extraordinary, but experience teaches that the profit makes abundant recompense for our pains in the performance of it. Besides, as millstones grind hard at first, but being used to it, they grind easily, and make good flour; so the Christian wholly disused to this duty at first may find it difficult, but afterwards both facile and fruitful.
—Swinmock, 1673.

3. Are not to deter us from it.

(3520.) Men who are sick and weakly in their bodies do not altogether abstain from food and physic, but rather use them, that they may recover their strength again; and though their appetite is small, yet they force themselves, that, by eating a little and a little, they may get a stomach. Shall a man who is dim-sighted shut the windows because the house is dark! Shall he not rather open them to let in the light that he may the better see to go about his business? And the colder a man feels himself, the more needful he thinks it to come to the fire and warm himself, or use some exercise, that so he may recover his natural heat. Thus, in like manner, the sight of our own natural wants and weaknesses is not a sufficient plea to bar us from the exercise of divine meditation, but rather incite us thereunto, it being an excellent means to clear up our sight, to enlighten our minds with more knowledge, to get spiritual health and strength, and to warm our cold and frozen hearts, that so, by God's assistance, we may perform service unto Him with more heat of godly zeal and fervour of devotion.

—Downname, 1642.

VII. ITS PROPER RESULTS.

1. Prayer.

(3521.) In vain do we charge the gun, if we intend not to let it off. Meditation filleth the heart with heavenly matter, but prayer gives the discharge, and pours it forth upon God, whereby He is overcome to give the Christian his desired relief and succour. The promise is the bill or bond, wherein God makes Himself a debtor to the creature. Now, though it is some comfort to a poor man that hath no money at present to buy bread with, when he reads his bills and bonds, to see that he hath a great sum owing him; yet this will not supply his present wants, and buy him bread. No, it is the putting his bond in suit must do this. By meditating on the promise thou comest to see there is support in, and deliverance out of, affliction engaged for; but none will come till thou commencest thy suit, and by the prayer of faith callest in the debt. "Your heart shall live that seek the Lord." "They looked unto Him, and were lightened." God expects to hear from you before you can expect to hear from Him. If thou "restrainest prayer," it is no wonder the mercy promised is retained. Meditation is like the lawyer's studying the case in order to his pleading it at the bar. When, therefore, thou hast viewed the promise, and affected thy heart with the riches of it, then ply thee to the Throne of Grace, and spread it before the Lord. Thus David: "Remember Thy word unto Thy servant, upon which Thou hast caused me to hope."

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

2. Practice.

(3522.) Contemplation is an excellent part of Divine service, but charitable actions are more useful. . . . It is one thing to inquire which is in itself more excellent, and another thing to say which we are to choose; one thing to say this is to be preferred in estimation, and another to say this is to be preferred in practice. Ecstasies and raptures and conversing with blessed spirits are certainly actions and passions respectively of greater eminence than dressing the sores of poor boys in hospitals; and yet he that does this serves Christ and does good, while he that follows after the others may fall into the delusions of the devil. That which is best in itself is not best for me: it is best for the best state, but not for the state of men who dwell in imperfection. Strong meat is better than milk, but this is best for babes; and therefore he would but ill consult the good of his child who, because it is a princely boy, would feed him with beef and venison, wild boar and the juice of great fishes. Certainly a jewel is better than a piece of frieze, and gold is a more noble and perfect substance than barley: and yet frieze and barley do in their season more good than gold and jewels, and are therefore much more eligible. For everything is to be accounted of in its own place and scene of eminency: the eye loves one best, and the tongue and palate, the throat and stomach love the other. But the understanding which considers both gives the value according to the degree of usefulness, and to the end of its ministry. Now though our understanding can consider things in their own perfections, and proportion honour and value to them; yet that which is better than honour, love, and desire, union and fruition are due to those things most, which it may be we honour least. And therefore there are some parts of the service of God which are like meat and clothes, and some are like gold and jewels; we value and admire these, but we are to choose the other; that is, we prefer one in discourse, and the other in use; we give better words to one, and better usages to the other. And therefore those parts of the Divine service which are most necessary, and do most good to mankind, are to be chosen before those that look more splendidly, and in themselves import more perfection. The foundation of a house is better than the roof, though the roof be gilded; and that part of the service of God which serves the needs of mankind most, is to be chosen before those which adorn him better.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(3524.) Our hearts and affections should answer our thoughts, as the echo the voice, and the wax the character in the seal. If our meditations do not better our hearts, they do nothing. Whilst they swim in the mind, as light things floating on the waters, they are unprofitable; but when they sink down into the affections, as heavy and weighty things, making suitable and real impressions there, then they attain their end. Our design in meditation must be rather to cleanse our hearts, than to clear our heads. "Whilst I was musing the fire burned." We strike fire by meditation to kindle our affections. This application of the thoughts to the heart is like the natural heat, which digests the food and turns it into good nourishment.

The close applying of our meditations to our hearts is like the applying and rubbing in oil on a numb joint, which recovers it to its due sense. He that omits it, doth as a chapman that appraises ware and cheapens it, but does not buy it, and so is never the better for it.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(3525.) The Christian must not only pray his good thoughts, but practise them; he must not lock them up in his mind, but lay them out in his life.

A council of war or of state is wholly useless, if there be none to execute what they determine. That kingdom flourishes best where faithful execution follows upon sound advisements: therefore the heathen pronounced that city safe which had the heads of old men for consideration, and the hands of young men for execution. Action without consideration is usually lame and defective: consideration without action is lost and abortive. Though meditation, like Rachel, be more fair; execution, like Leah, is most fruitful. Good intentions without suitable actions are like a piece charged without a bullet, which may make a noise, but does no good, no execution.

It is in vain to pretend, that, like Moses, we go into the mount of contemplation and converse with God, unless we come down as he did with our faces shining, our conversations more resplendent with holiness.

—Swinnock, 1673.

MIRACLES.

1. Defined.

(3526.) A miracle is a work exceeding the power of any created agent, consequently being an effect of the Divine omnipotence. —South, 1633-1716.

2. Are not incredible.

(3527.) It seems to me that it needs no great power of faith to believe in the miracles, for true faith is a power, not a mere yielding. There are far harder things to believe than the miracles. For a man is not required to believe in them save as believing in Jesus. If a man can believe that there is a God, he may well believe that, having made creatures capable of hungering and thirsting for Him, He must be capable of speaking a word to guide them in their feeling after Him. And if He is a grand God, a God worthy of being God, yea (His metaphysics even may show the seeker), if He is a God capable of being God, He will speak the clearest, grandest word of guidance which He can utter intelligible to His creatures. For us that word must simply be the gathering of all the expressions of His visible works into an infinite human face, lighted up by an infinite human soul behind it,—namely, that potential essence of man, if I may use a word of my own, which was in the beginning with God. If God should thus hear the cry of the noblest of His creatures,—for such are all they who do cry after Him,—and in very deed show them His face, it is but natural to expect that the deeds of the great Messenger should be just the works of the Father done in little. If He came to reveal His Father in miniature, as it were (for in these unspeakable things we can but use figures, and the homeliest may be the holiest), to tone down His great voice—which, too loud for men to hear it aright, could but sound to them as an inarticulate thundering—into such a still small voice as might enter their human ears in welcome human speech, then the works that His Father does so widely, so grandly, that they transcend the vision of men, the Son must do briefly and sharply before their very eyes.

—George Macdonald.

(3528.) If infidelity wishes to shake the Christian's faith in a personal God, it must account, not for the miracles of the first century merely, but for those of the nineteenth.

—Lyman Abbott.

3. Reasonableness of our confidence that the New Testament miracles were really wrought.

(3529.) A man cannot be fairly required to believe anything very strange and unlikely, except when there is something still more strange and unlikely on the opposite side. Now that is just the case with respect to the Christian miracles; for, wonderful as the whole gospel history is, the most wonderful thing of all is, that a Jewish peasant should have succeeded in changing the religion of the world. That He should have succeeded in doing this without displaying any miracles would have been more wonderful than all the miracles that are recorded; and that He should have accomplished all this by means of pretended miracles, when none were really performed, would be most incredible of all. So that those who are unwilling to believe anything that is strange cannot escape doing so by disbelieving the gospel; but will have to believe something still more strange if they reject the gospel.

And it is the same in many other cases as well as in what relates to religion. We are often obliged to believe, at any rate, in something that is very wonderful, in order to avoid believing something else that is still more wonderful. For instance, it is well known that in these islands, and in several other parts of the world, there are great beds of sea-shells found near the top of hills, sometimes several thousand feet above the sea. Now it is certainly very hard to believe that the sea should ever have covered these places which now lie so far above it; and yet we are compelled to believe this, because we cannot think of any other way that is not far more incredible by which those shells have been deposited there.

And so it is with gospel history. We are sure that the Christian religion does now exist, and has overspread most of the civilised world; and we know that it was not first introduced and propagated (like that of Mohammed) by force of arms. To believe that it was received, and made its way, without miracles, would be to believe something more miraculous (if one may so speak) than all the miracles that our books record.

—Whateley, 1787-1863.

4. Their relation to natural law.

(1.) Not distinguished from the effects of natural law in being works of God.

(3530.) The distinction which is sometimes made, that in the miracles God is immediately working, and in other events is leaving it to the laws which He has established to work, cannot at all be admitted: for it has its root in a dead mechanical view of the universe, lying altogether remote from the truth. The clock-maker makes his clock, and leaves it; the ship-builder builds and launches his ship, and others navigate it; the world, however, is no curious piece of mechanism which its Maker constructs, and then dismisses from His hands, only from time to time reviewing and repairing it; but, as our Lord says, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work" (John v. 17). He "upholdeth all things by the word of His power" (Heb. i. 3).

—Trench.

(2.) Are not contraventions of natural law.

(3531.) A miracle is commonly defined to be a contravention of the laws of nature. More properly speaking, it is only a higher operation of those same laws, in a form hitherto unseen. A miracle is perhaps no more a suspension or contradiction of the laws of nature than a hurricane or a thunder-storm. They who first travelled to tropical latitudes came back with anecdotes of supernatural convulsions of the elements. In truth, it was only that they had never personally witnessed such effects: but the hurricane which swept the waves flat, and the lightning which illuminated all the heavens or played upon the bayonets or masts in lambent flames, were but effects of the very same laws of electricity and meteorology which were in operation at home.

—Robertson, 1816-1853.

(3532.) A miracle is perhaps no more in contravention of the laws of the universe than the direct interposition of a whole nation, in cases of emergency, to uphold what is right in opposition to what is established, is an opposition to the laws of the realm. For instance, the whole people of Israel reversed the unjust decree of Saul which had sentenced Jonathan to death. But law is the expression only of a people's will. Ordinarily we see that expression mediated through judges, office-bearers, kings; and so long as we see it in this mediate form, we are by habit satisfied that all is legal. There are cases, however, in which, not an indirect, but a direct expression of a nation's will is demanded. Extraordinary cases; and because extraordinary, they who can only see what is legal in what is customary, conventional, and in the routine of written precedents, get bewildered, and reckon the anomalous act illegal or rebellious. In reality, it is only the source of earthly law, the nation, pronouncing the law without the intervention of the subordinate agents.

This will help us to understand the nature of a miracle. What we call laws are simply the subordinate expressions of a will. There must be a will before there can be a law. Certain antecedents are followed by certain consequents. When we see this succession, we are satisfied, and call it natural. But there are emergencies in which it may be necessary for the will to assert itself, and become not the mediate but the immediate antecedent to the consequent. No subordinate agent interposes; simply the first cause comes in contact with a result. The audible expression of will is followed immediately by something which is generally preceded by some lower antecedent, which we call a cause. In this case you will observe there has been no contravention of the laws of nature; there has only been an immediate connection between the first cause and the last result. A miracle is the manifestation to man of the voluntariness of power.

—Robertson, 1816-1853.

(3533.) An organ is a certain instrument curiously framed or adjusted in its parts, and prepared to yield itself to any force which touches the keys. An animal runs back and forth across the keyboard, and produces a jarring, disagreeable jumble of sounds. Thereupon he begins to reason, and convinces himself that it is the nature of the instrument to make such sounds, and no other. But a skilful player comes to the instrument, as a higher presence, endowed with a supernatural sense and skill. He strikes the keys, and all melodious and heavenly sounds roll out upon the enchanted air.

Will the animal now go on to reason that this is impossible, incredible, because it violates the nature of the instrument, and is contrary to his own experience? Perhaps he may, and men may sometimes not be wiser than he. But the player himself, and all that can think it possible for him to do what the animal cannot, will have no doubt that the music is made by the same laws that made the jargon. Just so Christ, to whose will or touch our mundane system is as pliant as to ours, may be able to execute results through its very laws subordinated to Him, which to us are impossible. Nay, it would be itself a contradiction of all order and fit relation if He could not. To suppose that a being out of humanity will be shut up within all the limitations of humanity is incredible and contrary to reason. The very laws of nature themselves, having Him present to them as a new agent and higher first term, would require the development of new consequences and incidents in the nature of wonders. Being a miracle Himself, it would be the greatest of all miracles if He did not work miracles.

—Bushnell.

(3534.) We should term the miracle not the infraction of a law, but behold in it the lower law neutralised, and for the time put out of working by a higher; and of this abundant analogous examples are evermore going forward before our eyes. Continually we behold in the world around us lower laws held in restraint by higher, mechanic by dynamic, chemical by vital, physical by moral; yet we say not, when the lower thus gives place in favour of the higher, that there was any violation of law, or that anything contrary to nature came to pass; rather we acknowledge the law of a greater freedom swallowing up the law of a lesser.

Thus, when I lift my arm, the law of gravitation is not, as far as my arm is concerned, denied or annihilated; it exists as much as ever, but is held in suspense by the higher law of my will.

The chemical laws which would bring about decay in animal substances still subsist, even when they are checked and hindered by the salt which keeps those substances from corruption.

The law of sin in a regenerate man is held in continual check by the law of the spirit of life; yet it is in his members still, not indeed working, for a mightier law has stepped in and now holds it in abeyance, but still there, and ready to work, did that higher law cease from its more effectual operation.

What in each of these cases is wrought may be against one particular law, that law being contemplated in its isolation, and rent away from the complex of laws, whereof it forms only a part. But no law does thus stand alone, and it is not against, but rather in entire harmony with, the system of laws; for the law of those laws is, that where powers come into conflict, the weaker shall give place to the stronger, the lower to the higher.

—Trench.

(3.) Supernatural uses of natural law are neither inconceivable nor rare.

(3535.) What is implied in a miraculous dispensation? I will not pause to attempt what has been so often attempted, the definition of a miracle. I will not in the meantime inquire, whether the speaking of it as a suspension of the ordinary laws of nature by the direct interposition of God, be a strictly accurate mode of expression or not; I will merely say, that to me it appears inaccurate. I do not conceive that suspension of an otherwise inevitable operation of one power or law in the universe by the control of a higher power, is to be regarded as miraculous. The law of gravitation, for example, is not truly to be regarded as superseded, because a man places his hand under a heavy body that is about to fall, and by the voluntary control that he has over his muscles prevents the law of gravitation from operating that particular effect. Now, believing that the power of God is not only everywhere present, but everywhere in action, believing that the action of all subordinate laws is ultimately the action of this highest law, I believe that the operation of the Divine power is not only everywhere present, but that its presence is necessary to the ultimate operation of all the subordinate laws or powers; and therefore I do not regard those powers or a course of nature as (strictly speaking) suspended, because that power, which is both present and necessarily present, shall by the direct will of God control any particular effect that those laws would otherwise have operated.

—A. J. Scott, 1866.

(3536.) The most rigid prevalence of law and necessary sequence among purely material phenomena may be admitted without apprehension by the firmest believer in miracles, so long as that sequence is so interpreted as to leave room for a power indispensable to all moral obligation and to all religious belief—the power of free will in man.

Deny the existence of a free will in man, and neither the possibility of miracles, nor any other question of religion or morality, is worth contending about. Admit the existence of a free will in man, and we have the experience of a power, analogous, however inferior, to that which is supposed to operate in the production of a miracle, and forming the basis of a legitimate argument from the less to the greater. In the will of man we have the solitary instance of an Efficient Cause in the highest sense of the term, acting among and along with the physical causes of the material world, and producing results which would not have been brought about by any invariable sequence of physical causes left to their own action. We have evidence, also, of an elasticity, so to speak, in the constitution of nature, which permits the influence of human power on the phenomena of the world to be exercised or suspended at will, without affecting the stability of the whole. We have thus a precedent for allowing the possibility of a similar interference of a higher will on a grander scale, provided for by a similar elasticity of the matter subjected to its influence. Such interferences, whether produced by human or by superhuman will, are not contrary to the laws of matter; but neither are they the result of those laws. They are the work of an agent who is independent of the laws, and who, therefore, neither obeys them nor disobeys them. If a man, of his own free will, throws a stone into the air, the motion of the stone, as soon as it has left his hand, is determined by a combination of purely material laws; partly by the attraction of the earth; partly by the resistance of the air; partly by the magnitude and direction of the force by which it was thrown. But by what law came it to be thrown at all? What law brought about the circumstance through which the aforesaid combination of material laws came into operation on this particular occasion and in this particular manner? The law of gravitation, no doubt, remains constant and unbroken, whether the stone is lying on the ground or moving through the air; but neither the law of gravitation, nor all the laws of matter put together, could have brought about this particular result without the interposition of the free will of the man who throws the stone. Substitute the will of God for the will of man! and the argument, which in the above instance is limited to the narrow sphere within which man's power can be exercised, becomes applicable to the whole extent of creation, and to all the phenomena which it embraces.

(3537.) The great difficulty heretofore encountered, in establishing the faith of a supernatural agency, has been due to the fact that we have made a ghost of it; discussing it as if it were a marvel of superstition, and no definite and credible reality. Whereas it will appear, as we confront our difficulty more thoughtfully and take its full force, that the moment we begin to conceive ourselves rightly, we become ourselves supernatural. It is no longer necessary to go hunting after marvels, apparitions, suspensions of the laws of nature, to find the supernatural: it meets us in what is least transcendent and most familiar, even in ourselves. In ourselves we discover a tier of existences that are above nature, and, in all their most orderly actions, are doing their will upon it. The very idea of our personality is that of a being not under the law of cause and effect, a being supernatural. This one point clearly apprehended, all the difficulties of our subject are at once relieved, if not absolutely and completely removed.

If any one is startled or shocked by what appears to be the extravagance of this position, let him recur to our definition, viz., that nature is the world of substance whose laws are laws of cause and effect, and whose events transpire, in orderly succession, under those laws; the supernatural is that range of substance, if any such there be, that acts upon the chain of cause and effect in nature from without the chain, producing thus results that by mere nature, could not come to pass. It is not said, be it observed, as is sometimes done, that the supernatural implies a suspension of the laws of nature, a causing them, for the time, not to be—that, perhaps, is never done—it is only said that we, as powers not in the line of cause and effect, can set the causes in nature at work, in new combinations otherwise never occurring, and produce by our action upon nature results which she, as nature, could never produce by her own internal acting.

Illustrations are at hand without number. Thus nature, for example, never made a pistol, or gunpowder, or pulled a trigger; all which being done, or procured to be done, by the criminal in his act of murder, he is hung for what is rightly called his unnatural deed. So of things not criminal; nature never built a house or modelled a ship, or fitted a coat, or invented a steam-engine, or wrote a book, or framed a constitution. These are all events that spring out of human liberty, acting in and upon the realm of cause and effect, to produce results and combinations, which mere cause and effect could not; and at some point of the process in each, we shall be found coming down upon nature, by an act of sovereignty just as peremptory and mysterious as that which is discovered in a miracle, only that a miracle is a similar coming down upon it from another and higher being, and not from ourselves. Thus, for example in the firing of a pistol, we find materials brought together and compounded for making an explosive gas, an arrangement prepared to strike a fire into the substance compounded, an arm pulled back to strike the fire, muscles contracted to pull back the arm, a nervous telegraph running down from the brain, by which some order has been sent to contract the muscles; and then having come to the end of the chain of natural causes, the jury ask, who sent the mandate down upon the nervous telegraph, ordering the said contraction? And having found, as their true answer, that the arraigned criminal did it, they offer this as their verdict, and on the strength of the verdict he is hung. He had, in other words, a power to set in order a line of causes and effects, existing elementally in nature, and then, by a sentence of his will, to start the line, doing his unnatural deed of murder. If it be inquired how he was able to command the nervous telegraph in this manner, we cannot tell, any more than we can show the manner of a miracle. The same is true in regard to all our most common actions. If one simply lifts a weight, overcoming, thus far, the great law of gravity, we may trace the act back in the same way; and if we do it we shall come at last to the man acting in his personal arbitrament, and shall find him sending down his mandate to the arm, summoning its contractions and sentencing the weight to rise,—in which, as we perceive, he has just so much of power given him to vary the incidents and actings of nature as determined by her own laws—so much, that is, of power supernatural.

Finding now in this manner that we ourselves are supernatural creatures, and that the supernatural, instead of being some distant, ghostly affair, is similar to us as our own most familiar action; also, that nature, as a realm of cause and effect, is made to be acted on from without by us and all moral beings—thus to be the environment of our life, the instrument of our activity, the medium of our right or wrong doing toward each other, and so the school of our trial—a further question rises, viz., what will we think of God's relations to nature? If it be nothing incredible that we should act on the chain of cause and effect in nature, is it more incredible that God should thus act? Strange as it may seem, this is the grand offence of supernaturalism, the supposing that God can act on nature from without; on the chain of cause and effect in nature from without the chain of connection, by which natural causes are propagated—exactly that which we ourselves are doing as the most familiar thing in our lives! It involves, too, as we can see at a glance, no disruption by us of the laws of nature, but only a new combination of its elements and forces, and need not any more involve such a disruption by Him. Nor can any one show that a miracle of Christ (the raising, for example, of Lazarus) involves anything more than that nature is prepared to be acted on by a divine power, just as it is to be acted on by a human in the making of gunpowder, or the making and charging of a firearm. For though there seems to be an immense difference in the grade of the results accomplished, it is only a difference which ought to appear regarding the grade of the two agents by whom they are wrought. How different the power of two men, creatures though they be of the same order; a Newton, for example, a Watt, a Fulton, and some wild Patagonian or stunted Esquimaux. So, if there be angels, seraphim, thrones, dominions, all in ascending scales of endowment above one another, they will, of course, have powers supernatural, or capacities to act on the lines of causes in nature that correspond with their natural quantity and degree. What wonder then is it, in the case of Jesus Christ, that He reveals a power over nature appropriate to the scale of His being and the inherent supremacy of His divine person?

—Bushnell.

(3538.) The advocates of revelation do not deny the regularity and constancy of natural laws. We do not impeach the wisdom and perfection of these laws. We do not say that it was necessary for the Creator to modify their action in order to secure the ends for which they were established. The uniform connection between antecedent and consequent is a postulate both of Revelation and Science. If the connection were irregular and uncertain, there could be no scientific knowledge of the material world—nor could any miraculous evidence be given for the divine commission of an inspired prophet; the whole force of the argument from miracles rests on the constancy of the laws of nature; only a supernatural power can account for miraculous phenomena. But whether it is possible or probable that miracles should be wrought to authenticate a direct communication from God, is a question on which physical science has absolutely no right to pronounce an opinion. She cannot presume to limit the power of God; she cannot form any judgment as to the probability of His making a supernatural revelation of Himself to man, or as to the means He will select to prove that the revelation really comes from Him. That a power higher than natural law can manifest itself in the very provinces which belong to physical science is an obvious fact. Account for the elevation of my hand. Physiology will reply by describing the structure of my arm, the mechanical arrangements of the elbow and the wrist, the action of the muscles, and the influence of the motor-nerves. This is the region of law. But the movement of the hand is not accounted for yet, behind these physiological phenomena there is another power, my supernatural will. Nor will it do to say that the action of my will was but the necessary result of the motives which influenced me. I am conscious of the power of choosing by what motive I will be determined. Trace back the chain of natural antecedents and consequents as elaborately as you will, and you will reach at last a force which is above nature, in attempting to explain so simple a phenomenon as the elevation of a human hand, nor can any explanation be given of the manner in which the supernatural volition is translated into the region of physical law. Take the Bible lying on this desk, why do you believe that it is the production of human thought and skill? Simply because there are no natural laws which, left to their own uncontrolled and unguided action, would produce a substance like paper, or impress on it the printed characters which represent human language, or bind the loose sheets into a volume. It is not a natural production at all; it is the creation of a supernatural will employing natural substances and natural laws to effect its purpose. What is miraculous differs from what is artificial simply in this—that in the one, effects are produced which can be accounted for by the action of the will of man; and in the other, effects are produced which can be accounted for only by the action of the will of God.

—R. W. Dale.

5. Their design.

(3539.) The glory of Christ did not begin with the miracle wrought in Cana; the miracle only manifested it. For thirty years the wonder-working power had been in Him. It was not diviner power when it broke forth into visible manifestation, than it had been when it was unsuspected and unseen. It had been exercised up to this time in common acts of youthful life: obedience to His mother, love to His brethren. Well, it was just as divine in those simple, daily acts, as when it showed itself in a way startling and wonderful. It was just as much the life of God on earth when He did an act of ordinary human love or human duty, as when He did an extraordinary act, such as turning water into wine. God was as much, nay more, in the daily life and love of Christ, than He was in Christ's miracles. The miracle only made the hidden glory visible. The extraordinary only proved that the ordinary was Divine. That was the very object of the miracle. It was done to manifest forth His glory. And if, instead of rousing men to see the real glory of Christ in His other life, the miracle merely fastened men's attention on itself, and made them think that the only Glory which is Divine is to be found in what is wonderful and uncommon, then the whole intention of the miracle was lost.

Let us make this more plain by an illustration. To the wise man, the lightning only manifests the electric force which is everywhere, and which for one moment has become visible. As often as he sees it, it reminds him that the lightning slumbers invisibly in the dew-drop, and in the mist, and in the cloud, and binds together every atom of the water that he uses in daily life. But to the vulgar mind the lightning is something unique, a something which has no existence but when it appears. There is a fearful glory in the lightning because he sees it. But there is no startling glory and nothing fearful in the drop of dew, because he does not know, what the Thinker knows, that the flash is there in all its terrors. So, in the same way, to the half believer a miracle is the one solitary evidence of God. Without it he could have no certainty of God's existence.

But to the true disciple a miracle only manifests the Power and Love which are silently at work everywhere, as truly and as really in the slow work of the cure of the insane, as in the sudden expulsion of the legion from the demoniac—as divinely in the gift of daily bread, as in the miraculous multiplication of the loaves. God's glory is at work in the growth of the vine and the ripening of the grape, and the process by which grape-juice passes into wine. It is not more glory, but only glory more manifested, when water at His bidding passes at once into wine. And be sure that if you do not feel, as David felt, God's presence in the annual miracle, that it is God, which in the vintage of every year causeth wine to make glad the heart of man, the sudden miracle at Capernaum would not have given you conviction of His presence. "If you hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will you be persuaded though one rose from the dead."

Miracles have only done their work when they teach us the glory and the awfulness that surround our common life. In a miracle, God for one moment shows Himself, that we may remember it is He that is at work when no miracle is seen.

—F. W. Robertson, 1816–1853.

(3540.) A miracle is by its very definition an exceptional case; if you could imagine miracle established into law, it would be miracle no longer. And it is a fact, in regard to the development of human thought, that it is exceptional cases that draw the attention of mankind to general laws. For example, those observations by which philosophers were first led to think of electricity as a principle pervading a certain region of the material world, were not instances of its normal condition, in which it exists, binding all matter together. It is not while electricity subsists in the form of chemical affinity, the acting principle of the combinations of the elementary principles of matter, that the attention of men is forced towards it: it is when it comes out as the spark from the electrical machine, or from the terrible thunder-cloud, that we are led to consider what this mysterious agency may be. And from these isolated cases we follow it on, we trace it to its lurking places, as it were, and ultimately find that it is a grand pervading universal law of the physical world. Do not suppose that the subject of illustration is lowered by such a comparison as this. At all events, it may assist towards intelligibility when I say that a miracle is an exceptional case, in like manner of the Divine procedure, introduced for the express purpose of calling man's attention to a permanent law of the Divine procedure. And the Jewish theocracy was a case in which God held a nation together by miracle, for the sake of calling man's attention to the abiding laws by which God, as the Creator of mankind, holds nations together in the proportion as these laws are observed.

—A. F. Scott, 1866.

(3541.) The Bible reveals to us the spiritual source of the physical world: shows to us that the supernatural is not antagonistic to the constitution of nature, but is the eternal source of it. The miracles of the Bible are not only emblems of power in the spiritual world, but also exponents of the miracles of nature, experiments, as it were, made by the Great Teacher in person, on a small scale and within a limited time, to illustrate to mankind the phenomena that are taking place over longer periods throughout the universe. All creation is a standing wonder, but it needs other wonders to reveal it to our careless eyes and insensible hearts. It needs the sudden multiplication of the loaves and fishes at Capernaum to explain to us the mystery of the harvest of the land and the sea. It needs the miracle of Cana to show to us who it is that is gradually converting water into wine in every vineyard. It needs the virtue flowing from the hem of Christ's garment at the touch of faith, to disclose to us the source and the meaning of the medicinal virtue stored up, for bodies blighted by the curse, in many a soothing anodyne and many a healing balm. It needs the destruction of the walls of Jericho by the trumpet blast to convince us that the seen is governed by the unseen, that the mountain must yield to the action of cold and heat, and the stable rock and massive castle in the course of years be withered away and dismantled stone by stone by the subtle and invisible forces of the air. It needs the calming of the stormy waters of Gennesaret to satisfy us that the powers of nature which seem so arbitrary, so destructive, so purely physical, are held in leash by Him who maintains the constant beneficent circulation of the elements. The philosophy of miracles is, therefore, just the revelation of the living God, as the God of nature; the revelation of God, not as violating, but as maintaining the order of His world: a revelation sudden and startling, to show to us what could not be shown so effectually in any other way, what "His hand is daily doing for the beautifying and glorifying of the earth and of life." As Mr. Westcott says, in his thoughtful work on Miracles, "The order of the universe has a spiritual root. The purpose of love which changes is also the purpose of love which directs it. He who can bind and loose the forces of nature has thus revealed the eternal purpose in which they originate."

—Macmillan.

(3542.) When God had some new tidings to tell to the world, which they could not have found out by their own sense and wit, He gave to the men whom He sent with the message the power of working miracles. The miracles were a sort of bell, which they rung in the ears of their generation, that people might listen to what they had to say, and believe that it came from Heaven. Thus when God sent Moses upon an errand to the Israelites, in order that the Israelites might attend to what he said, God gave him the power of working all manner of wonders.

—Goulburn.

(3543.) The miracles of Christ have been very much perverted by discussions, and by not being looked at along the line in which they were meant to play. They were simply charities. They were, to be sure, alleged to have a certain influence among an abject and superstitious-minded people, but Christ Himself undervalued them as moral evidence. They were alternative, as evidence. "If you will not believe Me for My own sake," He says, "believe Me for My works' sake." He held that the radiant presentation of a divine nature ought to carry its own evidence; that when He appeared in speech, in conduct, in affluent affection, He was Himself His own best evidence; and yet, if they, by reason of obtuseness, could not believe in Him otherwise, He called upon them to believe in Him for the sake of His miracles. That would be better than nothing. But He discouraged and dissuaded men from seeking after miracles or signs. The miracles of Christ were, almost all of them, mere acts of benevolence. He was poor; He had neither money nor raiment to give; and yet there was suffering around about Him, and He relieved it.

—Becher.

6. Under what conditions they are authoritative.

(3544.) We have the highest possible authority, that of Scripture itself, to justify us in putting the question: whether miracles can, of themselves, work a true conviction in the mind? There are spiritual truths which must derive their evidence from within, which whoever rejects, "neither will he believe though a man were to rise from the dead" to confirm them. And under the Mosaic law, a miracle in attestation of a false doctrine subjected the miracle-worker to death: whether really or only seemingly supernatural, making no difference in the present argument, its power of convincing, whatever that power may be, whether great or small, depending on the fulness of the belief in its miraculous nature. Est quibus esse videtur. Or rather, that I may express the same position in a form less likely to offend, is not a true efficient conviction of a moral truth, is not "the creating of a new heart," which collects the energies of a man's being in the focus of the conscience, the one essential miracle, the same and of the same evidence to the ignorant and to the learned, which no superior skill can counterfeit, human or demoniacal? Is it not emphatically that leading of the Father, without which no man can come to Christ? Is it not that implication of doctrine in the miracle, and of miracle in the doctrine, which is the bridge of communication between the senses and the soul? That predisposing warmth that renders the understanding susceptible of the specific impression from the historic, and from all other outward seals of testimony? Is not this the one infallible criterion of miracles, by which a man can know whether they be of God? The abhorrence in which the most savage or barbarous tribes hold witchcraft, in which, however, their belief is so intense as even to control the springs of life,—is not this abhorrence of witchcraft, and so full a conviction of its reality, a proof how little of divine, how little fitting to our nature, a miracle is when insulated from spiritual truths, and disconnected from religion as its end?

—S. T. Coleridge, 1772-1834.

(3545.) The fact that the kingdom of lies has its wonders no less than the kingdom of truth, would be alone sufficient to convince us that miracles cannot be appealed to absolutely and simply, in proof of the doctrine which the worker of them proclaims; and God's Word expressly declares the same (Deut. xiii. 1-5). A miracle does not prove the truth of a doctrine, or the divine mission of him that brings it to pass. That which alone it claims for him at the first is a right to be listened to: it puts him in the alternative of being from heaven or from hell. The doctrine must first commend itself to the conscience as being good, and only then can the miracle seal it as divine.

—Trench.

7. Their significance should be pondered.

(3546.) Often some one sees fair characters written, then praises he the writer and the characters, but knows not what they mean. He who understands the art of writing praises its fairness, and reads the characters, and comprehends their meaning. In one way we look at a picture, and in another at character. Nothing more is necessary for a picture than that you see and praise it: but it is not enough to look at characters, without at the same time reading them, and understanding their signification. So also is it with regard to the miracle.

—Ælfric, 1091.

(3547.) As a boy that cannot write at all looks with wonder and admiration upon the performance of a writing master, who without thought can form the letters and sentences so as to make the page look like engraving, while the master himself has no idea that he is doing anything extraordinary; so men looked with wonder and admiration upon the miracles of Christ, by which He fed the multitude, turned water into wine, healed the sick, cast out devils, brought the dead from their shadowy land, and evoked victory out of defeat, while Christ Himself did not regard these things as of very great importance. They were merely the authentication of His divinity. The real thing for which He came was that which lay beyond this. His errand was to bring upon the human soul a cleansing power, an inspiring power, a formative power. He was to set us free from sin, inspire in us a longing for purity, and form our character on that basis. Accordingly, Christ is presented mainly in the New Testament, from beginning to end, in His relations to the soul of man. Even when He is compared with His Father, it is always as a means of exhibiting with greater power His curative relation to the human soul.

—Becher.

8. Their cessation.

(3548.) "Why," say you, "do not those things take place now?" Because they would not move unless they were wonderful, and if they were usual, they would not be wonderful.*

For the interchanges of day and night, and the settled order of things in heaven, the revolution of years divided into four parts, the fall and return of leaves to trees, the boundless power of seeds, the beauty of light, the varieties of colours, sounds, tastes, scents, let there be some one who shall see and perceive them for the first time, and yet such an one as we may converse with; he is stupefied and overwhelmed with miracles: but we contempt all these, not because they are easy to understand,—for what more obscure than the causes of these?—but surely because they constantly meet our senses.

Therefore they were done at a very suitable time, in order that, by these a multitude of believers having been gathered together and spread abroad, authority might be turned with effect upon habits.

—Augustine, 353-429.

(3549.) But why did not Christ continue this communication of the Holy Ghost to His churches still, seeing our unbelief is strong, and we have still need of such help as well as they?

Answer 1. We have the full use and benefit of the Holy Ghost which was given then, that seal that was then set to the Christian doctrine and Scriptures stands there still. When Christ hath fully proved to the world the truth of His mediatorship, office, and doctrine, must He still continue the same actions? Is it not enough that He sealed it up once, but must He set a new seal for every man that requireth it in every age? Then miracles would be no miracles. Must your landlord seal your lease anew every time you will causelessly question his former seal?

Then, if Christ had done miracles among a thousand, every man that was not present should come and say, "Do the like before me also, or I will not believe." Will you put God to this, that either He must work constant miracles in every age, and before every man, or else He must not be believed? What, if all Christ's works had been done at London, and we had not seen them here in the country, or what, if all this town had seen them except one man, should no man believe them but he that did see them? Should no man believe that there hath been any wars and fighting in England, but those that saw the battles? Or what, if these things had been done in our forefathers' days, should not we have believed them except they had been done in ours? We have as full testimony of Christ's and His apostles' true works as we can have of any of these. —Baxter, 1615-1691.

* In his "Retractiones," b. i. c. 14, 5, Augustine makes the following statement in regard to this passage:—"In another place, where I had made mention of the miracles which our Lord did while He was here in the flesh, I added, saying, 'Why,' say you, 'do not those things take place now?' and I answered, 'Because they would not move unless they were wonderful, and if they were usual, they would not be wonderful.' But this I said because not so great miracles, nor all, take place now, not because there are none wrought even now."

(3550.) Certain it is, that now these extraordinary and miraculous powers are ceased, and that upon as good reason as at first they began. For when the spiritual building is consummate, and not only the corner stone laid, but the superstructure also finished, to what purpose should the scaffolds any longer stand? which when they leave off to contribute to the building, can serve for little else but to upbraid the folly of the builder. Besides, that by so long a continuance miracle would almost turn into nature, or at least look very like it; the rarities of heaven would grow cheap and common, and (which is very preposterous to conceive) they would be miracles without a wonder. —South, 1633-1716.

(3551.) In the beginnings of the world, before the moral sense became developed, it was useful to act upon the moral sense through the instrumentality of miracles. But as men's moral sense grows, and becomes capable of appreciating moral evidence, miracles cease;—as the nurse in the household is dispensed with when the child is grown so as to be able to take care of itself. —Butcher.

9. Folly of the demand that miracles should be repeated.

(3552.) [A doctrine once attested by miracle is for ever to be believed.] The contrary doctrine of the apostates is self-contradicting and absurd; for, whereas, they pretend that they, and they only, are bound to believe that see the miracles; by this means, they leave God incapable of convincing the world by miracles: for miracles would lose their convincing force, and be as no miracles, if they were common to all, and in all ages. For it is not so much the power that is manifest in that work simply considered, that proves it any testimony to the doctrine, or that would convince; but it is the extraordinary application of omnipotency that sealeth the truth. It is a work of as great power to cause the sun to move as to stand still, or the sea to keep its course as to change it, or the living to continue in life as for the dead to rise, and to give eye-sight at birth or in the womb, as to give it twenty years after: but it would not have confirmed Christ's doctrine so much if Lazarus had not died, as if he be raised again; or that a man be born with eyesight, as that he be restored to it that was born blind; and so of the rest. Now, these men would have every man, in every country and age in the world, to see miracles, or else not to be bound to believe; and I think, on the same ground, they must see particular miracles for the sealing of each particular truth that they receive; and, then, miracles would be common, and so lose their force and be as none; then, every infidel would say; "This is a common thing." If it were as common for the sun to stand still as to move, or for the dead to be raised as the sick to be healed or a child to be born, do you think it would be a fit evidence to convince these unbelievers of the Christian truth? Baxter, 1615-1691.

(3553.) The continuance of miracles from age to age would destroy their very nature, to which it is essential that they be rare and extraordinary; for what is ordinary and frequent we are apt to ascribe to the established laws of nature, however wonderful it be in itself. For example, if we saw the dead bodies rise from their graves as often as we see vegetables spring from seed rotten in the earth, we should be no more surprised at the one phenomenon than we are at the other, and our virtuosi would be equally busy to assign some natural cause for both.

And had we never seen the sun rise until this morning, we should justly have accounted it as great a miracle as any recorded in the Scriptures; but because it is common, we neglect it as a thing of course. Indeed, it is not anything in the event itself, or in the degree of power necessary for its accomplishment, that renders it miraculous, but its being uncommon, and out of the ordinary course of things. For example, the generation of the human body is not in itself less astonishing, nor does it require less power, than its resurrection; the revolution of the sun in its regular course is as wonderful, and as much requires a divine power, as its standing still in the days of Joshua. But we acknowledge a miracle in one case, but not in the other, because the one is extraordinary while the other frequently occurs. Hence it follows that the frequent repetition of miracles, as often as men are pleased to plead the want of evidence to excuse their infidelity, would destroy their very nature; and consequently, to demand their continuance is to demand an impossibility.

But suppose that man should be indulged in this request, it would not probably bring them to believe. If they are unbelievers now, it is not for want of evidence, but through wilful blindness and obstinacy; and as they that will shut their eyes can see no more in meridian light than in the twilight, so they that reject a sufficiency of evidence would also resist a superfluity of it. Thus the Jews, who were eye-witnesses of the miracles recorded in the Scriptures, continued invincible infidels still. They had always some trifling cavil ready to object against the brightest evidence. And thus our modern infidels would no doubt evade the force of the most miraculous attestation by some wretched hypothesis or other. They would look upon miracles either as magical productions or illusions of their senses; or rather, as natural and necessary events, which they would indeed have some reason to conclude, if they were frequently performed before their eyes. Some have pretended to doubt of the existence and perfections of God, notwithstanding the evidences thereof upon this magnificent structure of the universe; and must God be always creating new worlds before these obstinate creatures for their conviction? Such persons have as much reason to demand it in this case as our deists have to insist for new miracles in the other. —Davies, 1724-1761.

(3554.) Let it be supposed that every one had a right to demand a miracle; that the occurrence of miracles was unlimited; that as often as you had an ache, or trembled for the loss of a relation, you had but to pray and receive your wish.

Clearly in this case, first of all, the constitution of the universe would be reversed. The will of man would be substituted for the will of God. Caprice and chance would regulate all. God would be dethroned; God would be degraded to the rank of one of those beings of supernatural power with whom eastern romance abounds, who are subordinated by a spell to the will of a mortal, who is armed with their powers and uses them as vassals. God would be merely the genius who would be chained by the spell of prayer to obey the behests of man. Man would arm himself with the powers of Deity, and God would be his slave.

Further still. This unlimited extension of miracles would annihilate miracles themselves. For suppose that miracles were universal; that prayer was directly followed by a reply; that we could all heal the sick and raise the dead—this, then, would become the common order of things. It would be what we now call nature. It would cease to be extraordinary, and the infidel would be as unsatisfied as ever. He would see only the antecedent, prayer, and the invariable consequent, a reply to prayer; exactly what he sees now in the process of causation. And then, just as now, he would say, What more do you want? These are the laws of the universe! Why interpose the complex and cumbrous machinery of a God, the awkward hypothesis of a Will, to account for laws?

Miracles, then, are necessarily limited. The non-limitation of miracles would annihilate the miraculous.

—Robertson, 1816-1853.

(3555.) We should naturally expect that miracles would be done when a new creed, or new faith, was to be introduced into the world, demanding the acceptance of mankind. For what is a miracle? It is not a mere freak of power; a rare and extraordinary display, like a rocket, to blaze before the senses, and elicit admiration and astonishment, when wrought for truth; it is the hand of omnipotent power, holding up the bright light of an eternal truth. The miracle is simply the credential of the document. What the seal is upon a lease, or deed, the miracle is upon the Bible. And when people say, Would it not be better to have the miracle repeated? we answer, if you once place your signature and the impression of your seal upon a deed or lease, lawyers would not think of asking you to come back and repeat it once a year, or once in six years, or twenty years. Once done, its significance lasts. So a miracle once done as an appendage to the document, is never exhausted.

—Cumming.

10. Are not the most wonderful works of God.

(3556.) Those things which are full of marvels for an investigation deeper than we can reach, have become cheap from custom in the eyes of men. Hence it comes to pass that, if a dead man be raised to life, all men spring up in astonishment. Yet every day one that had no being is born, and no man wonders, though it is plain to all, without doubt, that it is a greater thing for that to be created which was without being, than for that which had being to be restored. Because the dry rod of Aaron budded, all men were in astonishment; every day a tree is produced from the dry earth, and the virtue residing in dust is turned into wood, and no man wonders. Because five thousand men were filled with five loaves, all men were in astonishment that the food should have multiplied in their teeth; every day the grains of seed that are sown are multiplied in a fulness of ears, and no man wonders. All men wondered to see water once turned into wine; every day the earth's moisture being drawn into the root of the vine, is turned by the grape into wine, and no man wonders. Full of wonder then are all the things which men never think to wonder at, because, as we have before said, they are by habit become dull to the consideration of them.

—Gregory, 545-604.

(3557.) He that made wine on that day at the marriage-feast in those six water-pots which He commanded to be filled with water, the same does every year the like in vines. For, as what the servants put into the water-pots was changed into wine by the operation of the Lord, just so what the clouds pour forth is changed into wine by the operation of the same Lord. But at the latter we do not marvel, because it happens every year; by constant use it hath lost its wonder.

—Augustine, 353-429.

(3558.) God has wrought many miracles and daily works; but those miracles are much weakened in the sight of men, because they are very usual. A greater miracle it is that God Almighty every day feeds all the world, and directs the good, than that miracle was, that He filled five thousand men with five loaves; but men wondered at this, not because it was a greater marvel, but because it was unusual. Who now gives fruit to our fields, and multiplies the harvest from a few grains of corn, but He who multiplied the five loaves? The might was there in Christ's hands, and the five loaves were, as it were, seed, not sown in the earth, but multiplied by Him who created the earth.

—Ælfric, 1051.

(3559.) There is nothing that God has established in a constant course of nature, and which, therefore, is done every day, but would seem a miracle, and exercise our admiration, if it were done but once; nay, the ordinary things in nature would be greater miracles than the extraordinary which we admire most, if they were done but once. The standing still of the sun, for Joshua's use, was not in itself so wonderful a thing, as that so vast and immense a body as the sun should run so many miles in a minute. The motion of the sun were a greater wonder than the standing still, if all were to begin again; and only the daily doing takes off the admiration.

—Donne, 1573-1631.

(3560.) Is it not now an argument of omnipotency to keep all the strings of nature in tune; to wind them up to a due pitch for the harmony He intended by them; to keep things that are contrary from that confusion they would naturally fall into; to prevent the jarrings which would naturally result from their various and snarling qualities; to preserve every being in its true nature; to propagate every kind of creature; order all the operations, even the meanest of them, when there are such innumerable varieties?

But let us consider, that this power of preserving things in their station and motion, and the renewing of them, is more stupendous, than that which we commonly call miraculous.

We call those miracles which are wrought out of the track of nature, and contrary to the usual stream and current of it, which men wonder at because they seldom see them and hear of them, as things rarely brought forth in the world; when, the truth is, there is more of power expressed in the ordinary station and motion of natural causes, than in those extraordinary exertings of power. Is not more power signalled in that whirling motion of the sun every hour for so many ages, than in the suspending of its motion one day, as it was in the days of Joshua? That fire should continually ravage and consume, and greedily swallow up everything that is offered to it, seems to be the effect of as admirable a power as the stopping of its appetite a few moments as in the case of the Three Children. Is not the raising of some small seeds from the ground, with a multiplication of their numerous posterity, an effect of as great a power as our Saviour's feeding many thousands with a few loaves by a secret augmentation of them? Is not the chemical producing so pleasant and delicious a fruit the grape from a dry earth, insipid rain, and a sour vine, as admirable a token of Divine power as our Saviour's turning the water into wine? Is not the cure of diseases by the application of a simple inconsiderable weed, or a slight infusion, as wonderful in itself as the cure of it by a powerful word? What if it be naturally designed to heal; what is that nature? Who gave that nature? Who maintains that nature? Who conducts it, co-operates with it? Does it work of itself, and by its own strength? Why not then equally in all, in one as well as the other? Miracles indeed affect more, because they testify the immediate operation of God without the concurrence of second causes; not that there is more of the power of God shining in them than in the other.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3561.) The naturalist observed it to be one of the solemn follies of men, to value medicines not for their virtue, but the country where they grow, the climate from whence they come; if they have a barbarous name, they are reputed to have a mysterious efficacy, and those plants are neglected as unprofitable that are natives of their own soil. The rarity is esteemed more than merit of things. It is a greater wonder to give light to the sun, than to restore it to the blind, yet its daily presence does not affect us. If a chemist should extract a liquor of such an extraordinary virtue, that by pouring a few drops of it on the dust, a body should be formed, animated, and move, would any one be induced to believe it without the testimony of his own eyes, and would it not be a surprising wonder? yet innumerable creatures spring from the dust by the falling of rain, and few think it worthy of observation. The raising a dead body to life would astonish us, but we are unaffected that every day so many living men are born. Yet, if we consider things aright, the secret forming a body in the womb is an equal prodigy of power, and as truly marvellous, as the restoring the vital congruities to a carcass, that prepare it for the reception of the soul.

—Bates, 1625-1699.

(3562.) What prodigies can Power Divine perform

More grand than It produces year by year,

And all in sight of inattentive man?
Familiar with the effect we slight the cause,
And, in the constancy of nature's course,
The regular return of genial months,
And renovation of a faded world,
See nought to wonder at. Should God again,
As once in Gibeon, interrupt the race
Of the undeviating and punctual sun,
How would the world admire! but speaks it less
An agency divine, to make him know
His moment when to sink and when to rise,
Age after age, than to arrest his course?
All we behold is miracle; but seen
So duly, all is miracle in vain.

—Cowper.

MORALISTS.

1. Their excellences.

(1.) To what they are due.

(3563.) To us there seems a wide difference between the judge, with the robes of office on his back, mind in his eye, and dignity in his mien, and that poor, pale, haggard wretch at the bar, who throws stealthy glances around, and hangs his head with shame. Yet the difference that looks so great to man may be very small in the eyes of God; and would look small in ours if we knew the different upbringing and history of both. The judge never knew what it was to want a meal; the felon often went cold and hungry to bed. The one, sprung of wise, kind, reputable, and perhaps pious parents; was early trained to good, and launched, with all the advantage of school and college, on an honourable and high career; while the other, bred up a stranger to the amenities of cultivated and Christian society, had no such advantages. Born to misery, his struggles with misfortune and evil began at the cradle. None ever took him by the hand to lead him to church or school. A child of poverty, and the offspring of abandoned parents, he was taught no lessons but how to swear, and lie, and drink, and cheat, and steal. The fact is, it is just as difficult for some to be honest as it is easy for others. What merit has that judge in his honesty? None. He had no temptation to be else than honest. And so, I suspect, much of the morality—of that unblemished character and decent life in which many trust, saying to some poor guilty thing, "Stand aside, I am holier than thou," and pluming themselves on this, that they have not sinned as others have done—is due, less to their superior virtue, than to their more favourable circumstances. Have they not sinned as others have done? I reply, They have not been tempted as others have been. And so the difference between many honest men and decent women on the one hand, and those on the other hand on whom a brand of infamy has been burned and the key of a prison turned, may be just the difference between the green branch on the tree and the white ashes on the hearth. This is bathed in the dews of night and fanned by the breath of heaven, while that, once as green, has been thrust into the burning fire—the one has been tried in a way that the other has not.

—Guthrie.

(2.) Are superficial.

(3564.) The generality of men who pretend to morality independently of religion (except those in whom the original goodness of their nature gets the better of the badness of their principles), are such as have studied and practised the art of being easy and agreeable, without incommoding themselves, or denying themselves any pleasure within bounds. The difference between the vulgar and them consists in this, that the former, like marble in the block, retain a native ruggedness; whereas the latter have an equally impenetrable, but a more smooth and polished hardness of heart.

—Seed, 1747.

(3.) Are incomplete.

(3565.) God can love nothing but Himself and what He finds of Himself in the creature. All services without something of God's image and Spirit in them are nothing. As the product of a million of cyphers; though you still add to them, signifies nothing; but add one figure, an unit, the Spirit, grace, it will make the product to be many millions of high account with God. All the significance depends upon the figure without which, if absent, the rest would be nothing. All moral perfections, without a new nature, are but cyphers in God's account: "Without faith it is impossible to please Him." Grace is only a good work. "He which hath begun a good work in you, will perform it to the day of Christ;" intimating that their morality and their natural wisdom, before their regeneration, were not good works in the sight of God. They were good in their kind, as a crab may be said to be a good crab, but not a good pippin. It is not good, unless it be fruit brought forth in Christ; neither is it ordained as good to the day of Christ, to appear glorious at the time of His triumph.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3566.) All that can he said of him, all that he will say for himself, is that he has had it for his law to speak the truth, fulfil his promises, and deal fairly by his fellow-men. Still it is not, and has never been, his aim or object to do what is right to God: and that, if I am not mistaken, is a matter of much higher consequence, and more necessary to his real integrity. God is a person as truly as men are, more closely related to us than they, a better friend, one who has more feeling to be injured than they all, claims of right more sacred. What then does it signify that a man gives men their due, and will not give God His? Does it give one a title to be called humane, that he will not stick a fly with a pin because of his tenderness, and yet will stab, in bitter grudge, his fellow-man? Does it truly entitle one to the name of a just man that he is honest and fair with men of one colour, and not with those of another—honest and fair on three days, or even five days in the week, and not on the days that remain? What then shall we think of the mere commercial integrity, just described, taken by itself? Calling it integrity, it is still integrity by halves, and, of course, without the principle; integrity by market standards only, and not by any standard that makes a real integer in duty. Real integrity begins with the principle, meaning to give every one his due; to be right with God, as with men, right against popularity as with it, right everywhere, wholly and eternally right.

—Bushnell.

2. Their lack of the one thing needful.

(3567.) One thing thou lackest." Lack of one thing may be the lack of everything.

The garden is beautifully laid out; the straight lines and the curves are exact; the terraces are arranged with artistic taste; but no seed is sown—and the summer says—"One thing thou lackest."

The machinery is perfect: cylinder, piston, valve, are in excellent order; no flaw is in the wheel, no obstruction in the flue; finer engine never stood on the iron way, everything is there but steam,—and the intending traveller says—"One thing thou lackest."

The watch has a golden case, the dial is exquisitely traced and figured, the hands are delicate and well-fixed; everything is there but the main-spring; and he who inquires the time says—"One thing thou lackest."

Conduct may be regulated in two ways; (1) by the hand, (2) by the heart: as with a watch so with the life. The face of the watch may be made to represent the truth by simply altering the hands, or it may be corrected by touching the interior works. Here is a young man who says—What shall I do to make my watch tell the hour accurately? He is answered. Thou knowest the great clocks by which time is kept in the city: he replies, "All these have I observed." He is then told to open his watch and correct the regulator. So is it with human life; many seek to correct it by the outside; they search for models, they inquire for footprints; but they neglect the life-spring within, and consequently never get beyond the affectation of artificialism, or the stiffness of Pharisaic conceit.

—Joseph Parker.

(3568.) Observation is continually noticing instances in which "one thing" seems to be everything; it is so in common life, it is so in all life. Here is a man listening to the most exquisite music; peal of trumpet, clash of cymbals, roll of drum, sweetness of the lute, sharpness of the clarionet, crash of a hundred brass instruments; to him it is simply a tumult, he sees no idea in the tempest, he does not rise and fall with the swelling rhythm of the wave and billow. Why? What is wanting? "One thing thou lackest,"—that one thing is an ear for music! Of what account is it that jewellery sparkles on his fingers, or that perfume is shed by every waive of his hand, or that the finest cloth covers his shoulders? The man is harmonically dead, and the music which rushes like a storm through the appreciative soul is to him "sound and fury, signifying nothing."

Two men walk by the same path; the gold of the same sunset is lavished on their way; they look at the same objects, and move towards the same goal. One of them reaches home enriched with many mental pictures; the landscape is impressed upon his memory; the clouds are massed and coloured in his soul; he is not a tenant but a proprietor: his hand may be poor, but his spirit revels in affluence. The other traveller saw nothing, heard nothing, felt nothing; his eye was on the road, merely the servant of his feet, not the servant of his soul. One thing thou lackest,—an eye for the beautiful. It is only one thing, yet everything turns upon it, and without it garden and wilderness are equal in charm.

These reflections may serve to show the tremendous danger of the fallacy, that if a man is right in the main he will be admitted into heaven. The man who had no ear for music was right in the main; he was well educated, well connected, rich and generous, yet all this did not interpret one passage of the music to his dormant soul. The man who saw nothing in the landscape was right in the main ; he was honest, persevering, modest, and gentle, yet his eye was blind to beauty, and he cared not for hill or dale or stream or luxuriant wood. So is it with regard to the higher life ; we may have much and yet have nothing. A man may walk well without being able to swim at all, yet all his strength as a pedestrian will not save him in the sea ! The lack of "one thing" may involve ruin. A merchant may have a musical voice, but if he have no money he cannot maintain his credit ; an orator may have great muscular strength, but if his voice should fail, what then !

Place yourself at the railway terminus : a traveller is there who has no ticket ; is that of any consequence ? It is only "one thing ;" a very insignificant thing ; why should the man be detained for want of it ? He has an address card ; he has a wedding card ; he has a visiting card ; will they not do ? No ! "One thing thou lackest." That "one thing" represents law, order, equivalent, authority, and in the absence of that one particular thing a thousand other things go for nothing !

Are we not thus all through life continually reminded that the absence of "one thing" is the ruin of all ?
—Joseph Parker.

(3569.) How important one thing may be. The want of one thing may make void the presence of all things else. Lacking its mainspring—which is but one thing—a watch with jewels, wheels, pinions, and beautiful mechanism, the finest watch indeed that was ever made, is of no more use than a stone. A sun-dial without its gnomon, as it is called, time's iron finger that throws its shadow on the circling hours—but one thing also—is as useless in broad day as in the blackest night. A ship may be built of the strongest oak, with masts of the stoutest pine, and manned by the best officers and crew, but I sail not in her if she lacks one thing—that trembling needle which a child running about the deck might fancy a toy ; on that plaything, as it looks, the safety of all on board depends—lacking that, but one thing, the ship shall be their coffin, and the deep sea their grave. It is thus with true piety, with living faith. That one thing wanting, the greatest works, the costliest sacrifices, and the purest life, are of no value in the sight of God—are null and void.

Still further, to impress you with the valuelessness of everything without true piety, and show how its presence imparts such worth to a believer's life and labours, as to make his mites weigh more than other men's millions, and his cup of cold water more precious than their cups of gold—let me borrow an illustration from arithmetic. Write down a line of ciphers ! You may add thousands, multiplying them till the sheets they fill cover the face of earth and heaven, they express nothing ; and are worth nothing. Now take the lowest number of the ten, the smallest digit ; and place that at their head—magic never wrought such a change ! What before amounted to nothing rises instantly by the addition of one figure, one stroke of the pen, into thousands, or millions, as the case may be ; and whether they represent pounds or pearls, how great is the sum of them ! Such power resides in true faith—in genuine piety.

It may be the lowest piety—but one degree above zero ; it may be the love of smoking flax ; the hope of a bruised reed ; the faith of a mustard seed ; the hesitating, faltering confidence of him who cried,

"Lord, I believe, help Thou mine unbelief." Still, so soon as it is inwrought by the Spirit of God, it changes the whole aspect of a man's life and the whole prospect of his eternity. It is that one important thing, wanting which, however amiable, moral, and even apparently religious we may be, our Lord addresses us, as He did the young ruler, saying, "One thing thou lackest." —Guthrie.

(3570.) The dahlia would surely be a very empress among flowers if it had but perfume equal to its beauty ; even the rose might need to look to her sovereignty. Florists have tried all their arts to scent his lovely child of autumn, but in vain, no fragrance can be developed or produced ; God has denied the boon, and human skill cannot impart it. The reflecting mind will be reminded of those admirable characters which are occasionally met with, in which everything of good repute and comely aspect may be seen, but true religion, that sweet ethereal perfume of grace, is wanting ; if they had but love to God, what lovely beings they would be, the best of the saints would not excel them, and yet that fragrant grace they do not seek, and after every effort we may make for their conversion, they remain content without the one thing which is needful for their perfection. Oh that the Lord would impart to them the mystic sweetness of His grace by the Holy Spirit !
—Spurgeon.

8. Their acts are vitiated by their principles.

(3571.) According to the principle of a man, such is his end ; if the barrel of the musket be crooked, it will never carry the bullet right ; therefore thy principle must especially be minded. There be many things that move orderly, and yet their motion is not from a principle of life ; as a mill moves by reason of the water, yet is no living creature. An outward principle of custom, or fashion, or glory, may make a man just and patient in his actions ; many do the things commanded, not because they are commanded, but upon some sinister account. Morality and Christianity differ specifically : the moralist works from nature, a little refined by education ; the Christian from nature, thoroughly renewed by the Holy Ghost. Where this spring is wanting, no motion can be true ; be the fruit ever so fair to the eye, if the root whence it grows be not good, it will be unpleasant and distasteful.
—Swinnock, 1673.

(3572.) The want of a renewed heart is a hair on the moral man's pen, that blurs and blots his copy when he writes fairest. His uprightness does others more good in this world than himself in the next.
—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3573.) "Whatever ye do, do all to the glory of God." The archer may lose his game by shooting short as well as shooting wide. The hypocrite shoots wide, the moralist shoots short, of the mark.
—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3574.) It is a general principle that on judging of a responsible agent at any given time, we ought to take into view the whole state of his mind. We ought not to single out a particular, or view it under an exclusive aspect. As a second general principle, it must be taken into account, that the mental state of the agent cannot be truly good, providing he is in the meantime neglecting a known and manifest duty. It will not be difficult to establish this principle, which is a necessary consequent of the first ; and when admitted, the two include all men under sin.

Take as an illustration, a boy arrived at the age of responsibility, running away from his parents without provocation of any kind. Very possible, in the midst of the companions whom he meets with, he may be cheerful, kind, and obliging. Present this disinterested kindness to the moral faculty, and it will approve it as something becoming ; and if nothing else is observed, it may seem as if he merited our warmest approbation. But present the whole complex moral state of the boy to the conscience, and the judgment will be instantly reversed. As long as the child is living in neglect of a bounden duty, the moral sense refuses to give a single mark of approval ; all his kindness will not draw a single smile of complacency from the rightly-constituted mind, till he return to his father's house, and to his proper allegiance.

Analogous instances will present themselves to the reflecting. A person, let us suppose, has unjustly got possession of a neighbour's property. It is conceivable that, having done so, he may be benevolent in the use which he makes of his wealth ; his hospitality may be the theme of admiration throughout the whole neighbourhood, and the praise of his charity may be in the mouths of hundreds of the destitute. Now, if this individual's original dishonesty is not established on sufficient evidence, we may say, in the judgment of charity, give him credit for generosity ; but when the whole man is brought under our notice, the mind can give one, and but one judgment, and that is to condemn him, even when he is at the head of his own hospitable board, and scattering his munificence all around him.

Or take the case of a Brazilian sugar planter fitting out a slave ship, with instructions to the crew to proceed to the coast of Africa, there to seize on a company of poor unoffending negroes, and bring them as slaves to his plantation. He makes it a part of his instructions that the captives shall be treated with great lenity on the voyage ; and upon their landing, he does everything which kindness and consideration can prompt, to promote their comfort. Now, present the one side of this man's conduct to the mind—let a stranger be taken rapidly over the plantation, let him see the food provided for the slaves, the comfortable dwellings in which they reside, and the amusements allowed them, and there may be a sentence of approval pronounced ; but present both sides of the picture, and the sentence will assuredly be one of severe reprobation.

A husband making ample, temporal provision for the wife carelessly forsaken, the libertine lavishing kindness on the person whom he has seduced, and with whom he is living in a state of sin—these are cases in point, as showing how the conscience may approve of a moral agent on his conduct being represented only under one aspect, and yet disapprove of it when brought fully under review : and showing, too, how the moral faculty cannot approve of an agent, even when doing an act good in itself, provided he is in a bad moral state, and living in the meanwhile in neglect of a clear and bounden duty.

History presents many examples of such a mixture of motives. Lillienborm had been raised from obscurity and wretchedness by Gustavus, king of Sweden, promoted to the rank of Commandant of the Guard, and had the complete confidence of his sovereign. But when a conspiracy was formed against his master, he joined it, instigated by the hope held out to him of commanding the National Guard, and holding in his hand the destinies of the kingdom. Meanwhile he endeavoured, by a kind of compromise, to keep his allegiance to the king his benefactor. He wrote him an anonymous letter, informing him of an unsuccessful attempt that had been made to take his life some time before, describing the plan which the conspirators had now formed, and warning him against going to a particular ball, where the assassination was to be committed. In this way he sought to satisfy his conscience, when it threw out doubts as to the propriety of the course which he was pursuing. He spent the evening on which the conspiracy was to take effect in the king's apartment, saw him read the anonymous letter sent him, and upon the generous, headstrong king despising the warning, followed him to the ball, and was present when he was shot.

Now, take us to the closet of this man, and let us see him writing the letter which was fitted to save his sovereign—show us this and no more, and we say, How becoming ! how generous ! but let us follow him through the whole scene, and we change our tone, and arraign him of treachery ; and we do so at the very instant when he writes the letter, and seems most magnanimous.

By the help of those principles we are enabled to bring home the sense of guilt to every man's conscience ; not only the sense of individual sins, but of constant and abiding sinfulness. When there is not a sin of commission, there is a sin of omission ; when there is not the sin of excess, there is the sin of defect.

In particular, we hold that every human soul is chargeable with ungodliness. Other sins are committed by individual men, some are addicted to one class of sins, and others to another ; but this offence seems to be universal. All are not malevolent or selfish ; all are not intemperate or deceitful ; all are not proud and ambitious ; but all seem to be ungodly. Other sins may be only occasional, but this seems to be perpetual and abiding, and renders all men guilty at all times, even when they are cherishing thoughts and feelings which in themselves are praiseworthy. Does any man stand up and say, I was in a virtuous state at such and such a time, when I was defending the helpless and relieving the destitute ? We admit at once that these actions in themselves are becoming, as becoming as those of the disobedient son showing kindness to his companions ; of the unjust man practising hospitality ; of the slaveholder supplying his slaves with excellent food ; of the husband providing handsomely for a wife abandoned ; or of the conspirator sending a notice fitted to frustrate the conspiracy to which he was a party. If we could judge these acts apart from the agent, we should unhesitatingly approve of them. Nay, we do approve of the abstract acts, but we never for one instant approve of the agent. Before we can approve of the disobedient son, but kind companion, he must return to his obedience ; of the unjust philanthropist, he must restore the fruits of his iniquity ; of the liberal slaveholder, he must undo his deed ; of the unfaithful husband in his kindness, he must return to the society of his wife ; of the notice sent by the conspirator, he must first disconnect himself entirely and openly from the conspiracy ;—and, in like manner, before we can thoroughly approve of man, even in his generosity, we must find him returning to his allegiance to God, making confession of his past sin, humbling himself before Him whom he has offended, and acknowledging that the very gifts which he is about to bestow, come from God, the author of all blessings.

As godliness is a constant duty, so ungodliness, habitually cherished, is a great master sin, reaching over the whole man, contaminating the service he pays, however proper it may be in itself. Does it not look as if an ungodly man could not do a truly virtuous act? Does it not look as if a man must first be made godly before he can do an act truly good? "Either make the tree good, and his fruit good; or else make the tree corrupt, and his fruit corrupt."

—M^r Cosh.

(3575.) When a man says to me, "When I saw that mother weeping, and her house burning, and when I rushed into the flames, and at the peril of my own life saved and restored to her her child, am I to be told that that was not a good action—that it was a sin in the sight of God?"

Not by me, friend, not by me. That was a good action. It was a hint of what there is planted in your nature by God; and it shows your guilt in not coming to the Sun of Righteousness, that all such things within you may be warmed into a continual life. A man who is capable of such generous acts ought to be ashamed not to be what the love of God would make him. And if he will not love God, and be made into His image, he needs no other condemnation. It is not by the fits and starts of your conduct that you are to be judged, but by its whole course. And if the centre and ruling principle of your life be not, love to God, you are radically and fatally wrong.

When we tell you that you are without God, you run and gather up all your occasional emotions of gratitude towards Him, and of admiration for Him, and heaping them together before us, say, "What I / without God!" Now, you may feel admiration, even very warm admiration, for God—every refined and thoughtful mind must; and perhaps, when you are on the summit of your joys, just as you cross the highest line, you look off, and say, "Thank God! thank God!" it may be very heartily; but does your gratitude and love for Him go down beneath thought and feeling, and take hold upon the secret springs of your soul? Is your life directed, ruled, and formed by that love? Can you look upward and say, with glowing breast, "Father, Abba, Father!" If not, your love is but the starlight, and the moonlight, when it should be the light of the fervid sun. Why, when the sun shines with long, slant ray on Greenland, what lives or thrives beneath its power? But when he pours down straight from his meridian, there springs up life and luxuriant growth. Such love as you speak of is the slant beam of the winter sun, or like the shining of moonbeams on Nova Zembla. You cannot go to heaven with that love. You must be born again. Your course must be changed.

Suppose a shipmaster starts from New York harbour for the Mediterranean Sea. He goes beautifully out of the harbour, and steers straight for Greenland. Off Newfoundland he is hailed by another sail. His destination is inquired, and given.

"Bound for Malta!" shouts the stranger. "You? Why, you're steering for the North Pole."

"Don't tell me that," returns our captain, very much offended—"don't tell me that. My ship is good, and well stored; my men are good, and they find me the most generous of captains. They have long sleeping hours, and short watches; they have abundance of all that is good for food. In my cabin are plenty of books and flowers, and we have fine times down there. We enjoy ourselves very much indeed—don't tell me that all this time we are on our way to any place but Malta; I don't believe it."

The stranger passes on, saying derisively—"I don't care how good you are to your men, or how many good books or beautiful flowers you have got below; all this is very fine, no doubt; but I say that the man that's going to Malta, and heading direct for the North Pole, is a fool." And so he is; all his flowers won't save him. His course must be changed; and it's just so about the sinner. He's heading for hell; and all the flowers, and all the good things that are in him, won't save him, if he don't turn short about. He is living for self, when he should be living for God. Self is his idol, when he should worship God. He is all wrong, wrong, and will certainly be lost if he doesn't come to Jesus for help, safety, and grace to fit him for heaven.

4. The difficulty of their task.

(3576.) The moralist says, "It has cost me severe labour to be as good as I am; how shall I ever be able to do greater things than these?" Friend, there is a rock which on one side is supported by the solid earth, on another side by other rocks, on a third by trees, but upon the fourth side it has no support, and it requires there but a few pounds' weight to tip it downward.

Now you may go and destroy yourself in efforts to remove that rock, and only imbed it deeper in the earth, or fasten it more firmly in the trees or among other rocks; but, push it in the right direction, and it is no longer there. I tell you it would not be half so hard to be a great deal better Christian, than to be the moralist you are. You are all the time pushing the rock the wrong way. Do you say, "Well, it is the most earnest desire of my life to become a Christian. What lack I yet? What is in the way?" I cannot tell—I might tell, in particular cases, but not generally. But, 'tis a question that each one can answer for himself, if he is sincere in wishing to know.

God will answer all prayer for help in such cases, when it is patiently and honestly continued.

—Becher.

(3577.) Morality is to love what a candle is to the sun. A man wishes to explore a great house in the night. He takes a candle, and, scraping a match, sets fire to it; and with this flickering light, which is so feeble that his own steps almost put it out, and which only serves to dispel the darkness for a short distance before him, while it closes in just behind him, opening and shutting almost at the same moment,—with this light, he gropes about his dwelling; and, since it does little besides rendering the darkness more apparent, he makes his explorations with difficulty. But let him wait till the sun appears in the morning, and pours down its rays so that each crack and crevice of the building is suffused with the light of day, which flows in at every open door and unbarred window, and then he will need no candle, and can walk without obstruction through the darkest passages, and all will be revealed to him. For a man to take his own reason, and his own conscious virtues, and attempt to live according to them, is like a man attempting to enlighten his way through his dwelling in the night with a lamp; but for a man to live in the conscious presence of God, and to look to Him for guidance, is as if a man found his way through his dwelling at mid-day, when it is illuminated, in every part by the glorious light of the sun.

—Becher.

(3578.) I understand morality to be, in its best statement, a system of conduct drawn from rules revealed to us in nature; and as such, it must be included, in every true religion. But a life or character that is built up by studying and practising the best ethical rules that nature can give is deficient in the same way that a picture is that is perfectly painted and imperfectly lighted. What is a picture in a dark room good for? What are noble decorations in a house worth, if there is no light to reveal them? Nowhere—not in the store; not in the bank; not in the street; not even in the privacy and purity of the household—is morality more esteemed, and regarded as more essential, than in the teaching of the New Testament; but the New Testament teaches something beyond morality—as much beyond it as the blossom is beyond the leaf—namely, the soul's vital connection with the Lord Jesus Christ. Is there anything better than that?

Here is a young man that has been led away to intemperance, to impurity, to dishonesty, to gambling; and, returning sick, and weary, and pained unto death in his own melancholy thoughts, to his native village, he begins to find the springs of life filling again, and the long days and nights begin to grow shorter; and, as the spring dawns, he begins, in the hope of a new summer and a new life, to make resolutions; and he says, "Now, I will not sin against the laws of health any more. I have been throwing away my life, and it is not wise." He resolves that, for the sake of being healthy in his body, he will refrain from going into those dissipations to which he has been addicted. And he says, "I see that a virtuous course in society is the best; I see that in the long run it is wise to give an equivalent for what you receive, and I am determined that henceforth I will live an industrious life and eschew gambling; I see that it is better for my health that I should be temperate in my diet and drink, and for that's sake I will live temperately." And so he does, till June comes in, when, in one of those chances—for so we call providences—which sometimes befall men, he is brought under the influence of a pure and noble nature, a woman, whose smile is to him more than a star in a stormy night to the bewildered mariner. And with much fear and trembling, carried through weeks and months, sure, at last, of her sympathy and her dawning affection, he says, "I cannot take it! I cannot take it! She does not know whom she loves." And in an agony of honesty, some evening, he pours out the whole history of his life, and says, "Mary, now disown the words you spoke;" and she, with ineffable beauty and tenderness, says, "If it please God to give you to me, then let me lead you higher than that temptation shall ever take you again." And from that hour he and she are one.

Now, the question that I want to put to you is this: Will this man, in the life that he is going to live, think any more of natural laws, of the prudence of being honest, or of the benefits of living temperately? Will he not say, "I want no other motive than this; she fills my life, and for her sake I will be honourable, and true, and right?" Is not that one motive of love so potential, and so inclusive of all other motives, that it lifts him above these lower considerations?

Now, let a man attempt to live a life of morality.

It is good enough, but it is hard and drudging work. It is good as far as it goes, but there is a life of love, when the bright vision of Christ dawns on the soul: when the Spirit of God says, "Thou art His, and He is thine;" when the soul wakes to the conviction, "Christ loves me; and the life that I live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave Himself for me." Morality is good: but it is the lowest and poorest form of that which you can get in a higher and better form.

And when I preach thus, let no man say that I am undervaluing morality. I want to take that as well as all that there is above it; but it can be made easier than by any other means, by the transcendent power of Christ, "formed in you the hope of glory."

—Becher.

(3579.) Look at that stately ship. What a mighty hull she has—three hundred feet long; her masts a hundred feet high. How well set is her rigging, how clearly defined her spars. We may see her distinctly, but not all. Away down under the water, hiding at the ship's stern, there is a little plank that is of more importance than all that so proudly towers on the breast of the billows.

Neither hull, nor decks, nor mainmast, nor mizzen-mast, nor bowsprit, nor yards, nor sails, would be of any use without that plank down under water. Suppose that some person, ignorant of this fact, should attempt to guide that ship's course. He would say, in despair, after wearing himself out with fruitless efforts, "What does all this ship? I have pulled at her bows; I have furled and unfurled her sails; I have tugged at every rope in her, but she will not keep her course. I cannot manage her. She will do nothing right. What can it mean?"

Now, suppose an old salt should say, "Have you tried the wheel?"

"Wheel?" says the man, "what wheel? No; I've tried no wheel."

"Lay hold here, my hearty," cries the sailor. The landsman grasps the wheel, and the little plank below turns two inches, and the ship, though she be ten times as large, and ten times as heavily laden, moves submissively round to the strength of one man's hand.

Now you may tug at your topmasts, or toll at your bows, and you will die with your course all wrong. You never will head for the safe harbour till you take your stand at the wheel.

Men who neglect Christ, and try to win heaven through moralities, are like sailors at sea in a storm, who pull, some at the bowsprit and some at the mainmast, but never touch the helm.

—Becher.

8. Their weakness in temptation.

(3580.) They who delight in virtue, just as they do in a fine piece of painting or statuary, for its beauty, would part with it, if reduced to poverty, just as they would do with a fine piece of painting, to purchase the substantial conveniences of life. The principles of religion will support virtue and us, and be, like God, a "present help in trouble;" but all other principles, however entertaining at other times, will, like false friends, forsake us when we have most need of them, in the day of adversity.

—Scud, 1747.

9. Repentance toward God their first duty.

(3581.) A ship's company rise against their officers, put them in chains, and take the command of the ship upon themselves. They agree to set the officers ashore on some uninhabited island, to sail to some distant port, dispose of the cargo, and divide the amount. After parting with their officers, they find it necessary, for the sake of self-preservation, to establish some kind of laws and order. To these they adhere with punctuality, act upon honour with respect to each other, and propose to be very impartial in the distribution of their plunder. But while they are on their voyage, one of the company relents and becomes very unhappy. They inquire the reason. He answers, "We are engaged in a wicked cause!" They plead their justice, honour, and generosity to each other. He denies that there is any virtue in it. "Nay, all our equity, while it is exercised in pursuit of a scheme which violates the great law of justice, is in itself a species of iniquity."

"You talk extravagantly, surely we might be worse than we are, if we were to destroy each other as well as our officers."

"Yes, wickedness admits of degrees; but there is no virtue of goodness in all our doings; all has risen from selfish motives. The same principles which led us to discard our officers would lead us, if it were not for our own sake, to destroy each other."

"But you speak so very discouragingly; you destroy all motives to good order in the ship; what would you have us do?"

"Repent, return to our injured officers and owners, and submit to mercy."

"Oh, but this we cannot do: advise us to anything which concerns the good order of the ship, and we will hearken to you."

"I cannot bear to advise in these matters! Return, return, and submit to mercy!"

Such would be the language of a true penitent in this case; and such should be the language of a Christian minister to sinners who have cast off the government of God.

—Fuller, 1754-1815.

7. Their need of salvation.

(3582.) When there is an estrangement of the soul from the Spirit of God and Christ, sanctifying, and comforting, and cheering it, then there is a death of the soul. The soul can no more act anything that is savingly and holily good, than the body can be without the soul. And as the body without the soul is a noisome, odious carcass, offensive in the eyes of its dearest friends, so the soul, without the Spirit of Christ quickening and seasoning it, and putting a comeliness and beauty upon it, is odious. All the clothes and flowers you put on a dead body cannot make it but a stinking carcass; so all the moral virtues, and all the honours in this world, put upon a man out of Christ, it makes him not a spiritual living soul; he is but a loathsome carrion, a dead carcass, in the sight of God and of all that have the Spirit of God. For he is under death. He is stark and stiff, unable to stir or move to any duty whatsoever. He has no sense nor motion. Though such men live a common natural civil life, and walk up and down, yet they are dead men to God and to a better life. The world is full of dead men, that are dead while they are alive, as St. Paul speaks of the "widow that lives in pleasures" (1 Timothy v. 6). A fearful estate, if we had spiritual eyes to see it and think of it.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(3583.) Thou art not, proud man, so fair for heaven as thou flatterest thyself. A man upon the top of one hill may seem very high to the top of another, and yet can never come there, except he comes down from that where he is. The mount of thy civil righteousness and moral uprightness (on which thou standest so confidently), seems, perhaps, level in thy proud eye to God's holy hill in heaven, yea, so high, that thou thinkest to step over from one to the other with ease. But let me tell thee, it is too great a stride for thee to take; thy safer way and nearer were to come down from thy mountain of self-confidence (where Satan hath set thee on a design to break thy neck), and to go the ordinary road, in which all that ever got heaven went; and that is by labouring to get an interest in Christ and His righteousness, which is provided on purpose for the creature to wrap up his naked soul in, and to place his faith on; and thus thy uprightness (which before was but of the same form with the heathen's moral honesty) may commence, or rather be baptized Christian, and become evangelical grace.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3584.) Dost not thou think that thou needest Christ as much as any other? There is a generation of men in the world, would almost make one think this was their judgment; who, because their corruptions have not (by breaking out into plague-sores of profaneness) left such a brand of ignominy upon their name, as some others lie under, but their conversations have been strewed with some flowers of morality, whereby their names have kept sweet among their neighbours, therefore they do not at all listen to the offers of Christ, neither do their consciences much check them for this neglect. And why so? surely, it is not because they are more willing to go to hell than others, for they do that to escape it, which many others will not; but because they think the way they are in will bring them in good time to heaven, without any more ado. Poor deluded creatures! Is Christ, then, sent to help only some more debauched sinners to heaven, such as drunkards, swearers, and of that rank? And are civil, moral men left to walk thither on their own legs? I am sure, if the Word may be believed, we have the case resolved clear enough; that tells but of one way to heaven for all that mean to come there. As there is but one God, so but one Mediator between God and man, the Man Christ Jesus; and if but one bridge over the gulf, judge what is like to become of the civil righteous man (for all his sweet scented life) if he miss this one bridge, and goes on in the road he hath set out in for heaven. Oh remember, proud man, who thou art, and cease thy vain attempt. Art not thou of Adam's seed? hast thou not traitor's blood in thy veins? If "every mouth be stopped" (Rom. iii. 19, 20) how darest thou open thine? If "all the world become guilty before God, that by the deeds of the law, no flesh can be justified in His sight;" where then shalt thou stand to plead thy innocence before Him who sees thy black skin under thy white feathers, thy foul heart through thy fair carriage? It is faith on Christ that alone can purify thy heart, without which thy washed face and hands (external righteousness, I mean) will never commend thee to God. And therefore thou art under a horrible delusion, if thou dost not think that thou needest Christ, and a faith to interest thee in Him as much as the bloodiest murderer, or filthiest Sodomite in the world. If a company of men and children in a journey were to wade through some brook, not beyond a man's depth, the men would have the advantage of the children; but if to cross the sea, the men would need a ship to waft them over, as well as the children: and they might well pass for madmen, if they should think to wade through, without the help of a ship, that is offered them as well as the other, because they are a little taller than the rest are; such a foolish desperate adventure wouldst thou give for thy soul, if thou shouldst think to make thy way through the justice of God to heaven without shipping thyself by faith in Christ, because thou art not so bad in thy external conversation as others.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3585.) In all works before grace there is no resignation of the soul to God in obedience; no self-denial of what stands in opposition to God in the heart; no clear view of the evil of sin; no sound humiliation under the corruption of nature; no inward purification of the heart, but only a diligence in an external polishing. All those acts cannot produce a habit of a different kind from them. Let a man be stilted up with the highest natural excellency; let him be taller by the head and shoulders than all his neighbours in morality, those no more confer life upon him than in the setting a statue upon a high pinnacle near the beams of the sun, inspireth it with a principle of motion. The increasing the perfection of one species can never mount the thing so increased to the perfection of another species. If you could increase mere moral works to the highest pitch they are capable of, they can never make you gracious, because grace is another species, and the nature of them must be changed to make them of another kind. All the moral actions in the world will never make our hearts, of themselves, of another kind than moral. Works make not the heart good, but a good heart makes the works good.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3586.) The human graces and virtues may bring a man at times close to the boundary of the kingdom, but there is still a limit between which is of vast importance in the inner life, and which shows itself more openly as time advances. It is as if a man were standing on the shore, close to where a ship is moored. There is but a line between, and a step may cross it. But the one is fixed, the other moves, and all the future of existence depends on that step,—new lands, a new life, and God's great wide world. In the spiritual sphere, to stand still is to fall away, to be left on that shore doomed to decay and death. To pass into God's kingdom is to move with it, not only up to the grandeur of His universe, but into the heritage of Himself.

—Ker.

(3587.) A pirate cannot be pardoned for his piracy because he is generous, and in most respects a moral fellow. He is out on the high seas as a pirate, and is game for hemp and gallows, though he read his Bible every day, and do a thousand kind and good actions every week. But if he repent of his ways and try to become an honest seaman, a few forgetful oaths may be forgiven him. If he is sailing right, and with right intentions, he will not be strictly dealt with, though he do knock down a man now and then when he ought not. So a man who has not accepted Christ as his Saviour, who is using himself just as God did not intend that he should be used, need not hope that his occasional good and generous deeds can do him any service in the matter of salvation. A man who has given himself to Christ can be forgiven and helped anew, if he halt and stumble, because his face is set in the right way, and his heart's desire is that he may attain unto a perfect obedience. His sins will be each day pardoned by the mercy of Him to whom he looks for all of this life and that which is to come.

—Becher.

(3588.) It would be a very small thing for the captain of a piratical vessel to show that he kept it perfectly clean, that his men were orderly, and that he and they were guilty of no special violations of the etiquette of life. If a vessel is a piratical vessel, and at war with every civilised nation on the globe, that is enough to condemn it. Its organisation, the purpose of it, is radically, atrociously wrong. And these single virtues of a man's character are of little account, so long as the very foundation of his being is corrupt. It is a small thing for a man to show that he has never committed any memorable, flagrant sins. It is far better, of course, for a man to cultivate virtues, and abstain from vices. I would say nothing to discourage from any virtue, or to encourage in any vice. But I say that mere right-doing, and abstinence from wrong-doing, is not all that is required of men. A man's whole life is more than any individual act. The opposition of the heart to God is of itself a thing meriting judgment-day condemnation. Nothing more than this is required to exclude a man from the glory of the eternal heavens.

—Becher.

(3589.) Even such thoughts as these turn in men's minds: "We are told that we must do good deeds, and that every man shall receive of the Lord according to his deeds whether good or bad; and yet, at the same time, we are told that we shall not be saved if we have nothing but good deeds. And what, under such circumstances, will become of our good deeds, when, having passed through life, we come before the judgment-seat of Christ?" Well, I should think you thought yourselves to be trees, and your good deeds to be fruits that could be picked off. Good conduct reports and registers itself upon your character, and you have its reward there. It pays there if anywhere. Good conduct is not like bank-bills, like dollars, like gold or silver, that can be taken away from you or given back to you. A man receives the good that he does in himself and the bad that he does in himself. If you do good, so that you lay the substantial foundations of righteousness in a nature that tends to grow, it is possible for God to confer salvation and happiness upon you; but if you do not lay such foundations, it is impossible even for God, except by a miracle, to make heaven in you. And as to your good conduct, I put a question to you. You say, "What will become of my good conduct, if it is not sufficient to save me?" Suppose you are in a prison, and you make a ladder six feet too short to reach the top of the wall, what do you do with the lower rounds when you find that they do not suffice for getting you out? The ladder is good for something if it enables you to climb high enough to escape, but if it is not, you might as well not have made it at all. There is something solemn in that. Many get almost into the kingdom of God, and miss, and pass on, and are punished. You had knowledge enough to show you the way, and you had impulse enough to carry you a good part of the distance; but you stopped before you had reached and grasped the thing for which you set out.

I never shall forget an incident that occurred many years ago, and that impressed my childish feeling, of one who was turned out from an unfeeling husband's house. It was on a bitter cold winter night; and she wandered toward her father's house, almost naked, and with shoeless feet. After wading through the snow till she was benumbed and exhausted, she sank down and died, and her stiff and marblelike form was found so near her home that if there had been a light burning in the window she could have seen it. There, right before the door-yard, where often she had plucked flowers in her girlhood, she gave over and perished.

I think with many persons it is just so. They wander through the black wilderness and terrible winter of sin till they almost see their Father's house, and then their strength is spent, and they die within a few steps of home. If it is worth your while to be good, it is worth your while to be so good that your goodness shall take hold on everlasting life.

—Beecher.

8. Are often farther from salvation than the profane.

(3590.) A man trusting in his morality, and looking no farther, is in the most dangerous condition to hinder him from repentance and faith that any man can be in; and so, by consequence and accidentally, such a state is the worst, worse than profaneness itself. For whereas a man must be humbled, and part with his own righteousness ere he can truly come to Christ, they are the farthest off from that work of any other. As ignorant people are far off (as the Gentiles were, because without the knowledge of God), so these, because of the want of knowledge of themselves. As take a man that has some wit, that is conceited of it, he is farther off from being a wise man than one who is more a fool. Solomon says, "There is more hope of a fool than of him." Why? Because ere he become wise he must become a fool, as Paul tells us, "Let no man deceive himself: if any man among you seems to be wise in this world, let him become a fool that he may be wise." It is a double task to make that man wise, to show him he is a fool, and then to give him wit. So here is the difference between profane and civil men, that though these last have something that when grace is wrought will be more serviceable to grace than a profane man has, and is in itself, comparing things with things, higher; yet, compare it with the working of grace, this man is farther off the working of it, because a profane man will sooner see himself wicked. The publicans and sinners went faster to heaven than the Pharisees; yea, I say, there may be a greater nighness between the things, when yet there is a greater distance between the working of them and bringing them together. Thus, brother and sister are nigher in blood, but farther off marrying each other than two strangers; and thus two men upon the tops of two houses, opposite to each other in one of your narrow streets, —they are nearer to each other in distance than those below are, yet in regard of coming each to other they may be said to be farther off, for the one must come down, and then climb up again. Thus now a moral man, though he seems nearer to a state of grace, yet is really farther off; for he must be convinced of his false righteousness, and then climb up to the state of grace, to see himself as low and vile as the profane man in the world, as every man when he is humbled does.

—Goodwin, 1600-1679.

(3591.) Take heed that thy morality be not thy snare. The young man in the Gospel might have been a better man if he had not been so good.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3592.) There seems to be a fitness in morality for the receiving special grace, because the violence and tumultuousness of sin is in some measure appeased, the flame and spark of it allayed, and the body of death lies more quiet in them, and the principles cherished by them bear some testimony to the holiness of the precepts. But though it seems to set men at a greater nearness to the kingdom of God, yet with all its own strength it cannot bring the kingdom of God into the heart, unless the Spirit opens the lock. Yea, sometimes it sets a man from the kingdom of God, as being a great enemy to the righteousness of the gospel, both imputed and inherent, which is the crown of the gospel: to imputed, as standing upon a righteousness of their own, and conceiving no need of any other: to inherent, as acting their self-reflection and self-applauses. What may seem preparations to us in matters of moral life, may in the root be much distant and vastly asunder from grace, as a divine of our own illustrates it, to mountains whose tops seem near together may in the bottom be many miles asunder. The root of that which looks like a preparation may be laid in the very gall of bitterness; as Simon Magus desiring the gift of the Holy Ghost, but from the covetousness of his heart. Other operations upon the soul which seem to be nearer preparations, as convictions, do not infer grace; for the heart, as a field, may be ploughed by terrors, and yet not sown by any good seed. Planting and watering are preparations, but not the cause of fruit; the increase depends upon God.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3593.) "Jesus saith unto them, Verily I say unto you, that the publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you. For John came unto you in the way of righteousness, and ye believed him not; but the publicans and the harlots believed him: and ye, when ye had seen it, repented not afterward, that ye might believe him."

How could that be? The Pharisee was a man of good morals, and usually he was a man of education and intelligence. Indeed, the Pharisee was eminently the reformer. He might almost be considered as the Puritan of the Jews. And yet Christ distinctly said that the publican and the harlot stood better than he. And when they repented, they showed more signs of amelioration than he.

How is it, then, that a man who has a whole round of morality, may, in the sight of God, be less salvable than they who have nothing but a germ of goodness? Well, let me put a case to you. Here is a conceited, pedantic man, about forty or forty-five years of age, who has a smattering of almost everything. He can talk a little, and write a little, and talk about almost everything, and write about almost everything. He thinks he has touched about all the depths of knowledge, and he sits in almost infinite complacency. You never can tell him anything but that he will say, "Yes, I have heard that before." You never can explain anything to him that he will not say, "I understood that long ago." There is nothing that in his estimation he is not perfectly familiar with. But in his kitchen there is a poor negro, that has lately escaped from bondage, and that, with a hunger that will not be appeased, is reading every book that he can get hold of. He knows that he is ignorant, and he feels degraded in every part of his nature, and he longs for knowledge with a consciousness of how much he needs it. Now, suppose you were to choose of these two the one that you thought would be the most likely to thrive on knowledge, which would you take? Would you choose the man that had stopped growing, and was satisfied with his knowledge, or the man that, being very ignorant, and being conscious of his ignorance, had an insatiable appetite for knowledge, and was just beginning to grow? If you wanted a tree to transplant, would you take that old tree whose branches have ceased to hold their leaves, except a few of the toughest of them, whose trunk is gnarled and rugged, and whose roots are decayed in the ground; or would you take that little whip-like tree in the nursery that is round and plump and vigorous, and full of sap, and that in every part asks, as it were, a chance to grow? Would you not take the tree which is young and small, but in which there is promise and prophecy for the future?

Now, when our Lord looked upon the Pharisees, He saw that they had done growing; that they were bark-bound; that they bore no fruit; that though comparatively they did not come far short in external morals, they had given themselves over to lethargy and spiritual pride, so that they could not be stirred. But when He looked at the publicans and harlots, He saw that the Spirit of God had touched them; that they were beginning to have a sacred rebound from their sins; that there was a thirst for knowledge springing up in them; and that their souls were praying for God's help, as the parched plains pray for dew and rain. And seeing these things, He said, "There is more chance for these than for the Pharisee." And when He said that, did He not say it to some of you? Is there not more chance for the poor, for the vicious, who are just turning from their vices, and who are willing and anxious to grow, than there is for many persons who are respectable, as it is said, and who not only do not wish to grow, but refuse to grow? Take heed to this matter!

—Becher.

MORALITY.

1. The distinction between morality and religion.

(3594.) Morality is character and conduct, such as is required by the circle or community in which the man's life happens to be placed. It shows how much good men require of us. Religion is the endeavour of a man with all his mind, and heart, and soul, to form his life and his character upon the true elements of love and submission to God, and love and good will to man. A spiritual Christian is like a man who learns the principles of music, and then goes on to the practice. A moralist is like a man who learns nothing of the principles, but only a few airs by rote, and is satisfied to know as many tunes as common people do.

—Becher.

2. Is a field flower.

(3595.) There is a moral truth and uprightness, which we may call a field-flower, because it may be found growing in the wild and waste of nature.

—Saller.

3. Is not to be despised.

(3596.) Do not understand me as saying, because I think you ought to be born again of the Spirit, and because I believe divine grace will produce richer fruit than ever can come from an unregenerated nature, that you throw away everything. If you have nothing better than morality, keep that by all means.

If my child should come to me with coarse and rude garments, I should not hesitate to say to him, "My son, be clothed with better;" but the request that he should be clothed with better garments does not imply that the garments he has on are good for nothing. If he were dressed in linsey-woolsey, that would be better than nothing; though broadcloth would be still better. Even linsey-woolsey would be better than leather; but I would have him wear leather rather than he should wear something worse. And if it was a garment that but half covered the body, it would be better than a cincture of leather round the waist. But even a cincture of leather worn about the waist would be better than nothing at all.

Now, if an Indian, with a fragmentary dress, should present himself as a full-dressed man before you, would you deride the idea that he was properly clad? Would you have him throw away the little he had before he got more? Complete dress is what one wants: but is nothing short of that of any value?

I do not say to the young, "These moralities are of no value to you." They are of great value to you. Truth-speaking, fidelity, industry, cleanliness, punctuality, frugality, enterprise — these are real excellences. Have these at least. Have these anyhow. But will you be content with these? Is there not something in every human soul which has the touch of inspiration in it, and which leads it to aspire to something more than these qualities, which belong to the undeveloped mass of mankind?

—Becher.

4. Yet it is insufficient.

(3597.) "Is all a civil man's civility nothing? and are all moral virtues nothing? Are all these then good for nothing?"

I answer, "Yes, they are in themselves good, and they are good for something, but they are not good to make a man spiritually alive? If a man come and offer you a brass sixpence, or a brass shilling ; and you say, "No, it will not go : " and if he reply, and say to you, "But though it be brass, is it good for nothing?" you will say, "Yes, it is good for something, brass is good for something, but it is not good for money, it will not pay your debt, it is not sufficient to fetch you out of prison." So now say I. All moral virtues are in themselves good ; but they can never make you spiritually alive ; it is only grace, and union with Jesus Christ by the Spirit, that must make a man spiritually alive.

Bridge, 1600-1670.

(3508.) Moral virtue only restrains the outward man, it does not change the whole man. A lion in a grate is a lion still ; he is restrained, but not changed, for he retains his lion-like nature still. So temporary grace restrains many men from this and that wickedness, but it does not change and turn their hearts from wickedness.

—Brooke, 1608-1680.

(3599.) Civility is a good staff to walk with among men, but it is a bad ladder to climb up to heaven. We must deny our holy things in point of justification. Alas, how are our duties chequered with sin ! Put gold in the fire and there comes out dross ; our most golden services are mixed with unbelief. Deny self-righteousness ; use duty, but trust to Christ. Noah's dove made use of her wings to fly, but trusted to the ark for safety ; let duties have your diligence, but not your confidence. —Watson.

(3600.) Morality must always precede and accompany religion, and yet religion is much more than morality. You buy a camellia, and determine, in spite of florists, to make it blossom in your parlour. You watch and tend it, and at length the buds appear. Day by day you see them swell, and fondly hope they will come to perfect flower ; but just as they should open, one after another they drop off ; and you look at it, despairingly exclaiming, "All is over for this year !" But I say, "What ! the plant is thrifty. Are not Japonica roots, and branches, and leaves good?" "Yes," you answer ; "but I do not care for them. I bought it for the blossom." Now, when we bring God the roots, and branches, and leaves of morality, He is not satisfied. He wants the blossoming of the heart ; and that is religion. —Becker.

(3601.) Morality is good as copper is good. But copper is not even silver ; certainly it is not gold. Your morality is good as far as it goes ; you are a thousand times better off with it than you would be without it. But it does not take you half way up the first pair of stairs ; it certainly does not take you up where you can look out and sweep the whole heavens, and behold the stars at night, and enjoy the royalty of sunlight by day. You need to go higher than you can carry yourselves. You cannot find peace till you find it in believing on the Lord Jesus Christ. —Becker.

(3602.) Morality is not a substitute for spiritual religion, any more than industry and frugality are substitutes for patriotism. Every man ought to be frugal and industrious ; but many are frugal and industrious who have no patriotism. A man may be very neat, and neatness is a good quality ; yet, when he is attacked he may be a coward, and run out at the back door, and leave his wife and children to take care of themselves. Neatness, though it is a good quality, is no substitute for a man's fidelity to those who are under his trust. And so, in regard to the lower forms of morality, they are meritorious and excellent ; but they are not all that you need. —Becker.

(3603.) It cannot be a substitute for religion. And yet men who have only morality say, "What lack I yet?"

Says my vine, that has been growing now for eight years, and clambering up over the trellis and into the tree, "Do I need to grow any more? Am I not a stalwart vine already? Did you ever see leaves that were better than mine are?" It looks over some of the neighbouring vines, the Iona, the Delaware, and other choice varieties—and sees that they are small and covered with rust ; and it says, "I never had rust on me like that. Those are your choice, famous vines, are they? Look at them. What are they worth? The leaves are bleared and wilted and early falling from mildew. Look at my great thick-lipped leaves." It runs up in the tree, and makes extra leaves, and they do not rust, and it looks down on these finer vines, and the little clusters, and small berries, and says, "See what a great vine I am!" Well, it is rank in the wood, and rank in the leaf ; but there has not a grape grown on it since it had stood, and there will not one grow on it if it stands twenty years longer. And what is a grape-vine good for which has nothing but healthy leaves on it? Yet, is not good, healthy grape-wood a desirable thing? Are not healthy leaves very desirable on a grape-vine? Is it not desirable to have the leaves of a grape-vine free from mildew? It is not on account of what this grape-vine has that we reject it, but because it is deficient in those higher qualities which should make it what it was meant to be, and because it prides itself on the possession of lower and humbler developments.

I do not say that not stealing, and not swearing, and not drinking are not good things ; but if you suppose that a plant is to have nothing but ground-leaves, you are mistaken. Where is the fruit? Where are the clusters? Where are the finer traits of spiritual excellence? You were born for something more than negatives—for something more than those virtues which consist in not doing evil. You were born in the image of God. And as He is Creator, something of His creating nature resides in you, as it does in every part of humanity. It is for you to develop the higher forms of manhood, and not to rest content with the lower forms. If you knew no better, you scarcely would be charged with dishonour, but since you do know better, it is dishonourable in you to live so far below that which God intended you should become. —Becker.

(3604.) "Well, then," you will say, "what about those qualities when a man dies? A man has been industrious, and frugal, and honest, and moderately truth-speaking all his life long ; and when he dies, and goes to judgment, what is to be done with these qualities which you say are good?" A man undertakes to jump across a chasm that is ten feet wide, and jumps eight feet ; and a man says, "What is going to be done with the eight feet that he did jump?" Well, what is going to be done with it? It is one of those things which must be accomplished in whole, or it is not accomplished at all. A man lets out an anchor from a ship, and it goes to within a fathom of the bottom, but it does not touch; and a man says, "Is it not good as far as it goes?" How good is an anchor that does not touch the bottom? A man frames a building, and makes his mortises and tenons so that they come within an inch of fitting; and when he is reproached for his unskilful work, he says, "It is good as far as it goes." And how good is that? Men say, "We have all these minor qualities; we have these lower moralities: are they of no benefit to us?" Yes, they are of benefit to you now; they are of benefit to you in a thousand ways in this world; but they do not constitute that character which is to fit you for the world to come. They do not go to make the golden key which unlocks those mysteries of love which you have need of. These minor qualities are not a substitute for it. You go forth an ungrown spirit; you go forth with lower leaves without the bloom and the fruit; and the lower is no substitute for the higher.

—Becher.

(3605.) When we see men embowered under external moralities, and attempt to teach that morality is not enough, the impression arises that we undervalue morals. I do not undervalue morals any more than the tax-collector undervalues a hundred dollars, when I go to pay my taxes, and offer him that amount, when my bill is five hundred. He says, "I will not take it. It is not enough." He does not despise the hundred dollars. He merely says, "You must put more with it." And I do not despise morality because I say that it does not rise high enough. It is good as far up as it goes. So is a grape-vine good as far up as it goes, when it is two or three feet high; but it does not arrive at what it was planted for until it reaches that point where it has blossoms and clusters. It is the cluster that determines its value.

—Becher.

5. It is at best a preparation for something better.

(3606.) Direct, intimate, hourly, and daily living with Christ, is the thing which the gospel proposes as its characteristic aim. Morality is a good thing. A man without it certainly cannot be a Christian, although he may not be one with it. When I mean to build me a house on a piece of ground that is unoccupied and overgrown, I send a gang of hands to grub out the old roots, to cut down the rank weeds, to grade the surface, and to make excavations preparatory to building; but after they have done all that—without which I could not have a house—I have not yet a house. All this is but preparatory. The house is yet to arise.

Moralities are mere day-labourers, who dig out the roots, and clear off the weeds, and get the ground ready for something else. Morals do but plough the soil—piety is the fruitful stem, and love the fair flower which springs from the soil. Good morals are indispensable to piety; and piety to a certain extent, is gauged by its sweet reaction upon morals; but morality does not constitute piety.

"But," some will say, "do you mean to teach that we are to despise morality, as an indifferent thing?" You are to despise it just as I despise the first leaves which the bean or the pea puts forth after it is planted. These are, to be sure, essential to the perfection of the plant, but they are not the vine-itself. What God thought of when He made the bean, was a long twining stem, covered with pods of wholesome fruit. You know that when the bean grows, there first appears two fat leaves, just to heave up the ground. As soon as these open, up comes the germ. A man says to me, "I have got beans." I go and look at what he calls beans, and I see nothing but great succulent leaves, and I say to him, "These are not beans; they are mere reservoirs of juice, designed to nourish the plant till it can take care of itself. You have got nothing at all as yet." "What!" says he, "do you mean to despise these leaves?" They are certainly good for something." "No," I reply, "I do not mean to despise them; but they are not the fruit which the plant was created to produce. They serve a good purpose, by nourishing the plant in order that it may grow and develop its blossoms and pods. For no other purpose are they good for anything." And morals are just the succulent leaf that help the germ of piety to start and nourish the plant, in order that it may grow and develop its legitimate fruit. Their office does not extend beyond that—not a step!

—Becher.

6. It is good for this world only.

(3607.) Coin that is current in one place is valueless in another. Suppose an Indian, far in the western wilds, were to say, "I will become a trader with the whites. I will go to New York city and buy up half the goods there, and come back and sell them, and then what a rich Indian I shall be." He then collects all his wampum beads, which are his money, and compared with other Indians he is very rich, and away he journeys to yonder city. Imagine him going into Stewart's, and offering his wampum there in exchange for their goods. They are refused. They were money in the woods—in the city they are worthless. And there are thousands of men who are carrying with them, to offer at the judgment, what is no better than the Indian's beads. They are reckoning on their generosity, their prompt payment of all their debts, their various good natural qualities; but when they present them, they will all be found worthless trash. The things that have made them strong, and valued, and important here, will there be worse than useless to them.

OBEDIENCE.

1. ITS IRKSOMENESS.

(3608.) We cannot draw in the gears of obedience. We can travel a whole day after our dogs; but if authority should charge us to measure so many miles, how often would we complain of weariness! The bird can sit out the day-measuring sun, see his rise and fall without irksomeness, while she is hatching her eggs; if her nest were a cage, with what impatience would she lament so long a bondage! So the usurer, though he began his first bag with the first hour, and pulls not off his hands or his eyes till the eye of heaven is ashamed of it, and denies further light, he is not weary; let him sit at church two hours, the seat is uneasy, his bones ache, either a cushion to fall asleep with or he will be gone: Christ may justly and fitly continue His reproof upon such, "Can ye not watch with Me one hour?"

—Adams, 1653.

II. ITS NECESSITY.

(3609.) It is not enough to understand the Word, to be able to talk and dispute of the testimonies of God, but to keep them. It is not enough to assent to them, that they are God's laws, but they must be obeyed. The laws of earthly princes are not obeyed as soon as believed to be the king's laws, but when we are punctual to observe them. This is to keep the commandment of God.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

III. ITS REASONABLENESS.

(3610.) It is an excellent representation of St. Austin; if a sculptor, after his fashioning a piece of marble in a human figure, could inspire it with life and sense, and give it motion and understanding, and speech, can it be imagined but the first act of it would be to prostrate itself at the feet of the maker, in subjection and thankfulness, and to offer whatever it is, and can do, as homage to him? The almighty hand of God formed our bodies, He breathed into us the spirit of life; and should not the power of love constrain us to live wholly according to His will?

—Bates, 1625-1699.

IV. ITS WISDOM.

(3611.) God commands nothing but what is beneficial. "O Israel, what doth the Lord require of thee, but to fear the Lord thy God, and to keep His statutes, which I command thee this day, for thy good?" To obey God, is not so much our duty as our privilege: His commands carry meat in the mouth of them. He bids us repent, and why? that our sins may be blotted out (Acts iii. 19). He commands us to believe, and why? that we may be saved (Acts xvi. 31). There is love in every command: as if a king should bid one of his subjects dig in a gold mine, then take the gold to himself.

—Watson, 1696.

V. THE TEST OF SINCERITY AND LOVE.

(3612.) Hypocrites may delight in the speculation, but a child of God is delighted in the obedience and in conformity to His word. "I have rejoiced in the way of His testimonies as much as in all riches," not only in the testimonies themselves—in the naked contemplation of these blessed truths—but in the way and practice of these things. He that loves His rule will study an exact conformity thereto. The love of a child of God to the word differs from that of a temporary believer in this way. A mere beholder of a rare piece of painting may be greatly pleased with it, and if he has a taste for the arts, his pleasure and satisfaction will be sensibly increased. But this is nothing to the enjoyment which an artist will find in it. What is it to the zest and delight which he takes in imitating, and copying it out, in expressing it, when he can by his own pencil copy it out to the life? So while the one contents himself with barren admiration and naked praise and acknowledgment, the true believer finds his delight when he can copy out the word of God, and transcribe it as the moral image of his God into his heart.

—Salter.

(3613.) "Herein is My Father glorified." A king is made glorious by the obedience of the subjects throughout his realm. He is honoured in that way. The parent is honoured by the child. How? Not by his running around the neighbourhood and saying, "Oh, what a great man my father is!" or, "What a beautiful woman my mother is!" or, "What a splendid house my father has to live in!" For a child to do that would be ridiculous. We like to see a child manifest warmth and affection toward his parents; but publishing such things in the streets about one's parents is not glorifying those parents. If a child loves and honours his parents, he shows it by studiously fulfilling their known wishes. An affectionate and loving child does honour his parents in the eyes of all the neighbourhood. The teacher is honoured, not by what the pupil says, but by what he does. Find out what they want who are put over you, and do that; and then you honour them. And we honour, or, what is the same thing, we glorify God by fulfilling His known commands.

—Becher.

(3614.) "To obey is better than sacrifice." There are some soldiers here to-night. Now, suppose one of these received orders from the commanding officer to keep guard at such and such a door. All of a sudden he thinks to himself, "I am very fond of our commander, and I should like to do something for him." He puts his musket against the wall, and starts out to find a shop where he can buy a bunch of flowers. He is away from his post all the while, of course, and when he comes back he is discovered to have been away from the post of duty. He says, "Here is the bunch of flowers I went to get;" but I hear his officer say, "To obey is better than that; we cannot allow you—military discipline would not permit it—to run off at every whim and wish of yours and neglect your duty, for who knows what mischief might ensue?" The man, however much you might admire what he was doing, would certainly be made to learn by military law that "To obey is better than sacrifice." It is a holier and a better thing to do one's duty than to make duties for one's self and then set about them.

—Spurgeon.

VI. IS A GRADUAL ATTAINMENT.

(3615.) Obedience to the law of God is a gradual attainment. It is a thing learned.

The musician is not born with the ability to play the organ or any other instrument. Many persons possess an innate musical faculty; but not one could do anything in music without education and without training. And so, although we have our spiritual natures, our innate tendencies to things virtuous and good, they are all obliged to conform to this law of education, training, drill.

—Becher.

VII. CHARACTERISTICS OF TRUE AND ACCEPTABLE OBEDIENCE.

1. Accordance with the will of God.

(3616.) If we would please God, we must in the first place deny ourselves and our own wills, saying with our Saviour, "Not my will, but Thine be done." Neither must we ask counsel of carnal reason, nor, when we know God's will, dispute with flesh and blood whether it be fit or unfit, profitable or unprofitable, reasonable or against reason, to do that which God commands, but we must yield unto it absolute obedience, doing God's will as the saints and angels do it in heaven, cheerfully and readily, without gainsaying, doubting, or replying. For if earthly princes will not endure to have subjects scan their laws, nor examine their proclamations, to see with what reason they command, but require absolute obedience in all things not repugnant to the law of God, and will not be served according to their subject's best intentions, but will have obedience squared by their laws; if every master in a family will be served according to his own pleasure, and will not for matter or manner leave it to his servant's choice, to perform what service best suits with their own humour and liking; and if the captain of a company, or general of an army, will not excuse a soldier the neglect of his commands, upon the fairest pretence: then how much less will the King of kings endure to have His will neglected, and ours preferred in His service? And how much more will He who is the Lord of hosts be displeased with us, if in our spiritual welfare we regard not what He commands, but perform such service as best suits with our own conceits? "No man that warreth," says the Apostle, "entangleth himself with the affairs of this life, that he may please him who hath chosen him to be a soldier; and if a man strive for masteries, yet is he not crowned, except he strive lawfully;" that is, according to the orders appointed by him who is master of the games. And therefore let us not think to have the crown and garland of happiness, if we stint God of this royalty and privilege which we give unto men, not striving for the victory according to His will, nor offering unto Him that service which He requires, but such as seems good in our own eyes.

—Downe, 1644.

(3617.) In all true service of God it is essential that we serve Him in the way of His appointment. You would be grievously plagued if you had in your house a woman who was continually running up and down stairs, roaming into every room, opening every closet, moving this piece of furniture and dusting that, and generally keeping up a perpetual stir and worry; you would not call this service, but annoyance. All that is done contrary to orders is disobedience, not service; and if anything be done without orders, it may be excessive activity, but it certainly is not service.

—Spurgeon.

2. It is all-comprehensive.

(3618.) An instrument, if only one string be out of tune, although the rest be well set, yet that one keeps such a jarring and harsh sound, that the lesson played thereon will relish as unmusically, in a skilful ear, as if all the strings were out of tune. And thus, if a man should abstain from swearing and drunkenness, yet if he were given to lust, or if from those three, and yet addicted to covetousness, it comes all to one reckoning. Let every man, therefore, look into his bosom sin, observing diligently that one jarring string, and never leave screwing and winding of it up till it be brought into right tune; and if that cannot be effected, break it, pluck it out: for God will have a complete harmonious consent, a resolution for universal obedience—otherwise, no acceptance.

—Cheshire, 1641.

(3619.) A carnal heart is contented to go so far in God's commands as will serve his own turn, but there he stops. So far as might serve the elevation of Jehu to the crown of Israel, to setting him on the throne, so far he goes in the ways of God's command, but no farther. Such a heart is like the hand of a rusty dial; suppose the hand of a rusty dial (as now) at ten o'clock; look upon it, and it seems to go right, but it is not from any inward right state of the clock it does so, but by accident; for stay till after ten, and come again at eleven or twelve, and it stands still as before at ten. So let God command anything that may hit with a man's own ends, and be suitable to him, and he seems to be very obedient to God; but let God go on further, and require something that will not serve his turn, that will not agree with his own ends; and here God may seek for a servant; as for him, he will go no farther.

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

(3620.) God will be served with the whole heart; for all our good is in God, and therefore all our hearts must make out after God. God must have perfect obedience in the desire and endeavour, or else He will have none. Certainly that which must make any man acceptable, is not so much that there is somewhat done, but that that which God commands is done, or done in regard of the endeavour; for that indeed will be acceptable: though we cannot do all at once, if we bring somewhat to God as a part, and acknowledging the whole debt, work for the remainder, it will be accepted. As suppose a man owes you an hundred pounds, and brings you but fifty in part of payment, yet if he acknowledge the rest, and promise the payment of it, if you know he will be faithful in the payment of the other, you will accept it; but if a man bring you fourscore pounds in lieu of all, you will not accept it. So here it is; hypocrites say they cannot be perfect in this world, and so think to put off God with a little. It is true, if thou hadst an upright heart, and didst bring God but part and labour after the whole, He would accept it; but if thou bringst Him ten times more than a sincere heart can bring Him, it will not be acceptable, no, not ninety-nine pounds will be accepted, if brought instead of the whole.

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

(3621.) It is a sure sign of hypocrisy to be unrighteous and careless in civil dealings, how conscientious soever thou mayest seem to be in sacred duties. He that seems righteous towards men, and is irreligious towards God, is but an honest heathen; and he that seems religious towards God, and is unrighteous towards men, is but a dissembling Christian. To make conscience of one duty, and not of another, is to make true conscience of neither. The soul that ever had communion with God above, comes down like Moses out of the Mount with both tables in his hands, the second as well as the first, the first as well as the second. One stone in a mill, one oar in a boat, will do little good; there must be two, or no work can be done. A perfect man consists of two essential parts, a soul and a body; though the soul be the principal, and doth specify the compound, yet the body is so necessary, that without it none can be a complete man. A Christian that is evangelically "perfect," is also made up of these two parts—holiness and righteousness; though holiness be the chief, as that which doth difference the saint, yet righteousness is so requisite, that there can be no true Christian without it.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(3622.) Visibility and universality are Popish marks of a true Church, and Protestant marks of a true Christian. An hypocritical Jehu will do "some things;" a murderous Herod will do "many things;" but an upright Paul is "in all things willing to live honestly." A ship that is not of the right make cannot sail trim, and a clock whose spring is faulty will not always go true; so a person of unsound principles cannot be constant and even in his practices. The religion of those that are inwardly rotten, is like a fire in some cold climates, which almost fries a man before, when at the same time he is freezing behind; they are zealous in some things, as holy duties, which are cheap, and cold in other things, especially when they cross their profit or credit; as Mount Hecla is covered with snow on one side, when it burns and casts out cinders on the other: but the holiness of them that are sound at heart is like the natural heat,—though it resorts most to the vitals of sacred performances, yet, as need is, it warms and has an influence upon all the outward parts of civil transactions. It may be said of true sanctity, as of the sun, "there is nothing hid from the heat thereof." When all the parts of the body have their due nourishment distributed to them, it is a sign of a healthy temper. As the saint is described sometimes by a "clean heart," so also sometimes by "clean hands," because he has both; the holiness of his heart is seen at his fingers' ends.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(3623.) Herein is religion best seen, in an equal and uniform practice of every part of our duty: not only in serving God devoutly, but in demeaning ourselves peaceably and justly, kindly and charitably, towards all men; not only in restraining ourselves from the outward act of sin, but in mortifying the inward inclination to it, in subduing our lusts, and governing our passions, and bridling our tongues. As he that would have a prudent care of his health and life, must not only guard himself against the chief and common diseases which are incident to men, and take care to prevent them, but must likewise be careful to preserve himself from those which are esteemed less dangerous, but yet sometimes do prove mortal: he must not only endeavour to secure his head and heart from being wounded, but must have a tender care of every part; there being hardly any disease or wound so slight, but that some have died of it. In like manner, the care of our souls consists in a universal regard to our duty, and that we be defective in no part of it: though we ought to have a more especial regard to those duties which are more considerable, and wherein religion doth mainly consist; as piety towards God, temperance and chastity in regard to ourselves, charity towards the poor, truth and justice, goodness and kindness towards all men: but then no other grace and virtue, though of an inferior rank, ought to be neglected by us.

—Tillotson, 1630–1694.

(3624.) Some will obey partially, obey some commandments, not others; like a plough which, when it comes to a stiff piece of earth, makes a baulk. But God that spake all the words of the moral law, will have all obeyed.

—Watson, 1696.

(3625.) A good Christian is like a pair of compasses, one foot of the compass stands upon the centre, and the other foot of it goes round the circle; so a Christian by faith stands on God the centre, and by obedience goes round the circle of God's commandments.

—Watson, 1696.

(3626.) An attention to one part will not prove our sincerity. It is an ancient song, you must keep minim time, or else you will put the whole choir out of tune, so look that you sing the new song of the Lord with trembling and accurate observation—miss neither cleff nor note, neither sound doctrine nor pious practice. Christ and His truth will not divide; and His truth hath not latitude and breadth, that ye may take some of it, and leave some of it; nay, the Gospel is like a small hair that hath no breadth, and will not cleave in two; it is not possible to divide and compound a matter betwixt Christ and Antichrist; and, therefore, ye must either be for Christ, or ye must be against Him. You must give Him an absolute obedience, or it is just nothing.

—Salter.

2. It is unquestioning.

(3627.) Men, having an express commandment in God's Word to do thus and thus, must not gainsay and overthrow all with their own worldly wisdom and fleshly reason. Obedience must be no disputant, no framer of excuses. If the captain command a soldier a piece of service, must he tell him why? Is it not enough for the centurion to say to his servant, "Do this, and he doeth it!" Must the subject obey his prince in nothing, but when he is of his council? But if with men it were so, yet with God it may not so be, of whom it is sufficient for us but to know that we are commanded to obey whatsoever His will and pleasure is.

—Spencer, 1658.

(3628.) You pretend also to sincere obedience. If we ask you whether you are willing to obey God? you will say, "God forbid that any should deny it." But when it comes to the particulars, and you find that He commandeth you that which flesh and blood is against, and would cost you the loss of worldly prosperity, then you will be excused; and yet, that you may cheat your souls, you will not professedly disobey; but you will persuade yourselves that it is no duty, and that God would not have you do that which you will not do. Like a countryman's servant, that promises to do all his master bids him; but when he cometh to particulars, threshing is too hard work, and mowing and reaping are beyond his strength, and ploughing is too toilsome; and in conclusion, it is only an idle life, some easy chaps, that he will be brought to. This is the hypocrite's obedience.

—Baxter, 1615–1691.

(3629.) The tendency of our minds is to the asking a reason for everything. It is so with doctrines. God reveals to us a truth: but we are not content to take it on the authority of revelation; we are for asking with Nicodemus, "How can these things be?" we want to be able to explain the doctrine, and thus to find grounds for our belief, over and above the simple word of the Lord. But undoubtedly it is a higher, and must be a more acceptable, exercise of faith, when we receive a truth, because revealed, than when, because, besides being revealed, we can so arrange it that commends itself to our reason.

It is the same with commandments. God enjoins a certain thing: but we can hardly bring ourselves to obey, simply because He has enjoined it. We have our inquiries to urge—why has He enjoined it? if it be an indifferent thing, we want to know why He should have made it the subject of law? why not have let it alone? Why not? Because we may venture reply, He wishes to test the principle of obedience: He wishes to see whether His will and His word are sufficient for us. In order to this, He must legislate upon things which in themselves are indifferent, neither morally good nor morally bad : He must not confine laws to such matters as robbing a neighbour's house, on which conscience is urgent ; He must extend them to such matters as taking a bird's nest, on which conscience is silent.

It is the same as with a child. He is walking in a stranger's garden, and you forbid his picking fruit : he knows that the fruit is not his, and therefore feels a reason for the prohibition. But he is walking on a common, and you forbid his picking wild flowers ; he knows that no one has property in these flowers, and therefore he cannot see any reason for your prohibition. Suppose him, however, to obey in both cases, abstaining alike from the flowers and the fruit, in which case does he show most of the principle of obedience, most of respect for your authority and of submission to your will ? Surely, when he does not touch the flowers, which he sees no reason for not touching, rather than when he does not gather the fruit which he feels that he can have no right to gather.

It is exactly the same with God and ourselves. He may forbid things which we should have felt to be wrong even had they not been forbidden : He may forbid things which we should not have felt wrong, nay, which would not have been wrong unless He had forbidden them. But in which case is our obedience most put to the proof ? not surely as to the thing criminal even without a commandment, but as to the thing indifferent till there was a commandment. God might have made it the test of Adam's obedience that he should not kill Eve—a crime from which he would have instinctively revolted : but it was a much greater trial that he should not eat of a particular fruit, for eating it was no crime till he was told not to eat it.

And we may justly believe that, in constructing the Jewish code, God interspersed laws for which there was no apparent reason, with others for which there was palpable, on purpose that He might see whether His people would obey His word, simply because it was His word ? whether they would wait to know why He commanded, or be satisfied with ascertaining what He commanded. —McNeill.

(3630.) "Sir," said the Duke of Wellington to an officer of engineers, who urged the impossibility of executing the directions he had received, "I did not ask your opinion, I gave you my orders, and I expect them to be obeyed." Such should be the obedience of every follower of Jesus. The words which He has spoken are our law, not our judgments or fancies. Even if death were in the way it is—"Not ours to reason why—Ours, but to dare and die ;"

and, at our Master's bidding, advance through flood or flame. —Spurgeon.

4. It is prompt.

(3631.) "Straightway" (Matt. iv. 20). True obedience knows no delays. —Jerome, 340-420.

5. It is exact.

(3632.) In religion no part is to be called little. A hair is but little ; yet it hath a shadow. In the body a little disquiet is oftentimes cause of death. The ciniphes (Exod. viii. 17, 18) were but little ; yet are they reckoned among the great plagues of God. Metellus, a nobleman of Rome, by receiving a hair in his milk was choked with it, and died thereof. Some things are small and do no hurt : some things, though they be small, do great hurt. Therefore doth God straitly charge His people to keep the law, saying, "Thou shalt not turn away from it, neither to the right hand nor to the left." And St. Paul saith : "A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump." —Jewel, 1522-1571.

6. It is cheerful.

(3633.) True obedience hath no lead at its heels. —Adams, 1653.

(3634.) Sincerity makes the soul willing. When it is clogged with so many infirmities as to disable it from the full performance of its duty, yet then the soul stands on tip-toes to be gone after it ; as the hawk upon the hand, as soon as ever it sees her game, launcheth forth, and would be upon the wing after it, though possibly held by its sheath to the fist. Thus the sincere soul is inwardly pricked and provoked by a strong desire after its duty, though kept back by infirmities. A perfect heart and a willing mind are joined together ; 'tis David's counsel to his son Solomon, to serve God with a perfect heart and a willing mind.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3635.) May be when the sincere soul is about a duty he doth it weakly, yet this very willingness of the heart is wonderful pleasing to God. How doth it affect and take the father, when he bids his little child go and bring him such a thing (that may be as much as he can well lift), to see him not stand and shrug at the command as hard, but runs to it and puts forth his whole strength about it ! Though at last may be he cannot do it, yet the willingness of the child pleaseth him so, that his weakness rather stirs up the father to pity and help him, than to provoke him to chide him. Christ throws this covering over His disciples' infirmities, "The spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak." Oh ! this obedience, that like the dropping honey, comes without squeezing, though but little of it, tastes sweetly on God's palate ; and such is sincere obedience. —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3636.) Serve God with gladness and cheerfulness of heart, as one that hath found the way of life, and never had cause of gladness until now. If you see your servant do all his work with groans, and tears, and lamentations, you will not think that he is well pleased with his master and his work.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(3637.) Obey God willingly (Isa. i. 19). That is the best obedience, that is cheerful, as that is the sweetest honey which drops out of the comb.

—Watson, 1696.

(3638.) The true obedience of faith is a cheerful obedience ; God's commands do not seem grievous. What say you to this ? Do you look upon God's command as your burden, or privilege ; as an iron fetter about your leg, or a gold chain about your neck ? —Watson, 1696.

(3639.) "I wish I could mind God as my little dog minds me," said a little boy, looking thoughtfully on his shaggy friend ; "he always looks so pleased to mind, and I don't." What a painful truth did this child speak ! Shall the poor little dog thus readily obey his master, and we rebel against God, who is our Creator, our Preserver, our Father, our Saviour, and the bountiful Giver of everything we love?

—Christian Treasury.

7. It is fervent.

(3640.) Obedience without fervency is like a sacrifice without fire. Why should not our obedience be lively and fervent? God deserves the flower and strength of our affections.
—Watson, 1696.

8. It is sincere.

(3641.) Obedience must be sincere. An action may look like a friendly act when there is nothing of friendship and goodwill in the heart. Every precept requires not only an outward but an inward conformity, not only a bodily action but a spiritual frame. God would not have the skin of a sacrifice without the flesh and entrails, nor the carcass of obedience without truth in the inward parts (Ps. li. 6). Christ intends not only an outward appearance, but respects the form of every action. Duties are not differentiated by the outward garb, but inward frame. Waters may have the same colour, yet one may be sweet and the other brackish. Two apples may have the same colour, yet one may be a crab and the other of a delightful relish. A serpent has a speckled skin, but an inward poison.
—Charnock, 1628-1680.

9. It is prompted by love to God.

(3642.) The son of a poor man, that hath not a penny to give or leave him, yields his father obedience as cheerfully as the son of a rich man, that looks for a great inheritance. It is, indeed, love to the father, not wages from the father, that is the ground of a good child's obedience. If there were no heaven, God's children would obey Him, and though there were no hell, yet would they do their duty, so powerfully doth the love of the Father constrain them.
—De Trugillo.

10. It aims at the glory of God.

(3643.) Two things are chiefly to be eyed in obedience, the principle and the end: a child of God though he shoots short in his obedience, yet he takes a right aim.
—Watson, 1696.

11. It is constant.

(3644.) Obedience must be constant: "Blessed is he who doth righteousness at all times." True obedience is not like a high colour in a fit, but is a right sanguine: it is like the fire on the altar, which was always kept burning (Lev. vi. 13). Hypocrite's obedience is but for a season; it is like plastering work, which is soon washed off: but true obedience is constant.
—Watson, 1696.

VIII. ITS REWARDS.

1. Peace of conscience.

(3645.) Obedience and holy walking bring peace: "Great peace have they which love Thy law, and nothing shall offend them." As there is peace in nature when all things keep their place and order. This peace others cannot have. There is a difference between a dead sea and a calm sea. A stupid conscience they may have, not a quiet conscience. The virtue of that opium will soon be spent, conscience will again be awakened.
—Manton, 1620-1667.

(3646.) A circus came to town; and everybody knows how the music, and the grand tent and horses, set all the little boys agoing. Quarters of dollars and shillings are in great demand; and many a choice bit of money have the circus-riders carried away, which was meant for better purposes. A little boy was seen looking around the premises with a great deal of curiosity. "Halloa, Johnny!" said a man who knew him, "going to the circus?"—"No sir," answered Johnny; "father don't like 'em."—"Oh well! I'll give you money to go, Johnny," said the man. "Father don't approve of them," answered Johnny. "Well go for once, and I'll pay for you."—"No, sir," said Johnny; "my father would give me money if he thought it were best; besides, I've got twenty-five cents in my strong box,—twice enough to go."—"I'd go, Johnny, for once: it is wonderful the way the horses do," said the man. "Your father needn't know it."—"I shan't," said the boy. "Now why?" asked the man. "'Cause," said Johnny, twirling his bare toes in the sand, "after I've been, I could not look my father right in the eye, and I can now."

2. Comfort in death.

(3647.) The spiritual life is a living to God, when He is made the end of every action. You have a journey to take, and whether you sleep or wake your journey is still agoing. As in a ship, whether men sit, lie, or walk, whether they eat or sleep, the ship holds on its course and makes towards its port. So you are all going into another world, either to heaven or hell, the broad or the narrow way; and then, do but consider how comfortable it will be at your journey's end, in a dying hour, to have been undefiled in the way. Then wicked men that are defiled in the way will wish they had kept more close and exact with God; even those who now wonder at the niceness and zeal of others, when they see that they must in earnest enter into another world; oh, then, that they had been more exact and watchful, and stuck closer to the rule in their practice, discourses, compliances! Men will have other notions then of holiness than they ever had before; oh, then they will wish that they had been more circumspect! Christ commended the unjust steward for remembering that in time he should be put out of his stewardship. You will all fail within a little while; then your poor, shiftless, naked souls must launch out into another world, and immediately come to God: how comfortable will it be then to have walked closely according to the line of obedience!

PATIENCE.

1. NATURE OF TRUE PATIENCE.

1. It is neither ignorant nor apathetic.

(3648.) Some you shall see very still and quiet in affliction, yet mere strangers to this peace, ignorant of Christ the peace-maker, walking in opposition to the terms God offers peace in the gospel upon, and yet very calm in affliction. Certainly all is not right with this poor creature; if he had any sense how it is with him, he would have little patience to see himself under the hand of God, and not know but it may leave him in hell before it hath done with him. When I see one run over stones and hard way
